Iran, Iraq respond; bombing to cease

By The Associated Press

MANAMA, Bahrain — Iran and Iraq said Sunday they will stop shelling each other's civilian areas. The agreement was Iran's first acceptance of an attempt to mediate the 45-month-old war in the Persian Gulf.

The warring countries said in separate statements they were responding to an appeal from U.N. Secretary-General Javier Perez de Cuellar in agreeing to cease air and artillery attacks on populated areas.

Iranian state radio made it clear frontline hostilities would continue.

The announcements in Tehran and Baghdad followed a report earlier Sunday that an unidentified plane attacked a Kuwaiti tanker in the Persian Gulf. The owners said no one was hurt and the tanker was empty.

Shipping sources said it was the closest air strike to the Strait of Hormuz at the southern tip of the gulf since the Iran-Iraq war began.

A Tehran radio broadcast noted the attack "by an unknown aircraft."

Gulf oil ministers meanwhile held secret deliberations in Taif, Saudi Arabia, on means of ensuring a continued flow of crude oil to world consumers despite war hazards to tanker shipping in the region.

Arab and Western diplomatic sources in the gulf region have said Iran has 400,000 troops along Iraq's southern border and plans a major offensive soon. Iraq threatened Saturday to attack major Iranian economic areas "without mercy" to cut off oil revenues.

A Baghdad war communique, issued shortly after the nations announced their intentions to stop attacking civilian targets, said Iranian shelling of southern and central Iraqi cities and towns continued for the fourth day, killing five people and wounding 24.

Iraq said in a later communique that its units on Sunday shelled Iranian positions and troop concentrations east of Basra, Iraq, inflicting casualties and destroying a boat, an arms dump and two observation posts.

Iranian state radio quoted President Ali Khamenei as telling Perez de Cuellar that "to prove its good will, Iran's government responds positively to your proposal concerning the cessation of any kind of attack on civilian areas."

Khamenei added, "Although experience has shown that it is pointless to count on promises of the Iraqi regime, we agree with this request in order to demonstrate our intentions."

Iraq's acceptance was announced over Baghdad Radio and the Arab state's official news agency. The agency said Iraqi President Saddam Hussein messaged Perez de Cuellar informing him of his acceptance of the proposal, and asked him "to lay down, at the nearest possible opportunity, effective arrangements" to supervise the warring sides commitment to stop attacking civilian targets.

No specific mediation in the gulf war was announced by Perez de Cuellar, who is on a Middle East tour aimed at settling Arab-Israeli conflicts. But Arab diplomats here said he had been in contact with both Tehran and Baghdad.

Perez de Cuellar said upon arrival in Amman, Jordan, that he had not yet been officially informed of Iran's acceptance of the proposal.

At U.N. headquarters in New York, it was announced the Security Council will meet privately Monday to talk about Perez de Cuellar's initiative.

Sunday's strike, in the southern gulf about 235 miles west of the Strait of Hormuz, was said by marine sources to be the closest to date to the strategic gulf entrance, through which passes about 20 percent of the non-communist world's oil.

Iraq has been using air strikes against ships calling at Kharg in its attempt to cut off Iran's oil income and force the Persian state to negotiate an end to the war. Iran, which refuses to negotiate with the current Baghdad government, has retaliated with air attacks on tankers in other areas of the gulf region.

Five ship strikes in the gulf last month were attributed to Iran. Abdel-Fattah al-Badr, chairman of the state-owned Kuwait Oil Tanker Co. which owns the Kazimah, told The Associated Press the vessel was empty and was returning to Kuwait when it was hit.

He said the unidentified aircraft struck when the tanker was somewhere between the United Arab Emirates and Qatar, in the southern region of the gulf, and that there were no injuries.

In an official statement carried by the Kuwait news agency, al-Badr said a fire broke out as a result of the attack but was immediately extinguished by crewmen. Shipping sources said the vessel got under way for Qatar after the fire was put out.

Tom Shurburn, Topeka, maneuvers his kayak through a gate during the Land of Ahs Slalom and Downriver Race Sunday morning at the Pillsbury Crossing Wildlife Area on Deep Creek. Shurburn took second in all kayaking races at the Kansas Fish and Game sponsored event.

Canoers, kayakers navigate crossing

The Kansas Fish and Game Commission, celebrating Kansas Rivers' Month, sponsored Sunday the Land of Ahs Slalom and Downriver Race, along with novice canoeing and canoe camping clinics.

Rains Saturday morning forced a one-day postponement of the first annual canoeing race at the Pillsbury Crossing Wildlife Area southeast of Manhattan.

"This is the first outdoor slalom race in the state," said Jim Nighswonger, professor of forestry and Kansas Canoe Association member. "We (KCA) have held slalom races at the K-State Natatorium for the past two years."

Slalom racers must navigate an upriver course that consists of 17 gates, without touching the two suspended poles which form the gate. The poles are spaced 47-70 inches apart, while the distance varies between each of the gates. The poles are either green or red and tell the racers how they must approach each gate to maneuver through the course.

"This is kind of a compromise course," T.J. Hittle, race chairman, said. "We (KCA) set the gates at what would be a little wide for many kayaks, but a little narrow for some canoes."

"The canoes will take anywhere from four to five minutes to run the course, kayaks from 2½ to four minutes," he said.

"It (slalom) is a way to improve your canoeing skills," Hittle added. "You use a lot of strokes that would never normally be attempted on a river."

In the other race, downriver racers must maintain a steady pace during the first 1½ miles upriver to a buoy. Once around the buoy, racers paddle back downriver to the starting line.

Both downriver and slalom races are divided into canoe and kayak classes by size and type of boat and number of paddlers. Contestants are separated according to age, sex and canoeing experience.

In the kayak slalom events, Colin Isenmen of Wichita swept the advanced racing, advanced recreational and advanced short races. Isenman paired up with Tom Sherburne of Topeka to win the kayak team race.

In the canoe slalom events, Scott Duffens of Topeka won the closed canoe race. Duffens also won both the one- and two-man open canoe races. In the two-man race Duffens teamed up with Hittle.

The junior open canoe race was won by Ben Miles of Burlingame. Ben Hoopes of Wichita won the open canoe masters (40 years of age and older).

Hittle teamed with Jackie Rawlings of Manhattan to win the mixed open canoe race.

Twelve people attended the novice canoeing clinic which began at 1 p.m. and lasted for approximately 1½ hours.

Party seizes Solidarity leader

By The Associated Press

WARSAW — Communist authorities on Sunday announced the arrest of fugitive Solidarity leader Bogdan Lis, the most important underground figure captured since the military crackdown against the free trade union in December 1981.

Lis, 31, is a close friend and former aide of Solidarity leader Lech Walesa, who described the arrest as a great loss but said Solidarity would nevertheless "carry on for another 50 years."

Walesa, contacted by telephone at his apartment in the Baltic port of Gdansk, said he last met secretly with Lis about six weeks ago, but declined to give details "for security reasons."

Lis sat on Solidarity's five-man fugitive Temporary Coordinating Commission (TKK) representing Gdansk, birthplace of the now-outlawed union — which had been the only free trade union in the Soviet bloc.

A former member of the Communist Party, Lis was considered the No. 2 figure in the underground after Zbigniew Bujak, the elected chairman of Solidarity's Warsaw regional chapter before the military crackdown. Bujak remains at large.

State-run Polish television announced the arrest of Lis on its main evening newscast, but did not say when he was captured.

"The Gdansk security service has arrested Bogdan Lis. He was a member of the national commission of the former Solidarity," the report said.

"In hiding since the imposition of martial law, Lis was a member of the so-called TKK," it said.

Walesa said the arrest of Lis "is a great loss because he was a good activist. Still, we can manage."

"To teach them a lesson, we shall put three men on our commission, instead of one, and by using this tactic, we shall be able to carry on for another 50 years," said Walesa.

The capture of Lis follows intense police action to discourage support for the Solidarity movement's call for a boycott of local elections June 17.

The state-run news media have run more dispatches recently about police successes against the underground, including the reported discovery of an illegal printing plant in Warsaw and the arrest of 15 people linked with it, and detention of seven people accused of putting up boycott posters in Tomaszow Mazowiecki in central Poland.

The reports rarely give the date of arrests or the full names of those captured, and their accuracy is questioned by Solidarity backers who believe the reports are aimed at scaring people away from clandestine union work.

Underground calls for anti-government demonstrations have drawn fewer people in recent months than during the period of martial law, but Solidarity's clandestine radio network and publishing houses are flourishing. Leaflets are usually distributed widely through the bigger cities in Poland.

Union leaders claim that a big turnout for the elections, the first since the creation of Solidarity, would legitimize suppression of the union.

In Poland, as in other Soviet-bloc countries, candidates are carefully screened by Communist authorities and a voter turnout of about 99 percent is expected to be reported.

A lighter turnout could be seen as an indication of dissatisfaction with the government. Solidarity activists say they are setting up their own monitoring system to measure the turnout in cities, but the data will not be publicized for several days after the vote.

Polish authorities have arrested five other former members of the TKK.

In August 1983, a week before the third anniversary of Solidarity's creation, the government announced the arrest of Wladyslaw Hardek, Krakow representative on the TKK, and he appeared on a nationwide television broadcast urging his colleagues to give up.

The underground condemned Hardek, and many of his associates in Krakow and Warsaw claimed he had been arrested and forced to appear on television under threat of a long prison sentence.

University, fort unite in education venture

By LAURIE RANDALL
Government and Business Editor

In an effort to take advantage of expertise available at both institutions, K-State President Duane Acker and Maj. Gen. Neil Creighton, Fort Riley commander, signed a memorandum of understanding Friday.

The memorandum is to provide for continuity of effort and cooperative ventures between K-State and Fort Riley.

"For several years K-State's Division of Continuing Education has offered a number of various courses at the post for the military and civilians," said Charles Hein, director of communications.

"About seven or eight months ago Maj. Gen. Creighton and President Acker got together and decided it would be good to work up a program that would provide educational opportunities developed for civilian and military personnel."

The memorandum creates internships in various curriculums for K-State students at Fort Riley.

"Col. Jack Sobraske and I got together and outlined several areas where Fort Riley could use KSU academically for degrees. We call it 'Old Trooper University' at the post," Hein said. "This would provide internships in biology, veterinary medicine, history and several other areas. It would also provide employment opportunities and practical training for students at K-State."

Hein said he and post officials asked others what courses would be of interest to K-State and Fort Riley.

"We circulated to various departments as to what they would like to offer and Fort Riley did the same thing," Hein said.

Due to the turn-over rate at the post, Acker and Creighton decided to institutionalize the program by signing the agreement.

"With personnel changes, the memorandum would mean that we wouldn't have to start all over again. Even if personnel would leave," Hein said.

Acker and Creighton referred to the signing as a way of developing human resources.

"It is this mission's responsibility to use resources effectively and efficiently. I believe this plan will do so," Acker said.

"It (the memorandum) formalizes the great expansion of what KSU and Fort Riley have done over the past few years," Creighton said.

K-State areas involved in the exchange include the Department of Regional and Community Planning, the Department of Political Science, Farrell Library, Extension Home Economics, Office of Admissions, College of Veterinary Medicine, Division of Biology, Women's Studies Program, anthropology faculty, Office of Student Financial Assistance, Department of Music, College of Arts & Sciences, College of Business Administration and the Division of Continuing Education.

In addition, various military personnel will assist K-State faculty in courses taught in various colleges on campus.

Summer estimates remain at '83 level

Enrollment figures at the close of summer school registration June 4, showed 4,102 students enrolled. This number falls slightly below last year's first-day total of 4,248 said Steve Hall, assistant registrar.

The final enrollment count for last summer was 6,086 students, and Hall said this year's final registration count should be comparable to last summer's.

"There is no way to be real positive about it at this time, but it should be fairly consistent with the previous years," he said.

Summer school students who are not pre-enrolled for the fall semester do not have to wait for late enrollment in the fall. Enrollment for these students will be 1-4:30 p.m. Tuesday through Friday starting Tuesday and running through July 27.

These students should go to the dean's office of their respective colleges Tuesday to pick up enrollment forms and can begin signing up for classes after that at their convenience, Barbara E. Dawes, assistant director of admissions, said.

"This only applies to the first-time student who is currently enrolled in summer school. Those who were enrolled in the spring semester and missed enrollment then cannot enroll at this time," Hall said.

Dawes also said that because there are more new students who are upperclassmen this summer, there may be a problem with availability of classes. This is the last stage of the enrollment process and many classes are already closed, she said.

Although many of the upper-level classes are closed now, Dawes said new students are encouraged to wait until fall, as many of the closed

She said, however, that the problem with waiting for fall drop/add is that students may have to pay a late fee because drop/add occurs after registration is complete.

In the summer, departments may open more fall classes if there appears to be a lot of students trying to get into the closed classes.

Many students go through drop/add in the summer and this also opens up positions in currently closed classes.

Tourism brings income, problems

By NATALIE HAZELTON
Collegian Reporter

Tourism is the largest item of world trade and second in the United States only to retail grocery sales, Linda Richter, assistant professor of political science, said.

Richter has recently received one of 10 worldwide grants to the East-West Center in Hawaii — a federally funded organization designed to promote better East-West relations among nations. The grant will aid her in the completion of a book titled, "The Politics of Tourism."

Richter's research on statewide tourism has shown that tourism is one of the top three sources of income in 46 of 50 states and is the leading form of income in four of five U.S. Territories. However, the tourism trade is primarily made up of small businesses that have little political clout, she said.

Her research also pointed out that tourism supplied 18 percent of all new jobs during the last decade and there has been a 35 percent increase in tourism employment since 1980. It is a key industry for student employment during the summer and the trade hires a disproportionate amount of young people, women and minorities, Richter said.

Her recent findings show the tourism picture abroad is different. According to the Christian Science Monitor, the United Nations predicted that by the year 2000, the nations of the world will spend more on tourism than armaments.

"The (tourism trade) pie is getting bigger and everyone wants his slice," Richter said.

There are real problems when developing nations use tourism to build their country, Richter's work has shown. It takes money to make money, and the money is often taken from other social programs.

Richter said she discovered that much of the control for foreign tourism is in the hands of developers from overseas who take tourism profits back to their native countries.

Even in America, Richter said, too much tourism can cause problems.

The carefully planned Epcot Center in Orlando, Fla., has taxed public services, such as police and traffic control, to the limit.

Natural attractions are more vulnerable to the overuse of tourism. Current problems in national parks are an example. Administrative and political complexities mount while the natural beauty that attracts tourists is endangered by the tourism industry.

Tourism can be destabilizing because it is such a large business, Richter said.

"For too long, academics have been blind to the economic, political and social ramifications," she said. "Developing nations are more aware of the political and social impacts than Americans."

Richter said she hopes her book will help legitimize tourism as an important issue, adding that many people think tourism is a frill and little research has been done on the subject in the United States.

"It (tourism) is a political topic which deserves attention and research," she said.

Lot striping scheduled

Parking lot striping is scheduled to begin Tuesday.

On Tuesday, lots B1 (west of the Veterinary Medicine Complex) and B6 (east of Weber Hall) are scheduled. Wednesday through Friday, lots A15 (Moore Hall), A5 (Justin Hall) and B5 (east of the Veterinary Medicine Complex) are scheduled for striping. Lots A30 (lower Union parking lot), A24 (Lafene Student Health Center), A25 (Seaton Hall) and A10 (Van Zile Hall) are scheduled for June 18. Work will be finalized June 19 and 20 on lots A13 (Derby Nood Center), A11 (West Hall), C3 (Edwards Hall) and D1E (west of West Stadium).

University faculty, staff and students may park in any adjacent parking lots while the parking lot maintenance is being done.

How many college courses teach you how to shoot the rapids? Or rappel a cliff? Or find your way out of a forest with nothing but a map and compass to guide you? At least one does—Army ROTC.

And you could find yourself doing any one of a number of exciting adventure training activities like these in the Army ROTC program.

Activities that develop your stamina. And your self-confidence.

But adventure training isn't the only way you develop. You'll also learn the basics of leadership and management by attending ROTC classes, along with the subjects in your major.

And you'll be excited about two other benefits Army ROTC offers: Financial assistance. Up to $1,000 a year for your last two years of Army ROTC. And the opportunity to graduate with both a degree and a commission in today's Army—including the Army Reserve and Army National Guard.

Folk singer gives concert

Music notes world troubles

By THERESA RUSSELL-LORETZ
Collegian Reporter

Nostalgia and social issues were concurrent themes in Mary Travers' concert Saturday night at Salina's Smoky Hill River Festival.

Travers, a former member of the 1960s folk trio "Peter, Paul and Mary," said she currently does about 50 concerts a year with Peter Yarrow and Paul Stookey; however, a current music publication lists the group as officially together from 1961 to 1970.

'Folk music is basically an optimistic music form. We are not living in optimistic times.'

—Mary Travers

Travers sang a number of the trio's hits such as "Leavin' on a Jet Plane," "Five Hundred Miles" and "Where Have All the Flowers Gone." The songs added to the nostalgic air of the festival and brought enthusiastic cheers from the crowd on the grounds in front of the gazebo in Oakdale Park.

But Travers brought current issues sharply into focus with other songs, such as "El Salvador" written by Stookey. She told her audience that the words to the song, which describes an oppressive, war-torn country, prompted her to travel to El Salvador where she said she found the lyrics to be "unfortunately accurate."

She also sang a song in Hebrew which she dedicated to Andrei Sakharov saying, "May he someday leave."

Sakharov, a 1975 Nobel Prize recipient, along with his wife Yelena, were conducting a hunger strike in protest of the Soviets' refusal to let her seek medical treatment in the West.

Travers said she travelled to the Soviet Union last year where she visited Jews fighting for religious freedom in that country.

"I have never recorded this song," she said in the introduction to the song, "but the KGB has."

"It doesn't work...you can't talk to the people," she told the audience, speaking of the Soviet Union.

In a pre-show interview, Travers said she found the situation in the Soviet Union, "grim."

"Any place where there is totalitarian tyranny, whether it be in El Salvador, whether it be tyranny from the extreme right or the extreme left, it doesn't make much difference to the folks who have to deal with it."

When asked if her audiences today were as receptive to conscience-raising songs as they were in the 1960s, she said it depended on the audience.

"For instance, in a festival situation like this that brings one kind of audience, they're expecting a broad spectrum of entertainment," she said. "If you're doing a solo concert or a Peter, Paul and Mary concert which is billed just as that, then you get a very specific audience that knows what it's coming to see and they're very receptive to songs that deal with social issues."

Travers said her audiences today represent a broad spectrum in age.

"When you have a career that is now spanning some 24 years, there are, literally, people who have grown up on your music," she said.

"You get everything from your peers to 5- and 6-year-olds who learned 'Puff the Magic Dragon' in kindergarten or learned 'Blowin' in the Wind' in camp."

Travers said most of her summer concerts will be with Stookey and Yarrow, but she also does about 40 of her own shows a year.

Travers said she doesn't see Bob Dylan, another folk legend from the 1960s, but she does see other of her contemporaries, such as Joan Baez, at benefits for concerns she said, "we all share." She mentioned human rights and the nuclear freeze as some of those concerns.

Travers would not say who her current "favorite" musical artist is, as she says her tastes run the "gamut." She also said she does not have a favorite author, painter or musician.

"There are art forms that fit your mood," she said. "You may choose a classical record, because it has elegance and structure when you're feeling your life is not too elegant nor too structured at the moment. There are other times when it is very funky or very loose."

Travers also commented on the proliferation of folk music in the '60s and why she felt it's not seen today.

'You get everything from your peers to 5- and 6-year-olds who learned "Puff, the Magic Dragon" in kindergarten.'

—Mary Travers

"Every generation produces its own music," she said. "If it doesn't produce its own music, it becomes nostalgic about some former period. The music reflects something that is going on in society."

Travers said while there is not a folk nostalgia today, she said she felt that certain contemporary pop music is riddled with nostalgia, particularly of the 1940s and '50s.

Her reasons as to why folk music is not part of the current pop music scene has to do with optimism.

"Folk music is basically an optimistic music form," Travers said. "We are not living in optimistic times."

Marquee sayings for bars invite drunkenness

Every business should make good use of advertising. But there are some establishments in Aggieville that go too far in trying to draw customers into their doors.

Some local bars try to entice would-be patrons to partake of their offerings with phrases including "get drunk with us." Several drinking establishments in Aggieville use phrases in their advertising which appear to condone such mental states as drunkenness.

Those who enter bars legally should be mature enough to know when to stop drinking. But it is obvious that age has nothing to do with knowing when one has had enough to drink for the evening. Therefore, it is in bad taste to suggest to patrons that they come into a bar to kill brain cells or get drunk.

Some parents enjoy shopping in Aggieville with their children. The family atmosphere of the shops in Aggieville is ruined by the slogans of the local bars. The obvious lack of taste displayed by bars which advertise in such a manner makes Aggieville unappealing to families and visitors to Manhattan.

Bar owners must know that encouraging people to get drunk is not a safe way to get them home. The impact of the advertising may not be the only reason people get drunk in bars, but it must be considered significant because it condones drinking too much.

This is in direct contrast to the bar owners and beer wholesalers who lobbied against raising the drinking age to 21 in April. They lobbied to the effect that 18-year-olds were mature enough to do everything else an adult could do, including knowing when to stop drinking.

Those who pushed for the drinking age to stay at 18 are, by encouraging young people to drink too much, supporting bad drinking habits. This does not make sense.

Reagan's words show promise for arms talks

During his travels through Europe last week, Ronald Reagan offered encouraging signs of a move toward resumption of nuclear arms control talks with the Soviet Union. Although his words must be taken as with a grain of salt in this election year, a shift away from earlier anti-Soviet rhetoric by Reagan is a step in the right direction toward better relations between the world's superpowers.

The president assured European leaders last week that he is willing to resume arms talks with Soviet leaders. Reagan even said he was open to the idea of stopping or reversing the deployment of Pershing 2 and cruise missiles in Western Europe if talks resumed.

Reagan has made the first move toward an absolutely vital event. It is now up to the Soviets to step forward. Since the Soviet walkout during weapons talks in response to United States missile deployments in Europe, communication between Soviet and American leaders has been non-existent.

With relations at this state, the world is plunged into an unnecessarily dangerous situation. Reports from Moscow indicate that Soviet Premier Konstantin Chernenko has given Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko the real decision-making powers in foreign relations. Despite his hard-lined characterization, Gromyko, a Kremlin veteran, has enough foreign policy experience to realize arms talks would be beneficial for his country, as well as for the United States.

Reagan has let relations with Russia quickly deteriorate during his administration. Perhaps now the president has realized the error of his earlier ways and is sincerely interested in bettering Soviet relations. With the whole world watching, a gesture of willingness to resume arms talks cannot be refused by the Soviets without putting them in a bad light.

There is no more important subject than arms control. Dialogue is necessary to see that solutions to the weapons situation are achieved.

Corporations often show no regard for lives

Harley Copp, retired Ford Motor Company executive: "The attitude was no different in Ford Motor Company about the Pinto than it was in any other Detroit company. It was basically to get the car on the road, at a minimum cost, and to meet only those regulations now in effect."

Mike Wallace, reporter for "60 Minutes": "Even if it was not as safe as you would like it to be."

Copp: "Yes."

From 1971 to 1976, the Ford Motor Company sold 1½ million Pintos, knowing all the while that the car's gas tank posed a serious risk of fuel leakage and explosion. The company made no attempt to redesign the fuel tank, nor warn its customers. The results were tragic.

Within a matter of seconds, a van smashed into the back end of a 1973 Ford Pinto traveling on U.S. 33 in Indiana. On impact, gasoline splashed into the Pinto's passenger compartment and the interior of the car ignited. The two girls trapped inside the Pinto were incinerated, a third girl, partially thrown from the automobile, received burns over 90 percent of her body and died six hours later. Pathologists stated that the three girls would have walked away from the crash, if not for the fire.

This incident led to the now-famous Ford Pinto case which raised, for the first time, the issue of whether a corporation is legally capable of committing homicide through the reckless design of its products. Although Ford was eventually acquitted, the presiding judge refused to admit into evidence damaging crash test results and an internal Ford memo which compared the costs of fixing the fuel tank defect against the damages for potential deaths and burn injuries. By the way, the cost of redesigning the Pinto came out to less than $4 a car.

BRAD RUSSELL
Collegian Columnist

And by no means is Ford Motor Company alone in its callous disregard for human life. Officials at Occidental Chemical Company for years deliberately misled California governmental representatives by withholding evidence that waste dumping at one of its pesticide plants was poisoning local drinking water. After estimating that they had dumped some five tons of pesticides a year into this area, Occidental executives wrote an internal memo which said, "...no outsiders actually know what we do and there has been no government pressure on us."

We today know that leading asbestos firms withheld the health hazards of their products for nearly 30 years to avert expensive production changes. As a result, it is estimated that 300,000 American asbestos workers will die prematurely of cancer.

And who can ever forget the most famous of all corporate criminals — Hooker Chemical Company, which placed its hazardous waste products underneath the site for a new school building. The results were sadly predictable, but unpreventable. Mothers in the area began bearing children with an unusually high incidence of birth defects and the cancer rate of these residents soared.

Across the nation, innocent consumers are buying products that they assume to be perfectly harmless, yet will send some 20 million of them to the hospital with serious injuries and send 30,000 of them to morgue.

In cases such as these, where companies recklessly subject customers and employees to death and injury for the sole purpose of monetary gain, the interests of legal practicality and social justice demand the imposition of criminal charges against such offenders. Such a development may not be far away. According to the "Pepperdine Law Review", "...a court has held a corporation guilty of manslaughter. There is even scholarly support for the concept of corporate murder."

Today, however, it is still not a crime for high-level company officers or directors to consciously conceal a workplace hazard or to intentionally market an unsafe product.

But this should be changed — whether the actor is a corporation or a common street criminal, or whether the murder weapon is a dangerously designed fuel tank or a loaded pistol. The tragic reality of a corporation's "artificial" legal existence is that its real world impact is anything but artificial. The time has come for corporations to live up to the same expectations of respect and responsibility that each of us does in our daily lives. No longer should corporate criminals be allowed to hide behind the corporate mask. In a society governed by justice, we can hardly tolerate companies that place profits before people.

Hall closing brings injustice

Editor,
Re: K-State Department of Housing's decision to close Putnam Hall for the 1984-85 school year.

Recently the Department of Housing decided to close down Putnam Hall effective this fall. "So what?" many of you may comment, but to those of us who have lived in Putnam in the past and looked forward to living in Putnam again this fall there is a great injustice being done. This not only causes an inconvenience — for other than losing a place to live, some will be losing a job — but a loss of a home. Closing Putnam Hall is also a great disservice to the students of K-State. As students and faculty, we pride ourselves on a very good reputation as a University. So why close down a residence hall that has been representative of this reputation and was voted residence hall of the month not once, but twice and beat out larger halls in being chosen residence hall of the year, has been working extensively on hall improvements and working toward better and more activities and programs for the residents? Putnam Hall has proven itself as an outstanding residence hall with outstanding residents time and time again.

Because of all this I question on what basis the Department of Housing decided to close Putnam Hall. I raise such questions such as: It is a well-known fact that the number of people living in the residence halls has decreased, but what sense does it make to close down one of the best halls on campus? Why wait to tell returning residents until after they leave for the summer? Why keep the closing of Putnam Hall so hush-hush? What about the students who will be out of staff/receptionists and food service positions?

Life does deliver some hard blows — some very unexpected — but from these we shape our characters and learn. So what have I learned from this experience? I've learned that the K-State Department of Housing does not have the students' best interest in mind when they make decisions — only their own.

Army collects bill from recruits

YPSILANTI, Mich. — Dorothy Davison had to call in the U.S. Army to collect $1,997 to pay her 65-page May phone bill.

It turns out 44 basic training recruits at Fort Sill, Okla., reached out and touched people in 10 states, charging their calls to the credit card number Davison had given her son Scott when he left for basic training at Fort Sill on March 21.

"Michigan Bell called me and told me they'd canceled our credit card because our long distance calls had exceeded $600," said Davison, of Wayne County's Canton Township, a suburb west of Detroit.

"A lot of the calls were made at the same time. Therefore, they said our son could not be making all of them," she said.

Her son made $82 in calls and was unaware that his fellow soldiers were using his credit card number, she said.

The other recruits heard him read off the credit card number as they stood in line to use pay phones, she said.

"They have 50 phones side-by-side and it's very easy to get somebody's number by overhearing them read it off or by copying it down," said Bill Webster, an executive officer manager with Michigan Bell Telephone Co.

Just before Davison's May 24 graduation from basic training, his mother sat in an office as recruits filed in and paid more than $1,000 for the phone bill.

Army officials sent an additional $600 last week, she said.

Child applies for space adventure

PORT ARANSAS, Texas — Meredith Medley took the National Aeronautics and Space Administration at its word and sent in an application to take a ride on the space shuttle.

"They (had) sent a letter saying they're going to send citizen observers up," she said. Nothing was mentioned about an age requirement, so Meredith decided to apply.

Meredith is 11 years old.

Steve Nesbitt, a public information specialist at the Johnson Space Center in Houston, blithely sent the youngster a standard astronaut recruitment package.

"We told her to call us back when she's 26," he said.

All such inquiries are answered, encouraging youngsters to stay in school and giving general information about space travel, he said.

Nesbitt, who handles publicity for the astronauts, said NASA gets a dozen letters a day from children who want to become astronauts.

He said he got Meredith's letter himself because "her mother knows my mother."

SAN FRANCISCO — Thousands of screaming fans clogged Fisherman's Wharf to catch a glimpse of superstar Michael Jackson, who was honored by the Guinness Museum of World Records with an unveiling of a lifesize statue.

Wearing his trademark white glove, Jackson appeared briefly in the museum Saturday to pose for pictures.

Kansans catch glimpse of history as torch relay runs through state

Marvin Burgett, Topeka, carries the Olympic torch to the south steps of the capitol building. The torch bearers went through Topeka Saturday morning on their trek across the United States to Los Angeles.

The Olympic torch was carried through Topeka shortly after 11 Saturday morning. About 1,200 people gathered to welcome the west-bound 1984 Olympic Torch Relay Team despite the rainy weather conditions.

Gov. John Carlin greeted the relay runner on the south steps of the capitol. Balloons filled the air and the crowd chanted "U.S.A., U.S.A." as the flame lit the next Olympic torch carried in the relay.

The torch runner was escorted to the capitol by a motorcycle, a truck, an official Olympic car and an Olympic bus.

A dance routine was performed by the Girl's Club Drill Team prior to the arrival of the torch while the volunteer fire department clowns distributed balloons to the crowd. The Olympic theme was played by the 42nd Army National Guard and accompanied the relay runner to the capitol stairs.

Ten torches were purchased by Topeka sponsors to be exchanged in the relay. Each Topeka participant ran one kilometer. Relay runners included Larry Brown, head basketball coach at the University of Kansas and Topeka Mayor Doug Wright.

Much of the Olympic torch route has been designated as "Youth Legacy Kilometers" by the Los Angeles Olympic Organizing Committee to help raise money for youth athletic programs. Sponsors pay a fee of $3,000 per kilometer to the LAOOC Torch Relay Foundation. The majority of these fees are returned to the Boys Club, Girls Club and YMCA's to support youth sports programs.

"Returning the Olympics to the United States in 52 years is a significant event," Gov. Carlin said during a pre-ceremony speech. Carlin also said there would be a record number of participants in this year's games despite the recent Soviet-led boycott. Afterwards, the governor was presented with an Olympic Torch telephone.

Casey Converse, a 1976 Olympian and Topeka resident, also attended the Olympic Torch ceremonies.

"This is a great feeling," she said. "This is the closest to the torch that I've ever been, including the swim in Montreal."

Converse swam the 400 meter free-style at the Montreal games and is a swimming instructor in Topeka.

The 1984 Olympic torch relay began in New York City and is due to arrive in Los Angeles on July 28.

LA tops Celts to even series

By The Associated Press

INGLEWOOD, Calif. — Kareem Abdul-Jabbar, despite being troubled again by a migraine headache, scored nine of his 30 points down the stretch as the Los Angeles Lakers forced a seventh game in the National Basketball Association championship series with a 119-108 victory over the Boston Celtics Sunday.

The deciding contest, with the winner capturing the NBA title, will be held Tuesday night at Boston Garden.

Los Angeles held a 96-94 advantage when Abdul-Jabbar started his late run with five straight points. He then started another run of six consecutive points by the Lakers with a turnaround jumper, and with 2:24 left, Michael Cooper's basket made it 109-97.

Abdul-Jabbar, listed as a questionable performer before the game because of his sixth migraine headache since the series started, had six points in the first 2:39 of the second half to help cut Boston's six-point halftime lead to 71-69.

Then, the Celtics appeared to take control as starting guards Johnson and Henderson, playing their best game as a duo in the series, had two baskets each during a 13-4 spurt that gave Boston its largest lead at 84-73 with 4:58 left in the third quarter.

Boston then went nine minutes with only one field goal as Los Angeles ignited a sellout crowd of 17,505 with 10 consecutive points to pull close before the third quarter ended. Worthy scored the first four points as the Lakers hit the first eight points of the fourth period for a 91-87 advantage.

Boston tied it 91-91 with four free throws but a layup by Johnson gave the Lakers a lead they never lost.

Both teams were nearly unstoppable in the early minutes, with 10 lead changes, four ties and 40 points in the first 6:23.

A turnaround bank shot by Kurt Rambis evened the score 20-20, but two jumpers by Henderson gave Boston the biggest margin of the period, 27-22, with 3:15 left. Two free throws by Dennis Johnson made it 29-24 before Johnson rebounded a missed Boston shot and dribbled the length of the court for a three-point play, giving him 11 points in the quarter.

Boston scored first in the second period to lead 35-29, but two layups and an outside basket by Cooper gave the Los Angeles the lead at 41-40 with 8:01 left in the half.

The margin was short-lived, however, as Kevin McHale scored on a fast-break dunk only six seconds later to give Boston the lead again. The Celtics then went on to outscore the Lakers 10-2 for a 50-43 advantage with 5:20 to go.

But Los Angeles hit 16 of the next 24 points, the last four on a three-point play by Abdul-Jabbar and a free throw by Cooper after Bird slammed the ball down for a technical. That put the Lakers ahead 55-44, but Boston scored the last seven points of the quarter to lead 65-59 at halftime.

Track team recruits 7

By VIKKI WATSON
Staff Writer

Four men and three women have signed with the K-State track squad to compete for the 1984-85 season. Steve Miller, head men's and women's track coach, announced this weekend.

Heading the list for the men's squad are Aaron Manning, Blair McMurray and Gary Leeson in the sprint division and Mark Wash, who will compete in the pole vault.

Manning, a Jersey City, N.J. native who attended Hutchinson Community College, will compete in the hurdles events for the Wildcats. Manning's best time of 51.8 in the 400 intermediate hurdles already bettered K-State's fastest time of 56.07 in that event last season. Manning's time of 14.0 in the 110-meter high hurdles is also better than any time posted by K-State this season.

McMurray, who hails from Long Beach, Calif., and attended Long Beach City College, sprinted away with the California state 400-meter dash title while attending Compton High School. McMurray's respective times of 46.1 in the 400-meter dash and 20.5 in the 200-meter dash both beat Wildcat times in those events this year.

Also bringing his 400-meter talent to K-State is Leeson, who was the Canadian National Junior Champion in that event with a best time of 47.5. Leeson comes from Toronto, Canada.

All three sprinters will provide depth for the "Cats' short-distance events, Miller said, who will use all three to combat weak positions in the dash and relay events.

"Leeson, McMurray and Manning will all fill weak spots evident in our sprint events," Miller said. "All three will run the short relays. We expect great things from these sprinters."

Wash, a 1984 McPherson High School graduate who won the state 5A pole vault championship with a 15'7" jump and placed second at state with a 6'9" leap in the high jump, will concentrate on the pole vault for the Wildcats next year.

"Wash will train with Doug Lytle (K-State's all-American pole vaulter) next year and will be the next great vaulter at K-State," Miller said. "He is a high-quality kid, no question about it."

Two sprinters and a high jumper join the women's squad with the signings of Felicia Curry, Melody McNeely and Kendra Stechline.

Curry, a East St. Louis High School sprinter and high jumper, will fill the biggest void in the 100-meter hurdles. Curry brings a time of 14.0 to the event — an event the Wildcats did not field a participant in last season. In the long jump, Curry has jumped 19'2", placing her close to Wildcat Kelly Wenlock's best.

McNeely also will bring her sprinting ability from East St. Louis High, where she placed third in the Illinois 100-meter dash state finals. Her best time of 11.9 puts her second only to K-State's Donna King.

Stechline, of Liberal High School, will provide depth in the Wildcat high jump event, having won the 5A state title with a leap of 5'8". Stechline's best in the event, 5'10", is nearly a national qualifying mark.

"She (Stechline) will be a great backup to Rita Graves," Miller said. "I feel Kendra is as far along as Rita was in high school and she should be able to contribute immediately."

California blanks Kansas City behind Zahn

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, — The lingering hex of a groin injury and hot humid weather didn't bother Geoff Zahn Sunday.

The California Angels' left-hander went the distance against the Kansas City Royals, scattering six hits and posting a 2-0 shutout for his second straight victory since he missed two starts with the injury.

"I've been fortunate because it wasn't really 100 percent when I came back," Zahn said. "I've got to keep working, I need endurance."

Zahn, 7-3, winning his second straight game after missing two starts because of a groin injury, has allowed only one earned run in his last 26 innings.

Mike Brown and Brian Downing led the California offense with run-scoring singles.

Kansas City rookie Mark Gubicza, 3-5, took the loss despite giving up only five hits in eight innings.

River festival flows despite showers

By LYNN TALPERS
Collegian Reporter

Though somewhat hampered by an unexpected cloudburst on Saturday, the Smoky Hill River Festival attracted approximately 70,000 people to Salina's Oakdale Park throughout the weekend.

The festival, which combined music, dance and art, attracted 130 artists and craftsmen, said Martha Rae, director of the Salina Arts Commission.

According to June Ann Davenport, a commission member, what started out as something informal, ballooned into something much bigger.

"It started in 1976 as a street fair, but everybody liked it (the festival) so much that it went on," she said.

Festival preparations began in August 1983 with approximately 1,000 applications being sent to craftsmen throughout the country, Davenport said. After that, she said, a jury reviewed the applicants, based on slides of their work.

Belinda Riley, a sculptor from Kansas City, Mo., said she attends about 40 shows a year across the country. Working nine hours in her studio daily, Riley said she sells ceramic animals full time.

"It isn't really work, it's more like play," she said.

Food was also a part of the festival as local organizations and businesses ran a number of booths. Funnel cakes, hamburgers and various other foods were served.

Areas were designated for various acts, including mimes, clowns, jugglers, puppeteers and musicians who performed periodically. The Dixie Six appeared on a vintage fire engine playing jazz.

Two stages were used for stationary entertainment. Steel Away, a reggae band using steel drums, roved the park ground and performed on stage.

Outcaste, an acting group from Minneapolis, Minn., presented Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," plus monologues and a number of brief acting scenes.

Patricia Traxler, a poet, organized a "sky poem." Participants wrote single lines of poetry which were attached to balloons and released on Saturday afternoon.

"Red Line to the Sky" was an airborne artwork created by Tal Streeter from New York. A 1,250-foot tube of red polyethylene, inflated with helium and controlled by Streeter and two assistants, floated above a nearby running track.

Streeter said he has constructed similar exhibits in Kentucky and Germany. One of the assistants said this was the longest (structure) so far.

Mary Travers, formerly of the folk trio, Peter, Paul and Mary, performed on Saturday night, playing many of the group's hits, plus a number of original songs. Other top name performers included the Woody Herman Band, which consists of some of the country's top jazz performers, and David Clayton Thomas from the group Blood, Sweat and Tears.

Merit and Purchase awards were presented to artists by the Salina Arts Commission. Purchase awards were presented when the Commission bought one of the craftsman's work for the city's art collection. Merit awards were monetary prizes in recognition of talent.

Batmobile rides again in auction

By The Associated Press

HIGHLAND PARK, Ill. — It doesn't take a Riddler to ask what kind of Joker would pay $64,000 for the original Batmobile.

The bat-finned car made famous in the 1960s Batman television series was among 50 vehicles sold at auction Sunday by Chicago-area businessman J.J. Born.

The original Batmobile, driven by Batman with his sidekick Robin as they battled bad guys, was purchased by George F. Helm of Bristol, Va., for $64,000, said auction spokesman Chris Ruys.

Helm also paid $10,000 for the Batcycle, another vehicle used on the show, Ruys said.

The seven-hour auction, held at the Chicago Historical Antique Automobile Museum in Highland Park, brought in nearly $1 million, he said.

The highest pricetag of the day was $96,000 for a 1929 yellow Packard that belonged to Chicago Mayor "Big" Bill Thompson, who ran the city during its Prohibition and gangster heyday. The buyer of Thompson's Packard was not identified, Ruys said.

Public school systems to teach importance of agriculture in world

By TIM CARPENTER
Collegian Reporter

In Kansas, agriculture is king. However, a group of Kansas agriculturists and educators is concerned that some members of the king's court are forgetting the importance of agriculture to the state, nation and the world.

To help educate the public, the Kansas Foundation for Agriculture in the Classroom is developing educational materials for use in the Kansas public school system.

Monday, a group of 10 Kansans arrived on the K-State campus to begin developing the core curriculum for the Agriculture in the Classroom Program.

Clayton Stultz, of the Kansas Department of Education, is one of the 21 Foundation members. "The program is not a how-to-farm program, but a means of re-establishing enthusiasm and pride in Kansas agriculture," he said.

"With only 3 percent of the population actively farming, many people don't understand the place of agriculture in the economy.

"For example, when growing crops, pesticides are used. The production of food depends upon this process. Yet, the effects of pesticides on the environment are not all positive. There must be trade-offs. People want a wide variety of food items, but if they are to get these products they must give and take," Stultz said.

The organizers of the non-profit organization say they believe that by incorporating agriculture into the study of geography, politics, economics and other disciplines, the Kansas youth may better understand the nature and problems of the business.

The effort to put agriculture back in the classroom began in summer 1982 with a meeting between state agricultural and educational leaders and the United States Department of Agriculture. A 21-member task force then studied the USDA's proposal for 10 months. In July 1983, with the blessing of the task force, the Kansas Foundation was formed and the wheels of the program officially put in motion.

"There is strong support for the program. Support comes not only from agricultural, educational and legislative bodies, but from individual people. It's amazing to see it; we get calls from every part of the state," Stultz said.

The organization is divided into curriculum, materials and distribution committees.

The curriculum committee examines existing texts and materials in use by the public schools in kindergarten through 12th grades. This committee is responsible for identifying deficient areas in the curriculum.

Following the recommendations of the curriculum committee, the materials committee develops new teaching aides to supplement the curriculum. A variety of materials can be developed, including films, video tapes, books, slide presentations, lesson plans and class projects.

The distribution committee is responsible for getting the materials into the hands of instructors and administrators.

"The group (on campus) is responsible for creating a core curriculum so that the different school districts can remain consistent in their instruction of the educational materials," said Randy Tosh, a member of the Kansas Foundation and an executive assistant with the Kansas Co-op Council.

'With only 3 percent of the population actively farming, many people don't understand the place of agriculture in the economy.'

"Individuals with a teaching background were hired because who better than a teacher can take a unit of study on the red meat industry and incorporate it into a social science program," Tosh said.

The group will devote three weeks to the writing of a curriculum that centers on seven broad concept areas. They are economics, historical and geographic significance of agriculture, agriculture technology, international trade and information about careers in agriculture and various policy issues.

The estimated cost of the program is $50,000 a year. A fund-raising drive has been actively pursued for almost two months. Donations have come from Kansas Farm Credit Banks, the Kansas Farm Bureau and private individuals.

"During the 1983 session of the Kansas Legislature we made a presentation to the joint agriculture committee describing our progress and goals," Tosh said.

"Since the presentation, interest in the program has grown, so the legislature gave us a $25,000 educational research grant," he said.

The grant must be matched dollar-for-dollar by private funds before it can be made available. Currently, one-half the matching funds have been secured.

The Foundation is approaching various trade associations in Kansas, hoping to acquire additional funding.

Supreme Court eases 70-year-old rule

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court on Monday relaxed for the first time its 70-year-old rule banning illegally obtained evidence from criminal trials.

The justices ruled that illegally seized evidence may be admissible if police "inevitably" would have discovered it anyway.

The ruling in a 16-year-old Iowa murder case merely placed the court's stamp of approval on a practice that most state and federal appeals courts have been using for years.

Still ahead, however, is a far more important Supreme Court test of the "exclusionary rule," a device aimed at deterring unlawful police conduct.

The justices are expected to decide sometime by July — perhaps as early as Tuesday — whether there should be an exception for evidence that is "illegal" due only to a technical mistake by authorities.

The issue has proved to be one of the most controversial and hotly debated in law enforcement. Led by Chief Justice Warren E. Burger, conservatives have long denounced inflexible adherence to the rule, saying it unduly punishes society and coddles criminals.

Burger wrote for the court Monday as it reinstated, 7-2, the murder conviction of Robert Anthony Williams in the 1968 killing of Pamela Powers.

A federal appeals court had thrown out Williams' conviction after ruling that police used illegal tactics in persuading him to lead them to the 10-year-old girl's body.

"If the prosecution can establish by a preponderance of the evidence that the information ultimately or inevitably would have been discovered by lawful means...then the deterrence rationale has so little basis that the evidence should be received," Burger said in overturning the appeals court ruling.

The Supreme Court first fashioned the exclusionary rule in 1914 as a procedural matter for federal courts. It said evidence obtained by lawless actions, such as a warrantless search by federal agents, could not be used in federal prosecutions.

Williams refused to give interviews from the Iowa State Penitentiary at Fort Madison.

Barry Lynn of the American Civil Liberties Union in Washington said, "Any decision that permits unlawfully obtained evidence to be used in a criminal trial is really an indication to law enforcement officials around the country not to know what the law is and not to be careful in protecting the rights of all Americans."

In other matters Monday, the court:

—Ruled unanimously in a California case that law enforcement agencies may use the results of alcohol breath tests as evidence against accused drunken drivers even when the breath samples are not preserved.

—Let stand a ruling of a federal judge in Mississippi that the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission may not enforce a law requiring equal pay for men and women in the same jobs.

An EEOC lawyer said the commission was confident the judge's ruling would be overturned by a federal appeals court, and that the commission intended to continue to enforce the law at least in the 49 other states.

—Reinstated a 21-year prison sentence of a convicted Arkansas killer by ruling unanimously that prosecutors are free to pull back an offered plea-bargain agreement any time before a defendant pleads guilty.

Union raises prices as enrollment drops

Students are paying more for their lunch at the Union due to a 4½ percent labor wage increase in January.

"This is really the first time in 2½ years that we've had a general increase," said Walt Smith, Union director. "We try to hold the prices throughout the year to June or August before raising them."

Smith said the majority of funding for the Union comes from student fees, with an additional $40,000 per year labeled "for University use" from the general University budget.

Decreased enrollment has been the main reason for the increase in prices, Smith said. Last year's decrease in enrollment resulted in $12,000 and $14,000 less income for the Union than previous years. The projected enrollment for next year shows another decrease which means there would be about the same $12,000 to $14,000 drop in income for the Union — making a total decrease of $24,000 to $28,000 for the 1984-85 school year.

Malley Sisson, Union food services director, said the U.S.D.A. predicts a 6 to 8 percent increase in food prices next year.

"We've planned ahead for this (food price increase)," Sisson said. "We're proud of the fact that K-State students pay less at our Union than at other state schools in Kansas."

Food plan prices, which are available to students through the Union will also increase, Sisson said. The increase is projected to be similar to other food increases at the Union.

"We'll be working on those in the next couple of weeks," she said. "Our (food services) goal is to serve popular nutritious foods to students, at the lowest possible costs, as quickly as possible."

Smith said the University Bookstore's prices are continually increased and that the concessions' prices increase also according to rising product costs.

Also, a minor factor in increasing Union prices is due to a 12 percent rise in the Union utilities bill. The Union is helping to curb these high utility bills by purchasing a new energy management system to help reduce the utility costs, Smith said.

"This will not have any effect on student fees," he said. "The money will come directly out of the Union's budget."

Smith said the cost of the new system is $110,000 and will be able to pay for itself — from energy savings — in three years. He also said the Union staff reviews the prices every year to decide what increases are necessary.

Elderhostel offers academic challenge

Senior citizens bridge education gap

By LISA WILSON
Collegian Reporter

Contrary to the elderly stereotype, Elderhostel — a program designed to give older people intellectual stimulation and physical activity in an academic setting — has proven that the elderly have the ability and desire to learn and enjoy academic life.

"If you don't keep studying and learning, your mental capacity may have a tendency to deteriorate a little faster than if you use it regularly," said Theodore Jacobs, Elderhostel participant.

Elderhostel consists of a network of colleges, universities and other educational institutions that annually offer one week of low-cost, residential and academic programs for older people.

Last week, 38 Elderhostel participants stayed in Moore Hall on campus and took part in the local program.

In the Elderhostel program, there are no educational prerequisites, reading assignments or tests.

"The only requirement is the desire to learn and share with others," Pam Evans, K-State's Elderhostel coordinator, said.

"The program is based on the idea that retirement doesn't mean withdrawal," Evans said. "95 percent of the people are very sharp and very active with church and family. They have an intense desire to learn and that is why they are here."

"They experience academic life as it really is, not an overview from some luxurious plateau," she added.

Courses offered through Elderhostel were specifically designed for the participants and require no previous knowledge of the subjects.

Evans said the major attraction during the K-State Elderhostel program was the computer course.

"They all had a chance to work on computers doing actual word processing and some modified programs," she said. "They say, 'I want to know what my grandkids are doing.'"

Merla Oppy, word processing instructor, said she was surprised at the intelligence and attentiveness of the Elderhostel participants.

"These people are not special. They have just never let their minds go idle," Oppy said.

Participants were required to attend at least one class per day, but most attended all three.

"We have had 98 percent attendance in everything we planned. This shows their desire to learn," Evans said.

Other events during the week-long program included two "Swannie's runs" to Swanson's Bakery and an all-day field trip examining fossil formations with Charles Walters, professor of geology, as their tour guide.

"My favorite event was when we went out in the country and picked up sea shells along the road," said

Porter Brock, Elderhostel participant, said.

"At the top of the Flint Hills near Herrington, there is an abundant outcrop of shale that contains marine fossils which are 250 million years old and very well preserved," Walters said.

"I thought what we had (scheduled) was enough but even when they (the participants) were exhausted they just kept going," Evans said.

Elderhostel attracts a diversified group of people. Some have degrees from colleges, while others have little formal education, Evans said.

"I was surprised to see how well they mixed together. They were very, very nice and open people," Oppy said.

Jake Smaltz, professor of industrial engineering, said he rarely had to repeat instructions to the Elderhostel participants.

"If we could just get that enthusiasm in our younger students, we would have some really good students," Smaltz said. "It certainly is an inspiration to the rest of us to be around people like that."

The admiration is mutual among the Elderhostel participants.

"The instructors are all so enthusiastic, so well-informed and patient with all our questions, that it has really been a pleasure to work with them," Dorothy Timma, Elderhostel participant, said.

There are 7,000 Elderhostel programs nationwide including eight in Kansas.

"People come from all over. We (at K-State) have had people from Texas and California, as well as from the regional area," Evans said.

Many of the local Elderhostel participants are K-State graduates.

"They wanted to find out what was going on now and see how things have changed," said Evans.

Don Timma, a 1944 K-State graduate, reminisced about being in the first chemistry class to start an academic career in Willard Hall.

"In the summertime the laboratories would get very hot and we would take a short intermission and go to the dairy bar in the rear part of Waters (Hall) and get milk shakes in one-quart quantities," he said. "All the chemists (from that time) remember going to the dairy bar. It had quite an impression on them. Now, I see the dairy bar (in Call Hall) is so far removed from the chemistry department. I'm kind of surprised."

Margaret Thompson, also a 1944 K-State graduate, remembered the dime dances at Anderson Hall where she met her husband 44 years ago.

"We all went and paid our dime, but I had to be in by 9 p.m. because of the curfew at the dorm (Van Zile Hall — the only residence hall on campus at that time)," she said.

Thompson said she paid exactly $900 to attend K-State for four years.

"My, how the prices have gone up. We used to buy an ice cream cone at Waters (Hall) for 5 cents," she said.

Students lose with shorter summer sessions

There seem to be only a few advantages of attending a short session during summer school, and it would seem, at least for the serious minded student, those advantages favor the instructor teaching the course.

One must examine how the student benefits from attending class for three hours each day in three- or four-week sessions. A student, by attending summer school, is already receiving less knowledge and practical instruction than he or she would otherwise receive during the regular semester. That time period is further reduced with a shorter instruction period. The student is clearly missing out there.

Having a mass of knowledge literally bombarded at a student in long periods, even with a short break during the middle of class period, at best can add only to a simple understanding of a subject. It can't possibly leave much room for the type of comprehension and application that would otherwise be received when knowledge is taught in smaller doses and allowed time to sink in. Without that time for comprehension the student is forced to be tested on a mountain of information when only given time to study and understand a small portion of that knowledge.

The clear losers are the students who wish to take more than three hours during summer school, but find they are forced to decide between a class lasting an hour and 10 minutes which lasts eight weeks and another course lasting 2½ hours for three or four weeks. And for what gain? Being able to receive credits in a shorter period of time and having a little bit more recreation for the summer? Maybe, but for the student who values the knowledge he receives from the University, especially after paying almost $40 a credit hour, the student should be able to receive an education. Stretching classes throughout the day would seem to be more valuable than crowding them together in the morning and early afternoon.

The assigned work in these classes falls to the extreme when the students find they have just been assigned to read up to a whole book for the next day's discussion. Lectures lasting that long of time span every day would also seem to become a slight bit tedious.

With the cost of tuition, students don't deserve to be lost in the tracks of instructors fighting to get all the information out in a reduced amount of time. Especially if the class has been shortened for the instructor's convenience. Students pay for an education, they should receive one. The question is whether their time should be hurried through the university system the way their tuition is.

Nations should remove politics from Games

Last weekend, the Olympic torch passed through Kansas on its way to Los Angeles, the site of the 1984 Games.

Usually, an event such as this would bring nothing but happiness and a sense of awe for a possible once-in-a-lifetime occurrence. But in 1984, a different feeling surfaces as the flames symbolizing sportsmanship and the spirit of the Olympics have once again been nearly extinguished by the specter of politics.

The last Games to be unaffected by politics was in Tokyo in 1964. That means for the past 20 years, over the course of five Olympic Games, a political protest, boycott or act of terrorism has marred the world spectacle. This year's Soviet-led boycott of the Summer Olympics is only the latest in the series of Olympic political protests.

In 1968, a protest over black oppression by American athletes John Carlos and Tommie Smith opened the rash of political protest in the Olympics. As the National Anthem played in the background in Mexico City, celebrating victory by Americans in a sporting event, two raised and clenched black-gloved fists illustrated to the world the concept of the Olympics as a political forum.

Since then, politics have proliferated in Olympic contests. In 1972, an act of horrible terrorism against members of the Israeli Olympic team by an Arab-based fringe element put a bloody mark on the games in Munich. As a stunned world watched, the Olympic flag and the flags of competing nations at the Games were lowered to half-staff to mourn the loss of 11 athletes who had strived to become part of this so-called peaceful competition, only to be defeated, not by fellow competitors, but by bullets from a terrorist attack.

A boycott by African nations against participation by South Africa in world sporting events in 1976, the 55 nation U.S.-led boycott in 1980 and now the Soviet-led boycott in 1984 have followed. While Games before, notably in Berlin in 1936, have attempted to use the Olympics as a sounding board for political ideas, it now seems the Games have been overcome by disagreements that overshadow the concept of the gathering itself.

The world needs a peaceful way for people of many nations to gather in an informal setting. Too many elements seem to be pulling the world away from peaceful coexistence instead of working toward that end. The Olympics need to be pulled out of its fatal political tailspin before the human race moves one step closer to hopeless misunderstanding.

'The Natural' captures flavor of baseball past

WASHINGTON — Just once I hit a home run. It wasn't a real home run. For that you need a ballpark or a stadium and some sort of fence. This was an empty lot home run, but it was a good shot anyway. I swung and knew the instant the bat hit the ball that it was gone. It was the feel of the thing, the sensation of it. When I looked up, the ball was sailing over the lot and into the street. This was something for me since I always closed my eyes when I swung the bat. It's hard to hit home run that way.

I don't think many women know that feeling — at least not a lot of the women of my generation. Many don't know, either, what it feels like to see the ball go swish in basketball or, in boxing, land an uppercut with such precision that your opponent has no choice but to crumple. I know those feelings. Most men know those feelings. Most women don't.

That's why I think there will be great arguments in this country about the movie, "The Natural." Women will want to see it because it stars Robert Redford who plays a baseball player — an over-age one at that. It is, I think, his best performance yet, but he is just a supporting actor as far as I'm concerned. The star of the movie is the game of baseball.

I would be lying if I said I was still a fan. In my youth, an evil man named Walter O'Malley moved the Brooklyn Dodgers to Los Angeles and I have been a baseball widow ever since. Like some spinster school teacher who is said to remain true to a lover lost in the war, I still pine for the Dodgers. I miss the park, Ebbets Field, the neighborhood it was in, Flatbush, and the taste of a hot dog as it was seasoned by the many hands that passed it along. My father took me to the games and there have been glorious days since, but none as glorious as sitting next to my dad, eating a hot dog, drinking an otherwise taboo Coke and watching Jackie Robinson dance off third and feint toward home.

"The Natural" is about that sort of game. It is about the game of baseball before free agents and lawyers who negotiate on behalf of fleeing creditors, before players smoked dope and had affairs with the wives of teammates — before Howard Cosell and his incessant flow of malapropisms made baseball sound like a real-estate closing. I had a most privileged youth. I listened to Vince Scully, Mel Allen and Red Barber. You can not do better than that.

On Friday mornings I listen to Barber on National Public Radio from his retirement home in Tallahassee. Often he talks about nothing, and that's just fine with me. It's the voice that counts. Once, during a space shot, NPR patched him in with Chuck Yeager and I sat down while dressing, one sock on and the other sort of dangling, listening as two of the great American voices chatted with each other. I can't recall anything they said. I cannot, however, forget the moment.

There is something about "The Natural" that captures all of that. There is plenty wrong with the film — the confusing directing, for instance. But it is inescapably about baseball, old-time, virtually mythological baseball at that, and so it cannot go wrong. My wife loved it, but other women who have seen it came away thinking it was just OK.

They are entitled to their opinion. But if they've never hit a home run, never dreamed of playing the majors and being "a natural," what can they know?

As I grow older, baseball sort of pulls me back. I find myself going to Baltimore now, where the nearest major league team is, and I like it very much. The stadium is small and antiquated, which is wonderful, and it's situated in a residential neighborhood. Like the old Dodgers, the Orioles complain about their park. I have heard that one before and so cannot fully commit. I will not have my heart broken again.

I have always liked Robert Redford, but never envied him. I know he is fabulously rich and I can see he is fabulously good-looking — nice, but no cause for jealousy. But in "The Natural," something happens that changes all that. Redford gets his picture on a baseball card.

Sweet, sweet heaven.

Lakers hope to conquer jinx; Celts look for history repeat

By The Associated Press

BOSTON — Six times the Boston Celtics have gone to the seventh game of a National Basketball Association Championship Series and six times they've won. Four times the Los Angeles Lakers have gone to the seventh game and four times they've lost.

If history repeats itself on Tuesday night at Boston Garden, the Celtics will earn an unprecedented 15th NBA title. The Lakers, losers to Boston in the finals in each of their seven previous meetings, are seeking their ninth championship, second only to the Celtics.

"We'll be back in Boston on Tuesday with all those banners hanging from the rafters waving in our faces," Lakers Coach Pat Riley said after his team evened the best-of-seven series 3-3 with a 119-108 victory Sunday. "Now we'll really see who is the best team."

The Celtics, 10-1 at Boston Garden in the playoffs, have the apparent advantage of playing at home for the 9 p.m. EDT game. But after six games of ups and downs for both teams, they aren't ordering any championship rings yet.

And the Lakers may have an added problem: Earvin "Magic"

Johnson's stiff knee. The knee stiffened and hampered his movement in the second half of Sunday's sixth game.

"It was botherin' me," he said. "Ever since I had surgery on it (three years ago), I've had tendinitis and sometimes it just kills me."

"Can't worry about it now," he said. "Just gotta gut it out."

Not surprisingly, the Celtics are expecting a tough, physical game.

"I expect a very hard-fought game," Boston Coach K.C. Jones said. "Both teams will be primed and ready. It will be a bang-up, knock-down game."

"By no means is it a gimme," Celtics guard Danny Ainge said. "LA's a great team and we're going to have to play well to win it."

"We feel confident that we can go into Boston and win," said Johnson, who had 21 points and 10 assists Sunday, giving him 80 assists in the series, seven more than the previous record of 73 set by Walt Frazier of New York in 1970.

"Whoever controls the tempo of the game and plays it their way will win," Johnson added. "The Celtics do have the advantage because they're at home. It's up to us to take that advantage away."

When the Celtics won the fifth game of the series by 18 points on Friday night, temperatures in the 90s in Boston Garden — which has no air conditioning — slowed the Los Angeles fast-break to a standstill. Although forecasters expect the New England heat wave to subside before Tuesday night's game, the Lakers said they would be ready for anything.

"I don't care if it's raining, we'll be there ready to play," said Michael Cooper, who scored 23 points in Game 6. "This game is so up in the air it could be played in the Bahamas."

"We hired 5,000 people to pray for rain," Riley said, adding that his team would take special minerals and nutrients to combat the heat.

Riley also said jokingly that he might order a migraine for 37-year-old center Kareem Abdul-Jabbar after he played brilliantly for the second time in the series after waking up with a severe headache and nausea on game day. In Game 1, he had 32 points in a Los Angeles victory and on Sunday he had 30 points.

His teammates also said he inspired them with a pregame talk.

"He told us that the will to win comes from within," forward James Worthy said.

Fable lacks serious plot

'Streets' scenes show gusto

By GARY JOHNSON
Contributing Writer

From the very beginning of "Streets of Fire," director/writer Walter Hill makes it clear that the film is a "rock and roll fable." Every moment is delivered with a corniness that is derived from comic books. This is filtered through a film noir film style and a rock'n'roll sensibility that makes the material look strangely familiar and yet otherworldly at the same time. We have seen much of this film before, but never have these scenes of kissing in the rain, tough-guy posturing and high-speed pursuit been dealt out with such gusto.

The story is incredibly simple — so simple that many people may find the plot too thin for their tastes — but within the comic book world created by Hill, plot is not nearly as important as the operatic creation of scenes we fondly remember from movies we loved when we were teens. As Hill wrote on the film soundtrack album's liner notes, the movie is "a rock'n'roll fable where the Leader of the Pack steals the Queen of the Hop and Soldier Boy comes home to do something about it."

The Queen of the Hop is Ellen Aim — a street-wise rock star who is giving a benefit performance in a city where the streets are always coated with an oily mist that reflects the bright reds and greens of storefront neon lights. It's a world caught in a '50s time warp — the girls wearing knee-length dresses and the boys sporting vintage greaser hair styles.

In the middle of her performance, Ellen is abducted by a leather-jacketed motorcycle gang who storm the stage. The leader throws her over his shoulder cave man style and flees to the street while his cohorts punch out the stunned audience who can do little more than shout out vintagely corny dialogue, such as "Hey, you guys shouldn't be doing this!", before being decked by right up-percuss. And who should return to town to set matters straight but Ellen's old flame, Tom Cody.

Accompanied by Ellen's wimpy manager and a hard-as-nails woman who always packs a gun, Cody ventures into the heart of the Bombers' territory. But freeing Ellen is only the start of his problems. He must then protect himself against the Bombers once they feel their honor was injured by his easy defeat of them.

Time is compressed in "Streets of Fire" until each camera shot is like a panel in a comic strip. In scenes where most filmmakers would have lingered over the action, "Streets of Fire" pushes forward at breakneck speed. There is not a serious moment in the film. Each bit of dialogue and every second of acting is imbued with the comic book motif.

The screenplay proves faulty in the film's latter half when Hill is unable to provide a climactic scene that can rival, in terms of tension, Ellen's rescue. The showdown between Cody and the Bombers' leader is filmed with little of the imagination found in the film's earlier scenes. Hill is still able to supply, though, an atmosphere that permeates the action. This keeps the film interesting even when the tension level is reduced.

Michael Pare's performance as Tom Cody is nothing remarkable. He is capable of giving the role a comic book corniness, but little more. Walter Hill, though, uses every scene with Pare to its fullest advantage, knowing just when to cut away or just how to light his face.

Hill is able to put Diane Lane as Ellen Aim on the screen with the same savvy. Initially, Hill didn't want Lane for the role, thinking she was too pretty to portray an experienced rock'n'roll star. If Hill had been making a realistic movie this would have been true, but within the format of the mock-epic, her classically beautiful looks make a credible heroine for the film's operatic structure. When she assuages the microphone and belts out a ballad, Hill knows just where to place the camera to catch her body as she writhes across the stage.

Some of the musical numbers seem tacked onto the movie — almost like music videos — but for the most part the songs are well integrated with Hill's plot. The two songs that provide the film's finale are especially well-choreographed and filmed, providing each character with a majestic exit.

Brett leads in AL All-Star voting

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Kansas City third baseman George Brett, who has missed more than half the season because of a wrist injury, is the leading vote-getter overall, while three members of the high-flying Detroit Tigers are in line for starting American League All-Star spots in the first weekly report on voting released Monday.

Brett, hitting .313 in 22 games, has gotten 333,071 votes in balloting by fans. Brett, elected to eight straight starting appearances, holds a comfortable lead over runner-up Doug DeCinces of California, who has received 211,818 votes.

Catcher Lance Parrish, second baseman Lou Whitaker and center fielder Chet Lemon of the Tigers are all getting considerable support.

Parrish, with 288,963 votes, leads Chicago's Carlton Fisk, who has 195,922, while Whitaker's 241,484 leads Damaso Garcia of Toronto, who has 147,018. Lemon, with 213,076, is third in voting for the three outfield spots.

Apartment construction concerns neighbors

By KRISTI NELSON
Collegian Reporter

New apartments are being built for student occupancy, and permanent Manhattan residents are concerned about what those buildings will do to their neighborhoods.

The Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board met recently to discuss the proposed housing plan and zoning recommendations for multi-unit apartment buildings in the residential area east of the K-State campus and north of Poyntz Avenue.

Manhattan Chief Planner Larry Hulse said the existing residential plan was made in 1968 and needed updating.

Hulse said the planning board is working on an updated plan and, with input from the community, will formulate goals and objectives for future development in these areas.

The area north of Poyntz Avenue and east of campus is now zoned R-3 multi-family residential, providing for anything from single family homes to multi-unit apartment buildings.

The city proposal update at the June 4 meeting called for:

— A strip of high-density development bordering the east sides of the K-State campus and Aggieville, allowing a minimum of four units per structure on a standard city lot.

— A moderate-density zoning area extending on east roughly two to four blocks and allowing one to four units per structure.

— A low-density area for single family homes and duplexes that would border the moderate-density area and extend east to the commercial zoning strip along Third Street.

"The proposal made by the city could be very destructive to the older city of Manhattan," Michael O'Neil, president of the Older Manhattan Neighborhoods Association, said.

"R-3 zoning would allow a duplex, at most, in a 50-foot lot or a fourplex in two lots. The proposal allows a fourplex in a 50-foot lot. This could create an economic incentive to destroy older homes and build fourplexes," O'Neil said.

"With this kind of change, older Manhattan would not be thought of as older Manhattan, and apartment buildings would begin to look like army barracks," he said.

OMNA has a membership of approximately 200 residents. O'Neil said the group's main concern is to preserve the older districts and retain a sense of community in these neighborhoods. He said OMNA supports a Downtown Redevelopment Advisory Board proposal for Planned-Unit Developments. This would be a special zone, attempting to provide greater flexibility and control.

The PUD plan would require the developer to prepare a detailed plan of the building and site. The planning board would have to approve the PUD proposal before construction could begin.

Presently, there is no zone in the city where PUD is required.

Stormy Kennedy, a member of the Concerned East Side Neighborhood Association, said "we are not trying to eliminate the student element, but our goal is to control density numbers. We want to retain the residential flavor of our community."

O'Neil said OMNA is not opposed to apartments, and people of all types are encouraged to share the community, including students, but stacks of apartments would change the whole neighborhood and lessen its desirability.

Dr. and Mrs. B.W. Lafene live next door to a newly constructed apartment complex on the 1800 block of Anderson Avenue near campus.

Dr. Lafene said the Anderson Place apartments are composed of two 18-unit buildings that have changed his lifestyle completely.

"I feel like I am living in a prison as a result of the construction of the new apartments," he said.

The three-story apartment buildings are located eight feet from the Lafene property line in compliance to city ordinance. The air conditioning units, however, are located between the eight-foot distance and the building.

Mrs. Lafene said "six air conditioners face our bedroom window, which will cause noise and heat pollution, and the tall buildings so close to our home shut off the sun and the breezes."

The Lafenes are also concerned about the sewer system which is connected to the new complex. Mrs. Lafene said they could find no record of the time when the sewer line was first installed and they are afraid the old 8-inch main may be overloaded and worn out.

"I am hurt by the nearness of the apartments and the disregard of the builders," Dr. Lafene said. He said the builders plowed into his property line and plantings while building the complex, leaving nails and staples all around his driveway and yard.

The Lafenes said the rain run-off from apartment roofs have eroded the yard and garden, and their landscaped private back yard and garden are no longer so private.

The couple said when they moved into their home 37 years ago, the entire block was a residential area. At that time, Anderson Avenue had two lanes and large 70-foot elms lined the street.

Now the Lafenes are the only permanent residents on the north side of the street. Mrs. Lafene said she has always been a strong booster for Manhattan, but not any longer.

"I enjoy students and I am a college booster, but this is an overload," she said.

"What can we do at our age? We may have to move out of our home," Dr. Lafene said.

Although the Lafenes don't live in the area being considered in the plan at this time, the entire city will be reviewed for zoning at a later time.

Ron Bowman of Bowman Construction Co., is a part owner and developer of apartment complexes in Manhattan, including the Anderson Place apartments. His investments include the completion of 96 apartments last year, 204 this year and an anticipated 96 next year.

Bowman said he has not had a problem filling the apartments because the projects are on a large scale, with effective advertising and promotion, offering benefits like tennis courts and swimming pools.

"I am beginning to saturate the apartment market with my own business ventures and building, and I don't anticipate building any more student housing until there is an increase in student enrollment," he said.

Bowman said most of his apartment buildings are designed differently, each to fit into a particular site.

"We take a lot of time on the drawing board with the consideration for the neighborhood," he said.

Bowman's reaction to the OMNA proposal was to point out the benefits of a new apartment building with adequate parking, compared to an older home converted into a number of jumbled apartments with little to no additional parking for added residents.

City planners, residents and developers agree that their goal is "keeping a high-grade neighborhood to live in," Hulse said. The next meeting of the Manhattan Urban Area Planning Board will be July 16. Hulse anticipates the proposal will be up for consideration at a public hearing sometime next fall.

Students receive loan boost

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Student Loan Marketing Association said Monday it has agreed to lend up to $1 billion over the next five years to student lending programs in Kansas, West Virginia, Tennessee and Washington, D.C.

The agreement with the Higher Education Management and Resources Foundation is the largest such transaction ever arranged by the association, which is called Sallie Mae.

Sallie Mae is a private, for-profit corporation that Congress created in 1972 to stimulate increased private financing for federally subsidized guaranteed student loans. It serves as a secondary market for the loans, buying them back from commercial banks and other lending agencies which in turn can use the cash to make additional loans.

Sallie Mae will provide an assured source of funds for guaranteed student loans originated or purchased by the Higher Education Loan Programs of Kansas, West Virginia, Tennessee and Washington, D.C.

The programs will be able to draw on the $1 billion anytime over the next five years. They must pay back the financing over 15 years. The foundation is based in Kansas City, Mo.

Undergraduates can borrow $2,500 and graduate students $5,000 a year under the guaranteed student loan program. Banks and other private lenders and public agencies make the loans, with the federal government guaranteeing them against default and subsidizing the interest payments. Students pay no interest until after they graduate or leave school.

Lebanese peace plan leads to coalition rule

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT — Parliament approved Prime Minister Rashid Karami's national coalition government on a 53-15 vote of confidence Tuesday, a day after artillery attacks killed 84 people and wounded 216 in and around Beirut.

Three deputies abstained from voting in the climax of a week-long debate on the new government's program of political, military and economic reforms to divide power equally between Moslems and Christians and to end Lebanon's nine-year civil war.

Sniper fire cracked sporadically in the distance during the final stage of the debate at Parliament headquarters between Christian east and mostly Moslem west Beirut.

Christian-controlled radio stations said that shortly after the Parliament session ended, a Lebanese army soldier was killed and two others were wounded in a firefight with Moslem militiamen in the mid-city Tayouneh neighborhood on the demarcation line.

The casualty toll in Monday's shelling was the largest since Feb. 6, when police reported 120 people killed and 300 wounded when Moslem militias took over west Beirut from the Lebanese army.

Most shops in east and west Beirut as well as the Christian port of Jounieh north of the capital were closed Tuesday to protest Monday's bombardment.

"I want to beseech God's mercy for those who were killed in this crisis and for those who survived,"

Karami said in a plea for unity behind his six-week-old government that includes leaders of the main warring militias. "Our salvation is in our own hands. There is no other alternative."

Karami's efforts to form a unity government were supported by Syria, which has played a major role in persuading the warring factions to get together.

After the vote of confidence, Karami introduced a bill to extend the term of the 12-year-old Parliament for two more years, and all 71 members attending the session approved it by unanimous vote.

Parliament then empowered Karami's government to "cancel or amend by decree" in the next nine months all legislative decrees that the previous Cabinet of Premier Shafik Wazzan introduced in the past two years.

This meant the government won the power to alter previous decrees that gave Christians the lion's share of key government and army posts. But Karami's original demand for power to govern by decree for the next nine months was denied.

His demand was the key issue in the prolonged vote of confidence debate marked by daily escalation of hostilities, which reached a peak in Monday's rain of shells and rockets on Beirut's Moslem and Christian sectors.

Rival Christian and Moslem militia commands blamed each other for the violence, which administration officials and legislators agreed was politically motivated.

Regents hike tuition costs

Beginning in the fall of 1985, students will be paying more to attend K-State because of a tuition increase that will affect all Regents' universities in Kansas.

"Students will be paying 25 percent of the cost of their education while the other 75 percent will come from state appropriations," said Jerome Frieman, associate professor of psychology and a member of the Faculty Senate Executive Committee.

Type A universities, which are considered the larger state universities, include K-State, University of Kansas and Wichita State University. Students at these schools will pay 29.9 percent of their educational costs.

Type B universities, which include the smaller universities of Fort Hays State University, Emporia State University and Pittsburg State University, will pay a fee cost ratio of 19.4 percent.

Beginning this fall, there will be a difference of $40 between graduate and undergraduate tuition. This difference will increase to $60 in 1986.

Senate gives support for space arms talks

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Senate on Tuesday heard secret intelligence about Soviet advances in space weapons, then voted on a bill to press President Reagan to immediately resume talks on a "verifiable ban or strict limitations" of such systems.

In the secret session, the first since covert aid to Nicaraguan rebels was discussed April 26, 1983, was called shortly after Sen. Larry Pressler, R-S.D., and 32 others proposed the arms control measure as an amendment to a $291 billion Pentagon spending plan.

The debate focused on Soviet and U.S. weapons to blind each other's spy and communications satellites. Pressler's amendment also calls for talks with Moscow on all such weaponry, including futuristic defenses envisioned by Reagan against strategic missiles as well.

Reagan says there is little point in a such a treaty because it would be virtually impossible to verify compliance.

A House-passed version of the defense budget would bar tests of a U.S. anti-satellite weapon if the Soviets do so. For the past 10 months, Moscow has observed a voluntary, unilateral ban on launching satellite killers, including test launches.

And on Monday, Soviet President Konstantin Chernenko urged the United States to negotiate promptly a pact on banning such weapons.

But a White House official, who sought anonymity, said Tuesday that call was intended to "divert

Broadcasters plan to battle drug abuse

By LYNN BENDER
Collegian Reporter

The Kansas Association of Broadcasters announced the details of a concentrated effort to make the public aware of the problems associated with alcohol and drug abuse at a four-day convention which ends today. More than 150 representatives and suppliers to the broadcast industry in Kansas attended.

According to KAB Executive Director Harriet Lange, broadcasters feel a responsibility to make the public aware of this problem. Broadcasters are in a prime position to educate the public on the hazards of drunken driving and other forms of drug abuse, Lange said.

The KAB has suggested that stations develop news interviews and features focusing on the tragedy of drinking and driving and encourage announcers to have an awareness campaign during holidays.

The KAB also urged broadcasters to devote air time to the topic, by sponsoring an awards competition recognizing outstanding public service announcements, editorials and other programing aimed at drug and alcohol abuse problems.

Several speakers were featured as part of the convention, as well. Tony Malara, president of CBS television network, spoke Monday evening in the K-State ballroom.

The media industry has gone from a limited spectrum in the early years to one of abundance now, Malara said.

The early years of radio and television brought with them an idea of scarcity which, in return, brought the philosophy of regulation, he said. Malara said although the radio industry was growing, many still seemed to hold onto the idea that radio was a scarce item. "The industry was bound by regulation," he said.

With the introduction of cable television and other new technology, ABC-TV, NBC-TV and CBS-TV are now threatened by a new type of competitor, Malara said the general theory of the new technology is television "demassification," which would include targeting specific audiences for programming.

"Broadcasters are seen as the old style, while cable is the new style of unmet needs," he said.

Malara said there has been a "decrease in the network audience," and the broadcasters need to concentrate on a medium ground of "widely shared experiences and tastes."

"Radio and television is not just a way of reaching everyone, but a way of reaching everyone repeatedly," he said.

"Trust from the people is the main factor...we will live through the changes if we hold to these values," Malara said.

This was the 34th annual convention of the KAB. Participants were involved with numerous media-related activities.

Paul Prince, associate professor of journalism and mass communications, announced Monday evening that Dana Hawkins, senior in journalism and mass communication, was the recipient of the KAB Jesse Priscock Scholarship.

Clint Formby, president of KPAN AM/FM in Hereford, Texas, and president-elect of The Associated Press Broadcast Board, spoke Monday, on the topic of "The Media: Broadcasting and the News." Formby described his experiences on a recent trip to Cuba and the decreasing perception of the U.S. media by the public.

Formby also expressed his concern over many Americans' lack of confidence in the media. The old cliché "blame the messenger, not the messenger" has changed to "the messenger has become the agent." He said the U.S. press is the world's finest but American broadcasters need to look at what they are doing and how they are doing it.

The Kansas Association of Broadcasters Distinguished Service award was presented to Dale McCoy, president and owner of Neosho County Broadcasters Co. Inc. in Chanute. He was selected because of his active involvement in both his community and the broadcasting industry.

Women's rights regress under ul-Haq rule

Pakistani describes growing discrimination

By KRISTIE FABER
Collegian Reporter

President Mohammed Zia ul-Haq of Pakistan is currently trying to implement a dress code for all women in that country.

In Pakistan, a woman must have four male witnesses in order to charge a man with rape.

These are just two of the issues that Shahnaz Rouse, research associate at the University of Wisconsin, addressed during her speech on "Women's Rights in the Middle East" Monday night in the Union Big Eight Room.

The lecture was sponsored by the International Coordinating Council and the Iranian Student Association.

Rouse began the lecture by clarifying that although her lecture was primarily based on her experience in Pakistan, it also encompassed the entire Middle East.

She said the Islamic ideology is apparent in governments like that of Syria, Iran, Egypt and Pakistan, and that each uses Islam as a uniting force among its people. In other words, "If you are a good Moslem you will agree that..." she said.

In these governments, Rouse said, it is popular to use quotes from the Koran (the sacred book of Moslems) for one's own use and omitting those quotes which do not hold true with the point being made. The main issue with each of these governments, she said, is not Islamic government vs. non-Islamic government, but democratic vs. dictatorial.

Rouse said the problems of women in the Middle East differ depending on their background and their class — tribal, agricultural, urban, upper class, middle class or working class.

However, Rouse added, the movement for equality in Pakistan is so new and encompasses such general issues that women are still united as one group, which differs from the United States where there are many different equality sectors.

"In this patriarchal society (Pakistan), women are subservient, expected only to marry who they are told to and bear children, occasionally working outside the home and usually without pay," Rouse said.

"The mortality rate for women is much greater than that of men in Pakistan, while the literacy rate is much lower," she added.

Because Pakistani families are reluctant to send women to male doctors, midwives are used to deliver babies. There are only 10,000 midwives for 45,000 villages, so without proper treatment many women with medical problems die, Rouse said.

Women have not had a choice in the past about marriage, family planning and their manner of dress, she said. In 1961, the Family Law in Pakistan was passed giving women the right to file for divorce and to inherit land; however, there is currently a movement underway to revoke this law. In addition, the regime is trying to implement a dress code, outlawing the sari (the principle outer garment of Hindu women, consisting of six yards of material wrapped around the body) as it is considered immoral.

Segregating the sexes in education with limited subject choices for women is also on the agenda.

Rouse said that when the Family

Law was passed many of the women who fought for it felt that they had gained so much and acted as if it were a victory. The battle was won, yet there was still a war to win. The movement was led by professional women who were in the middle to upper classes.

In 1977, Pakistan Prime Minister Zulfikar Ali Bhutto was overthrown in a military coup. When ul-Haq came into power, it was the beginning of a regime "much like that of the Khomeini regime in Iran," Rouse said.

"The use of the media and mosques brought about the hate against women," she said.

In the courts, the Laws of Evidence and the Hadood Ordinance work together against women. Rouse told of a recent incident when three women, one of which was blind, were raped in Pakistan. Because they didn't have four male witnesses they were publicly flogged. One of the women was from a village and received 18 lashings, while the woman from the city only received 10 lashings.

"The powers that be just try to get away with what they can," Rouse said. Since the woman from the village had a less-structured environment and the "powers" could get away with more, the woman received a more severe punishment. In Pakistan, she said, there is a lesser penalty for the murder of a woman than that of a man. This promotes the idea that women are of less importance than men in Pakistan.

Rouse gave another example of women's mistreatment and oppression: A group of women in a village were recently stripped of their clothing and paraded around the village for no apparent reason. The men were not punished.

The women of Pakistan have responded to the oppression and degradation of women and in September 1981, they organized the Women's Action Forum. The forum is against the ul-Haq regime and has brought about organized force for the women's movement, Rouse said.

"The forum is not attached to any political party or to a specific religion," she said.

In August 1983, men and women banded together in Sind, Pakistan, and began fighting for a democratic government to better the lives, not only of women, but of everyone. In less than two months, more than 65,000 people involved in the revolution were arrested. The movement still continues; however, it has slowed and moved underground due to the severe oppression and the fact that it was so isolated.

Rouse's credentials include a master's degree from Punjab University in Pakistan — where she is from — and a doctorate in development studies from the University of Wisconsin.

Rouse has also published a number of articles on subjects from women's issues to agriculture. She agrees that her attitude about women's rights may stem from her family which consists only of women. Her beliefs, however, come mainly from watching what's going on in her own country and from her travels, she said.

After speaking, Rouse showed a film titled, "They are Killing the Horse," about cultural oppression in Pakistan.

Governor returns to China

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Gov. John Carlin and a delegation of 18 state officials and businessmen leave today for nearly three weeks in Hong Kong, China and Japan as the governor follows up a 1979 trade mission.

Carlin will be accompanied by his wife, Karen, three aides, two cabinet-level officers, and officials of the state Board of Agriculture and Department of Economic Development on the $50,000 trip, which will be paid for with state taxpayers' money taken from various agency budgets.

Besides the 13-member governmental contingent, six Kansas businessmen will make the trip to try and establish markets for their goods in the foreign countries.

"The objectives of this trip are basically to follow up, not only on the governor's first trip to China in 1979, but the many exchanges of delegations from the Henan Province and Kansas during the past five years," said Mike Swenson, the governor's press secretary who also will be making the trip.

Swenson said the improving relationship between Kansas and its Henan Province sister state could mean some "real benefits."

attention" from the Soviet refusal to return to talks on limiting strategic and medium-range nuclear arms.

Sens. John Warner, R-Va., and J. James Exon, D-Neb., sought the secret session to tell colleagues about U.S. intelligence reports that the Soviets are developing radar and laser systems to jam radio signals to and from U.S. military satellites.

Before the moratorium announced in 1983, the Soviets tested a separate — and somewhat crude — satellite killer that was launched atop a large booster rocket and intercepted its target after several orbits. Many of the tests, according to the Pentagon, failed.

This fall, the administration wants to test a more sophisticated and quicker U.S. device, a "miniature homing vehicle" to be fired via missile from an F-15 jet fighter, and smash a satellite in minutes.

The U.S. weapon, ASAT, was tested successfully against an imaginary point in space early this year. But the House legislation would ban the scheduled test this fall against a balloon-like satellite.

Pressler's amendment would not ban such tests outright, but urges Reagan to "institute, as appropriate, a mutual and verifiable moratorium" on such space flights during talks. The words "as appropriate" would leave the issue at the president's discretion.

"The United States has the most to lose from a space arms race," Pressler said. "The cost would be extremely high...I believe that verifiable accords on space weapons can be negotiated, and that space arms control goes hand in hand with effective defense policy."

The amendment does not call for a moratorium against testing other space-directed weapons, such as an intercontinental ballistic missile interceptor which was successfully test-fired by the Army on Sunday. That device, launched atop an ICBM, hit and destroyed an incoming dummy warhead more than 100 miles above Earth.

K-State, area plan for heat

If last summer's heat wave is a forecast of what the weather will be like this summer, then Manhattan residents and K-State students may want to prepare themselves for the possibility of another hot summer.

No one knows exactly how hot it will be, but preparations are being made both on campus and in Manhattan.

One of the jobs of the University Facilities is to monitor the cooling of buildings on campus.

"We are assuming it will be another hot summer so we're scheduling buildings to be shut down as often as possible, and operations are moved to alternate buildings," said Fred Ferguson, director of building utilities.

Buildings are programmed by controllers set to go on and off at specific times.

"At night, most systems are shut off; however, there are areas in certain buildings that need to be kept at a constant temperature because of the presence of animals or for research conditions such as Ackert and Call halls," Ferguson said.

The Red Cross of Manhattan is also beginning preparations for the expected heat. According to Director Lynda Frey, the elderly are the high-risk population in Manhattan.

"In order to help these people, the Red Cross works in cooperation with the Retired Senior Volunteer Program (RSVP)," Frey said.

"Fans are donated or loaned to the Red Cross then delivered to needy people. Money donations are also accepted and designated toward the purchase of more fans," she said.

Service and repair businesses are ready for breakdowns that occur because of a hot summer.

Journalist wins scholarship for public affairs reporting

Alan Stolfus, senior in journalism and mass communications, has been awarded one of 10 Roy W. Howard Scholarships for Public Affairs Reporting. This scholarship is awarded through a national contest sponsored by the Department of Journalism at Indiana University at Bloomington and the Scripps-Howard newspaper chain.

Stolfus will receive a $1,000 scholarship and an all-expenses-paid trip to IU where he will attend a public affairs reporting conference in September.

Stolfus learned of the contest in February through a flyer posted on a bulletin board in the K-State journalism department.

"I had some strong interest and well, you never win these things unless you enter. I just wanted to enter to see how I'd do. I thought that I had a pretty good chance with the (Ben) Mahaffey stories and the Governors' Conference story (printed in the Collegian during the past year), but I never expected to win," Stolfus said. "What really attracted me was the chance to go to IU for the conference. I was just lucky, I guess."

The Mahaffey case was the first case in the Kansas Board of Regents history in which a tenured professor was put on suspension and recommended for dismissal. The case was covered throughout the fall of 1983 and the spring of 1984.

To enter the contest, Stolfus submitted three articles he had written for the Collegian, three letters of recommendation from members of the journalism department and an essay on public affairs writing.

"The first article was the first of the articles on the Mahaffey case, the second was on the Governor's Conference and the third was a follow-up to the Mahaffey case," Stolfus said.

All the work entered was judged by three professional reporters from three different news organizations — The Miami Herald, The St. Petersburg Times and NBC.

Students produce new version of chair

By LISA FORD
Collegian Reporter

"Dr. Spine. I do for your back what Dr. Scholl did for your feet."

The people making this claim are eight K-State interior architecture students who are using this slogan to promote their own version of the Balans chair — a chair that is designed to make the user sit straighter with less back pain.

The students chose the name "Dr. Spine" because they felt it was unusual and catchy, said Maria Poe, senior in interior architecture and a member of design team.

"We sat around for two days trying to come up with a name," she said. "We wanted it to be more of a scientific name such as 'Appropoise' or 'Verta-lign,' but when 'Dr. Spine' was suggested, everyone seemed to agree on it."

Constructed of maple, the chair has a triangular profile and navy or brown upholstery. Three casters on the chair's legs give the user mobility if seated at a computer work station or desk.

The unusual feature of the chair is that it has no back, only a slanted seat and a cushion for knee support. "Dr. Spine" consists of 10 pieces and is less intricate than the Balans chair, which has about twice as many pieces, said Steve Murphy, assistant professor of interior architecture.

Enrolled in Design Workshop II, the students were under the direction of Murphy and Dave Brown, senior in pre-design professions.

"We presented them (the students) the problem of designing and building appropriate seating for computing labs in the College of Architecture and Design," Murphy said. "This exposed the students to working as a design team. It also gave them a chance to get closer to one another; it kept up morale."

Surveys and seating tests were conducted to determine a standard height and a slant for the prototype Balans chair.

"We used both questionnaires and an interview process to gain the information we needed from the students who used the computers," Poe said.

The five women and three men produced 26 chairs in the College of Architecture and Design's wood-working shop by working as an assembly line. While one team member assembled 52 cushions, other students cut and shaped the maple, drilled and fitted pieces together, sanded and spray varnished the assembled chairs.

"The basic material needed to construct the chair, not including labor, is around $35," said Murphy. Each team member was permitted to keep one chair for the effort.

"Everyone picked their own frame and had to hand sand it themselves," Poe said. "When you're making it for yourself, you always put a little extra effort into it."

"We had at least 150 requests for the chair during Open House," Murphy said. "There have also been requests from other departments, but we want to work within our college. We can't afford to turn into furniture manufacturers."

Additional computers will be ar-iving next year according to Murphy, and when this happens, more chairs will be needed.

"The secretaries have two of them (the chairs) in their office now," Murphy said. "When the additional computers come, it'll be hard to pry them (the chairs) away."

The students plan to enter the chair in a national collegiate furniture design competition in August at Atlanta, Ga., Brown said. The competition is hosted every other year by the National Association of Furniture Manufacturers.

"All the leading furniture manufacturers are represented at the meeting and maybe one of them will like the design enough to buy it," Brown said.

Lights project may not bring K-State benefits

In a joint effort by the K-State Department of Intercollegiate Athletics and the city of Manhattan, lights will be installed at the Frank Meyer Baseball Complex this fall. Many people believe that the installation of these lights will benefit both the University and the Manhattan community. But, is this really a beneficial investment for K-State?

This question is asked because there's the possibility that the strength of the lights might not meet the Big Eight Conference specifications. K-State's baseball coach, Bill Hickey, said that he doesn't see any Big Eight night games under these lights in the near future. So, at first, it appears that the lights will benefit only the community. Granted, the University was only able to put up about $30,000 — less than a third of the funds needed for the installation of the lights — but should this mean that the lights be only strong enough for night practices and occasional lighted games with junior colleges?

One of the main concerns of any collegiate athletic department is to help the school's sports to become more competitive in their respective conferences and, in turn, generate more revenue from these otherwise low-revenue sports.

But, if there's the possibility that the lights at Frank Meyer Baseball Complex will not be strong enough to play Big Eight night games, then the idea of improving conference competitiveness is lost.

K-State should, instead, work to raise enough funds to make the lights strong enough to meet the conference's specifications. This solution will then make the installation of the lights beneficial for both the University and the community.

Another alternative would have been to use these funds to improve the K-State baseball program in other areas that would produce quicker results.

Why use up to $30,000 from the athletic department just so the baseball team can have lighted night practices? The low-revenue sports at K-State are constantly striving to improve in comparison to other Big Eight schools, so why not spend the money to make them more competitive?

Judi Wright, for the Editorial Board

Reagan has faults, but communicates his ideas

During the past semester, the Collegian Editorial Board has devoted a large amount of time and space to analyzing Ronald Reagan and his administration.

Some of this analysis has not shown positive aspects of the administration, and thus, those contributing to the page have earned a reputation of being let's-slam-Ronnie-again-I-hate-Republicans liberals.

This reputation, however, is not warranted. True, some columnists do regard themselves as polar opposites of Reagan, and write primarily about his policies or latest island invasion because they feel most strongly about those issues. Most, though, do not affiliate themselves with one philosophy or political party and try to address topics the public is or should be concerned about it.

Why, then, are so many editorials and columns devoted to the not-always-so-favorable analysis of the Reagan administration? Why do so many readers of the Collegian expect to see Reagan's effigy strung from Kedzie Hall?

Could it possibly be that this administration has just done a remarkable amount of things that make a remarkable amount of people angry?

Yes.

Reagan and his staff have changed, rewritten, revised and rejected more policies, regulations and court decisions than the previous three presidents combined.

During his term, paranoid conservatism has once again come to the forefront of political attitudes in America. The United States' reputation as a military power to be reckoned with — or destroyed by — is again intact. Through the efforts of the current administration, school prayer may be restored, welfare cheaters weeded out and the national budget balanced, all in one fell swoop.

But there is one big advantage to Ronald Reagan that even the most adamant of opponents cannot argue with. For all the revisions, rewrites and rejections, Reagan at least tells you where he stands.

He is concise and declarative. One doesn't need to second-guess

Reagan. He sends his messages out loud and clear, both to the American public and to the world at large.

Perhaps that is why our relationship with the Soviets can be termed a "Cold War." Maybe we owe the buildup of nuclear arms and the cut in Social Security benefits and student financial aid to the current president's more-than-adequate ability to communicate.

But, thanks to the present administration, inflation has been reduced, a sense of patriotism has re-surfaced and best of all, we can actually look back on the past four years and cite specific changes, whether they be advantageous or not. Perhaps even better, though, the American public can listen to Ronald Reagan and actually believe he'll do what he says.

As we are bombarded by pre-election rhetoric and electronic speech makers with their G-man campaign managers, it is refreshing to actually be able to count on campaign promises — or threats.

His Democratic opponents have constructed their campaigns on the foundation of strict Reagan opposition, but are sometimes a bit ambiguous when declaring just what methods or reasons justify opposition. Perhaps they are too busy calling each other names and haven't had the time to work specific policies out just yet.

While the press might criticize the Reagan and his administration, it should at least realize the good fortune that enables it to derive actual policies and goals from political double-talk. For the first time in many years, the American public and press at least know what they're criticizing.

Party problems obvious in Mondale campaign

Well, the Democrats have finally selected their man to oppose Ronald Reagan in 1984. Although not yet official, it seems quite clear that Walter Mondale is the Democratic choice. Yes, America, once again our coveted presidential race has gone from a battle of political heavyweights to a midwest wrestling match.

The party, founded by Andrew Jackson, which brought us FDR, JFK, LBJ, and other great initials, will now bring us Minnesota Mondale and the Temple of Gloom. Just imagine it, Walter Mondale, a man slower than a Union food line, less inspiring than a CPA on Quaaludes and able to leap over large issues in a single bound. How does he realistically expect to defeat Reagan in the fall if the hamburger franchises don't come out with some new commercials?

To paraphrase Winston Churchill's comment about Clement Atlee, Mondale says he is a modest man, and he certainly has every right to be.

Sorry to be so hard on Mondale, but somewhere along the road to the Democratic nomination, he lost his appeal. The one time protégé of Hubert Humphrey has made a Faustian bargain — trading personal integrity for ambition, self-respect for an increased delegate count. Humphrey must wince from the grave at every "Where's the Beef?" and grimace at Mondale's attacks on fellow Democrats.

However, I am not suggesting that these are personal traits of Mondale alone. Gary Hart has also failed to follow the example set by his mentor, George McGovern. The source of these failings are not the individuals, but inherent in the party itself.

For example, one of the main problems of the party is that it has shifted from an active party to a "reactive" party. During the Roosevelt era, the Democrats got a reputation of the party of action. The popular perception held that it was the work of the Democrats that got us out of the Depression, improved civil rights and got us out of Vietnam.

But today they seem almost paralyzed, refusing to challenge the prevailing consensus on any issue. Without this dynamic image and lacking a binding ideology or personality, they seem adrift in a political void.

Look at the so-called Democratic budget "alternatives." They differ from the president's budget only in regard to numbers, not priorities or impact. In an era of political action committees, mediaization and sloganization, the Democrats meekly cling to their old political style. However, the old coalitions have faltered and the Democratic machine has broken down. And unless the Democrats adjust to modern realities, they may find themselves several days late and millions of dollars short.

Things have gotten so bad for the Democrats that they have changed advertising agencies. That's right, the same people that have brought us the Ginzu knife and the Veg-o-matic will also bring us Walter Mondale.

A second source for this Democratic decline is something I call the "two steps forward, three steps back" syndrome. Historically, it has been the Democrats who have called for less military commitments, improved standards of living for the poor and protection of civil rights. Take two steps forward.

However, it was the Democratic Party, under the leadership of Harry Truman, that tripled military spending as the United States globalized the Korean conflict. It was the Democratic Party, under the leadership of John F. Kennedy, which first proposed our "missile gap" with the Soviet Union, when the opposite was actually true. And it was the Democratic Party, under the leadership of Jimmy Carter, that first proposed the idea of "limited" nuclear warfare in Presidential Memorandum No. 59.

Ironically, the only modern presidents to reduce military spending were Dwight Eisenhower and Richard Nixon. Take three steps back. The Democrats remind me of a old Will Rogers saying, "You may be on the right track, but if you just sit there you'll get run over."

Idealistic rhetoric and unfulfilled promises are no longer enough. Unless the Democrats begin to adapt to a new political world, their members and the general public will become more disillusioned and disenfranchised. And the Democratic Party may itself become a party with more of a past than a future.

Narrow road near Seaton poses danger

Editor,

The driveway behind Seaton Hall presents a particularly dangerous situation. There is a lot of auto and pedestrian traffic passing through that small lane, which runs from the front of Durland Hall to the parking lots for Seaton and Lafene Student Health Center.

The lane is only 12 feet wide and there are no sidewalks. The recent planting of bushes where the sidewalks should be has made this dangerous situation even worse.

Adding more to the danger is the loud whine of the power plants cooling towers. It is not uncommon for a pedestrian to be approached from the rear by a car without him even hearing it.

It is only a matter of time before an accident occurs. To remedy this situation, sidewalks should be installed and traffic signs encouraging drivers to slow down should be put into place.

Little prince shows off to press

LONDON — Prince William held his first "press conference" Tuesday, showing his mastery of words including "ant" and "tractor" and even saying two complete sentences.

The toddler prince, who turns 2 next week, could only gurgle and coo when he last appeared for reporters six months ago. But on Tuesday, he stood just over 3 feet tall and asked, "What's that?" and "Who's that?"

Because of his birthday June 21, Prince Charles and Princess Diana showed him off for photographers on the grounds of Kensington Palace, their London home.

Carter's nephew pleads guilty

OROVILLE, Calif. — William Carter Spann, the nephew of former President Jimmy Carter, pleaded guilty to a felony escape charge that could send him back to prison for three more years.

Spann, 37, who has been in and out of California jails since 1969, was arrested at his home in nearby Chico by his parole officer May 3 for "suspected use of amphetamines."

Spann, who has described himself as "the bad peanut" of the Carter family, had been on parole for a 1981 attempted burglary conviction.

Exiled family views film screening

QUINCY, Mass. — The mother-in-law of dissident Soviet scientist Andrei Sakharov fought tears as she watched a film depicting events in her life.

"Let's stop," said Ruth Grigorievna Bonner, 84, mother of Yelena Bonner, Sakharov's wife. "I'm afraid I will cry."

She and other members of the Sakharov family in exile in the Boston suburb of Newton saw a private screening of a television movie, "Sakharov," according to Monday's Patriot Ledger of Quincy.

When a Norwegian envoy appears at the Sakharov apartment armed with red roses to announce that the scientist — played by Jason Robards — has won a Nobel Peace Prize, Alexsei Semyenov, 28, Sakharov's stepson, remarked, "Actually, the roses came in a vase."

Sakharov went on a hunger strike in 1982 to force authorities to permit Semyenov's wife, Liza, to leave the Soviet Union to join her husband in the United States. She attended the screening.

Sakharov, in exile in the city of Gorky, reportedly went on another hunger strike May 2 to force Soviet officials to let his wife go abroad for eye treatment. Unconfirmed reports have said he is dead.

Seattle nips Royals in extra inning

By The Associated Press

SEATTLE — Larry Milbourne's two-out single scored pinch-runner Darnell Coles in the bottom of the 10th inning Tuesday night to give the Seattle Mariners a 3-2 victory over the Kansas City Royals.

Kansas City right fielder Pat Sheridan fielded Milbourne's single and made a good throw to the plate, but Coles avoided catcher John Wathan's block and dived back to touch the plate.

Alvin Davis opened the Mariner 10th with a single and moved to second on a sacrifice by Al Cowens. Ken Phelps was intentionally walked, and Barry Bonnell forced Davis at third. But after Coles went in to run for Phelps at second, Milbourne lashed a 1-2 pitch off Bret Saberhagen, 2-6.

Mariner righthander Mike Moore, 3-4, went all the way, scattering seven hits. Saberhagen had replaced Kansas City starter Charlie Leibrandt to open the ninth.

Celts net 15th NBA championship

By The Associated Press

BOSTON — The Boston Celtics, pro basketball's most successful team, used a 24-point performance by Cedric Maxwell and 20 by Larry Bird to beat the Los Angeles Lakers 111-102 Tuesday night in the seventh game of their championship series and win an unprecedented 15th NBA title.

The Celtics, who captured their first National Basketball Association championship in 1957 in seven games over St. Louis, are now 7-0 when they have taken the final round to the limit.

Maxwell, the Most Valuable Player when the Celtics last won the title in 1981, tied his season-high point total. The MVP award this time went to Bird, who played a strong all-court game. Bird was averaging 28 points per game going into Tuesday night's contest.

The Celtics led by 13 going into the fourth quarter, but the Lakers frantically rallied to cut the deficit to 105-102 with 1:15 left on a three-point play by Kareem Abdul-Jabbar, who finished with 29 points, and a basket by James Worthy, who had 21.

But two free throws by Dennis Johnson, who had 22 points, made it 107-102 with 45 seconds left and two more foul shots by Bird set off a wild celebration by the sellout crowd of 14,890.

For the second time in a row in Boston Garden, the two teams battled in sauna-like temperatures in the non air-conditioned arena, although it was not as hot as during Game 5 last Friday night, which the Celtics won by 18 points. As in that game, Boston used a strong rebounding advantage and an occasional dead-eye outside shooting to hold off the Lakers in Game 7.

Four of Boston's seven seventh-game triumphs have come against Los Angeles, the Celtics' old rival who had not met them in 15 years. Since 1969, Boston has won all eight championship series meetings between the two teams.

Gerald Henderson, scoreless in the first half when he picked up three quick fouls, came back to score nine points in first 4:43 of the third period. But at the same time, the Lakers worked desperately to trim Boston's six-point halftime margin, scoring 20 points in the first 6:43 to cut the deficit to 73-72.

After a basket by Bird, Abdul-Jabbar had a chance to cut the margin to one again, but he missed two free throws and when Parish shot over Abdul-Jabbar for a basket and free throw, the Celtics seemed to find a spark.

Holding the Lakers to one shot every time down the floor, Boston scored the last nine points of the quarter to take a 91-78 advantage in the final 12 minutes.

The Celtics now have won 14 straight final-round appearances and are 15-1 overall, with the only loss coming in 1958 in six games to St. Louis. The Lakers are second in the NBA with eight championships, but five of those titles came in the 1940s and 1950s when the franchise was located in Minneapolis.

In the stands to see the latest triumph was Arnold "Red" Auerbach, who is retiring as Celtics' general manager. He was coach for the first nine Boston titles, with his last game a two-point victory over the Lakers in 1966. He will now stay on as the team's president.

K-State obtains new coach

Jimmy Allen, a successful junior college and high school coach in Arkansas, has been named assistant basketball coach at K-State, Coach Jack Hartman said Tuesday.

Allen, 39, comes from Phillips County Community College in Helena, Ark., where he was coach and athletic director. Allen had a 100-39 record at Phillips in four seasons and was named junior college coach of the year in 1981 and 1982.

Allen had a 298-61 record at Bismarck, Ark. High School and McNeil, Ark. High School.

Allen succeeds Jerry Holmes, who resigned in April for health reasons.

Funeral costs rank above average in Kansas

By LORI WONG
Collegian Reporter

"In Kansas the average funeral costs run from $2,250 to $2,500 depending on the family's preference on services we offer," said Dennis Irvin, a partner and director of the Parkview Funeral Home at 1317 Poyntz Ave.

In comparison to figures from a recent article by The Associated Press, funeral costs in Kansas fall among the mid- to high-price range nationally. In the article, the departments of Commerce and Health and Human Services estimated the national average funeral cost to be $1,887 while David R. Bohardt, executive director of the National Funeral Directors Association, estimated the figure to be $2,400.

"There are really three factors involved in the cost of funerals," Richard Riley, director of Resthaven Mortuary in Wichita, said. "First of all, there is the mortuary fee. This is for the basic services of the funeral director and staff. We provide the use of four cars to deliver the body and the family to the service and final resting place as part of our basic mortuary fee."

At the Parkview Funeral Home, this basic fee is $350 and includes consultation with family and clergy, the preparation and filing of necessary notices, and other services including the coordination of cemetery and cremation arrangements.

"The second factor involved in the cost of funerals is the casket. The price of caskets really varies because they are made out of many different types of materials which affect the price. I would say that the average price paid for a casket is about $1,240, but caskets can run anywhere from $600 to $5,000.

"The third factor is the cost for outside services. Outside services include the cost of hiring a minister, an organist, a vocalist or any other related service," Riley said.

Another outside service that may be used is that of a crematory. Depending on the funeral home, the cost for a cremation may be paid directly to the crematory or through the funeral home.

"The actual fee that we charge funeral homes for cremations is either $90 or $110, depending on the container that the funeral home uses to deliver the body," said Timothy Collier, manager of Elmwood Cemetery in Kansas City, Mo.

"There are only three places in Kansas that have crematories — Topeka, Kansas City and Wichita," Irvin said. "We always use the Mount Hope Abbey Crematorium in Topeka simply because it's the closest one."

"Cremations are more popular on the West Coast. The further west you go, the more accepted cremations are, because cremation societies have crept up there. These are groups that support and promote cremations. In the Midwest, people are more traditional and conservative and have more traditional funerals instead of cremations," Riley said.

Collier said cremations are quickly gaining acceptance in the Midwest.

"More people are having cremations in the Midwest now, but in some areas of the country, cremation has become more popular than a traditional burial. I understand that in Hawaii cremations are far more common than burials. The reason that cremations are so popular along the West Coast is that the price for a piece of burial property is so high. It's much cheaper for a family to buy a container rather than a burial plot."

Burial plots are another cost in the final price of a funeral. The price for a single plot varies greatly among cemeteries.

"People mostly buy two spaces at a time in husband-wife combinations. We sell these combinations at $500," said Earl Wenzel the manager of the White Chapel Memorial Gardens Cemetery in Wichita.

"A lot of times a person will die and be cremated and the remains will be buried in a plot along with the remains of another person. This usually happens with a husband and wife," said Wenzel.

"There are just so many factors involved in funerals and funeral costs. Every bit of preparation that a person does will help his family immensely when he dies," said Collier.

"A person ought to go to the funeral home or director of his choice to at least get some idea of what options are available," Irvin said. "The most helpful thing that a person could do is have all his statistical information written down."

"This includes things such as his date and place of birth, the names of his parents and other information like this. If a family comes in and they have all this information compiled, then they make it easier for us to fill out all the records, certificates and obituary releases," he said.

Riley said young people need not purchase burial space immediately, but some preparation is wise.

"A person can make some very helpful preparations, but he shouldn't try to make all the arrangements," Irvin said.

K-State housing office considers closing hall due to fewer students

By STEVE ONKEN
Collegian Reporter

Putnam Hall, K-State's third oldest residence hall, may be closing its doors in August.

Because of declining enrollment and housing economic situations, Tom Frith, director of housing, and the housing department are examining the possibility of closing Putnam. The final decision will be made by the end of this month, Frith said.

"What we are checking out now is what we can close if, in fact, we need to close down one of the residence halls due to the declining enrollment," he said.

This is not a decision that is easily made, Frith said, because if statistics hold true and enrollment declines as much as is forecast, then a decision such as closing one of the residence halls must be made.

Frith said the hall might be used for purposes such as continuing education housing for conferences and workshops and he would like to see it used for some sort of income.

Last year, 4,150 students occupied the residence halls — falling 260 spaces short of the capacity total of 4,410 — and Frith expects the numbers to drop even lower than the previous year.

The reason Putnam is being considered for the closing is because fewer students request to live in this hall, percentage wise, than the other halls, Frith said. He also said that if it is necessary to close one hall over another, it would be more fair to close one of the smaller, less-requested halls such as Putnam.

Putnam, Boyd and Van Zile halls are the smallest residence halls on campus and Van Zile will be closed this year for renovations. Putnam houses approximately 230 students on the average.

Several Putnam residents have decided to voice their opinions about the hall and said they won't let Putnam die "without a fight."

A committee of eight students who were Putnam residents last year and are now living in Manhattan have formed a committee to investigate the hall's closing. They began procedures to stop the hall closing, said Sherry Smith, committee spokesman and junior in pre-law.

"We sent out a letter to the returning members and to the alumni of Putnam and explained the situation to them asking for their support," Smith said. "We asked them to write letters to (University) President (Duane) Acker and the Board of Regents expressing their concern about the possible closing of Putnam, and we had a real good response to the letters."

Smith said the committee met with Chet Peters, vice-president of student affairs, and Rosanne Proite, assistant housing director, to discuss what alternatives could be taken instead of closing the residence hall.

"We offered them some alternatives that we came up with and a few suggestions. One was to close off a floor as they did last year. Another was to close off the food service area, if necessary," Smith said.

Smith agreed with Frith about the number of requests that Putnam receives each year from incoming students. The newer and modern residence halls, she said, seem to appeal more to the freshmen than the older halls such as Putnam, Boyd and Van Zile.

"Percentage-wise, we have a good returning rate of students back to Putnam, but the new students seem to push toward the newer dorms," Smith said.

"We just want to do what we can to keep Putnam open and make those residents of Putnam aware of the situation," she added.

According to Frith, if Putnam should close before the fall semester, the housing department would notify residents in plenty of time to make other arrangements. An extension on the deadline for contracts would be made for the returning students, as well as arrangements for transferring to another hall.

Freshmen would be given the opportunity to select another residence hall because housing policy states all single, freshman students, under the age of 21, are required to live in either a residence hall or greek chapter house if the space is available.

Also, Frith said if anyone has been offered a job at Putnam as a resident assistant, front desk clerk or in the food service area, would be offered a job in one of the other residence halls.

Last year, wings were closed in some residence halls due to the decline in student enrollment. In fact, one wing was closed in Putnam. But closing one wing or floor may not be enough because it won't save as much money as closing an entire hall, Frith said.

Marilyn Trotter, director of new student programs, said last year 3,438 new students enrolled — including transfer and community college students — with the number of new freshmen being 2,395.

"We are hoping to attract more students this summer through summer programs in hopes of getting those students who might normally wait until fall," she said.

"As of the first of June, we had 7,231 applications, but we really don't know how many will show up," said Richard Elkins, director of admissions.

This number may appear high, but Elkins said that of this total only about half actually come to K-State.

State increases education standards

Plan adds to high school requirements

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The state Board of Education on Wednesday began the process of increasing graduation requirements as it ordered the development of regulations to add an extra unit of study to the minimum standards needed by students in the class of 1989.

In addition, the board ordered the preparation of regulations for higher accreditation standards for schools. The standards would create a new accreditation classification to encourage school districts to improve their educational programs.

Both proposals will be reviewed by the board at its July meeting and will be the subject of public hearings this fall. If given final approval by the board later this year, the plans would take effect in May 1985.

Students currently must have 17 credits to graduate from high school, but that increases to 20 credits for the graduating class of 1988, which is next year's 9th graders.

The board's proposal considered Wednesday calls for graduation requirements to be raised to 21 credits for the class of 1989, which is next year's 8th graders. In directing its staff to prepare needed regulations to implement the change, the board said it would not mandate the additional unit of study in any specific subject.

With the 20-credit graduation requirement, which was approved last year by the board, students must have four units of study in English, three units of social studies, two units of mathematics, two units of science and one unit of physical education. The remaining hours of study can be taken in any "elective" subject selected by students.

Commissioner of Education Harold Blackburn said the current accreditation system represents the minimum standards needed by elementary and secondary schools to receive state approval.

Under the proposal reviewed Wednesday, schools would have the option of applying for accreditation under a higher set of standards. The proposal is to act as an incentive for schools to improve.

"There's quality in the current accreditation, but not enough," said Blackburn.

The staff of the state Department of Education will prepare regulations to list the criteria for schools to obtain the accreditation of "excellence," said Sharon Freden, assistant commissioner for the Division of Education Services, who is working on the proposal.

The regulations will not include specific requirements for curriculum, she said, but will be general standards and guidelines designed to encourage schools to develop programs to improve their educational offerings.

Also Wednesday, the board was given a "strategic planning" report on the future needs of Kansas schools. The report concludes there is strong dissatisfaction with schools and their ability to prepare Kansas students for jobs in the future.

The report is based on comments from several hundred educators, businessmen and citizens at meetings conducted across the state this spring. The individuals also completed questionnaires, which were used by the Mid-Continent Regional Planning Laboratory to prepare the report.

Shirley McCune, who works for the consulting group in Denver, Colo., said there is "tremendous pride" in Kansas schools but a "surprising" amount of discontent with the performance of the education system.

In general, she said there is a feeling among most people that Kansas schools are "riding on past achievements" rather than keeping up with the changing educational needs of students entering a highly technological society.

In addition, she said people at the meetings concluded that better teacher training is needed.

"Not only is the training of teachers a problem, but the need for counselor training is also apparent as counselors have, at least on paper, primary responsibility for career exploration and are not adequately trained nor provide enough assistance to students in career planning," McCune wrote in her report.

DC-9 crash-lands in Detroit

By The Associated Press

ROMULUS, Mich. — A USAir DC-9 jet crash-landed on a runway at Detroit Metropolitan Airport on Wednesday as the pilot tried to abort a landing in a severe thunderstorm, and five of the 55 people aboard suffered minor injuries, an airline spokesman said.

A gust of wind apparently forced the plane onto the runway as the pilot was retracting the landing gear to make another pass at the airport, said David Shipley, USAir assistant vice president for public affairs in Washington, D.C.

The accident involved USAir

Flight 183, which was carrying 50 passengers and a crew of five on a flight to Detroit from Bradley International Airport at Windsor Locks, Conn., a suburb of Hartford, Shipley said.

Five passengers were taken to Wayne County General Hospital for treatment of minor injuries, according to Shipley and airport police.

The accident occurred at about 5:05 p.m., about the same time as a severe thunderstorm with hail and 48 mph winds had hit the airport, according to the National Weather Service.

"On final approach into Detroit, the pilot lost visual contact with the runway and elected to do a go-around," Shipley said.

He said a downdraft forced the plane into the runway while its landing gear was being retracted.

"The nose gear broke, the plane skidded off the runway," said airport police officer Douglas Meriman. "It is now on its belly."

Al Weishaar, air traffic manager at the airport for the Federal Aviation Administration, said the plane came to rest on a grassy area between a runway and a taxiway. He said control tower personnel did not see the accident because visibility was limited to one-quarter mile by the thunderstorm.

Local man being held after crash

By The Associated Press

Riley County authorities have charged a Manhattan man with second-degree murder in the death of a Riley woman in a car accident last week.

Michael Atherton, 24, was being held in a Riley County Jail in lieu of $5,000 bond. He was charged Tuesday in the death of Lola Tucker, 23, on June 5.

The accident occurred on U.S. 24, about five miles west of Manhattan, said Capt. Nick Edby of the Riley County Police Department.

Accident reports indicate that Atherton was driving on the wrong side of the road and that the driver of the car Tucker was a passenger swerved to the left to avoid him. Atherton then swerved back into his lane, and struck the passenger side of the car, killing Tucker, Edby said.

Atherton also has been charged with driving left of center, driving with an illegal license and driving with an open container of liquor, Edby said.

Grand jury indicts 18 on JC drug trafficking

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A federal grand jury indicted 18 people on Wednesday in connection with trafficking of cocaine, heroin and marijuana by a drug ring based in Junction City.

The indictments were made in U.S. District Court and represented the latest development in an 18-month drug investigation in the Junction City area by federal, state and local law enforcement agencies. The investigation was concluded earlier this month when arrest warrants were issued for a number of people in Junction City. Evidence concerning criminal charges against the individuals was presented to the grand jury on Wednesday and resulted in the indictments.

The individuals were indicted on various counts of distributing or conspiring to distribute cocaine, heroin, marijuana or LSD, and possession of the drugs with the intent to distribute.

Clarence Harry Lewis, and Jackie Keyes.

All of the individuals are from Junction City, according to Assistant U.S. Attorney Tom Haney.

Convictions for the charges are punishable by up to 15 years in prison and fines up to $25,000, except for distribution of marijuana which is punishable by 5 years in prison and $15,000 fine.

According to the grand jury indictments, there were 28 undercover transactions during the investigation in which agents or informers purchased cocaine, heroin, marijuana and LSD.

The investigating task force had planned to buy one kilo of cocaine on June 3 for $70,000, followed by arrests. However, arrangements for the purchase could not be completed and arrest warrants were issued. Search warrants also were issued at the time and a 17-year-old youth was accidentally shot to death by a federal agent during a search of one house.

The indictments on Wednesday will replace the criminal complaints filed earlier this month because of the arrests. The complaints will be dismissed.

Haney said federal law requires indictments for authorities to proceed with felony prosecutions. Criminal complaints can be used to proceed on a temporary basis after an arrest.

Farm economics deteriorate

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The financial crunch on many farmers is getting worse as they reach the end of the line with creditors, says a new report by the Agriculture Department.

But department economists are sticking with earlier predictions that farm income, overall, will increase sharply this year as producers put idled land back into crops for the 1984 harvest.

"The number of farmers leaving the sector for financial reasons will likely increase during the remainder of 1984," the department's Economic Research Service said Wednesday in a new issue of Agricultural Outlook.

"Many analysts believe that lending institutions have postponed foreclosures and liquidations on their most distressed clients for as long as they can."

Although credit is still available, interest rates are expected to go even higher, making it even more difficult for farmers to qualify for loans, the report said.

The Reagan administration has acknowledged that 2 percent to 4 percent of the nation's farms could fold this year because of financial reasons, compared to a normal attrition rate of 1 percent to 1½ percent. No new estimates for overall failures were made in the new analysis, although the report cited Federal Reserve bank surveys showing how farm failures have risen.

"For example, the Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis estimated that between October 1983 and March 1984, 3.4 percent of farmers and ranchers in its area discontinued farming because of financial difficulties," the report said. "This compares with 2 percent during the same period the previous year."

Many of the "highly leveraged" farmers have suffered losses for the past several years because of low market prices.

City property owners seek different zoning

NATALIE HAZELTON
Collegian Reporter

Several Manhattan residents went to the Manhattan Board of Zoning Appeals meeting Wednesday night to ask for exceptions to city zoning codes.

City Attorney Bill Frost explained the board's procedure for zoning exception requests.

"The main thing to keep in mind for conditional use and variances is that you (the board) are a quasi-judicial body, not an administrative body. You must listen to evidence and based on that, you must make a factual decision," he said. "I cannot tell you how to make factual decisions, that is your job."

Members of the board vote on appeals, variances and conditional use of the zoning codes. Variances and conditional uses are exceptions to zoning standards.

Requests made by Manhattan residents at last night's meeting included:

— A variance reducing the front yard setback (distance from house to street) along South Eighth Street from 25 feet to 10 feet.

— A variance allowing a duplex located at 1725 Anderson St., to reduce property width from 50 feet to 44 feet and to reduce lot size from 7,500 square feet to 6,550 square feet.

— A variance to reduce the front yard setback along North Tenth Street from 25 feet to 8 feet, and to reduce the side yard setback on the east from 6 feet to 4 feet to allow construction of a duplex and detached garage. The property is located on the southeast corner of Tenth and Thurston streets.

— A variance to reduce the required lot width and area of the property located at 904 Humboldt St.

— Permission for conditional use to allow the construction of a car wash at 1207 Bluemont Ave.

— Permission for conditional use of the old Flips & Dips building for a tavern. The property is located at 2010 Tuttle Creek Blvd.

Voting on these requests was not expected to conclude until early this morning.

Tour guides promote K-State

By JAMI MCWILLIAMS
Collegian Reporter

Student campus tour guides have the important job of showing K-State to the public.

Most tours — given on a walk-in basis to anyone who wants to see the campus and by appointment with large groups — are taken by prospective students and special interest groups. Doug Feist, senior in education-mathematics and summer tour coordinator, said.

"It's good experience and a lot of fun," said Marla Steiner, senior in journalism and mass communication. "A student guide has to be personable and charismatic. You have to be able to relate to people and be able to work under pressure."

"You (as a tour guide) have to be sincere and honest with the prospective students," Feist said. "You tell them (people taking the tours) your opinions about the questions they ask. Above all we want guides who are going to promote K-State."

During the regular school year there are 12 guides who are chosen from applications that are taken during the spring semester. This past spring, 75 students applied and of these only 21 were called back for interviews, Steiner said.

After the guides are chosen, they go through a one-day training session and learn the tour information from a six-page script. Current guides also help train the new ones. Speakers from all areas on campus take part in the training session, Steiner said.

"We don't memorize the script, but just try to learn the general information. We try to learn the fun facts mostly. For example, (we know) that all the buildings on campus are made of limestone except for Goodnow Hall and Marlatt Hall," Steiner said.

Tours range from 40-minute walking tours, given to prospective students, to all-day tours given to special interest groups. Typical groups that take the tours include school children of all ages — from kindergarten through junior high — and 4-H clubs, Feist said.

"The tours vary by age groups and we try to meet the special interests of the different groups," he said.

Many special interest groups want to visit only one part of the campus such as the planetarium, dairy barns or the Veterinary Medicine Complex. Specialized guides give tours of these areas.

Student guides also give special tours of KSU Stadium.

"One time when I was giving a tour of the stadium to a group of school kids, I told them that Willie the Wildcat lived out there," Steiner said. "You have to be creative."

The end of the school year and the summer are the busiest times for tours, Feist said.

"The first week of the summer I gave tours to 180 people," Feist said.

The student guides are not paid for their time and effort except by the personal satisfaction they gain from showing off their campus, Steiner said.

average 50 to 60 percent will arrive this fall, but with the 7,000 number of applications, that 10 percent differential is quite significant," Elkins said.

Enrollment figures for Kansas and the nation have been on a decline over the past two years. Elkins said a new report shows that there were 28,145 Kansas high school graduates in 1983 compared to 26,027 in 1984 — a decline of over 2,000 students in one year.

National figures report in 1983 there were 2,766,167 graduating high school students compared to the 1984 figure of 2,618,523.

Although the number of hall residents has dropped over the last two years, University housing costs have remained steady. There was a $45 increase during the fall of 1982 term but no increase during the fall of 1983. In 1984 housing costs will remain at $910 per semester.

Campus Bulletin

All announcements to be printed in Campus Bulletin must be submitted by 11 a.m. the day preceding publication. Notices for Monday's bulletin must be in by 11 a.m. Friday. Campus Bulletin forms may be deposited in the mailbox near the vending machines outside Kedzie Hall 102 or sent through campus mail. K-State departments, offices and non-profit campus organizations may use Campus Bulletin to announce meetings or other activities. There is no guarantee that an announcement will be run more than once, due to space limitations.

There is a university in Manhattan that gives no grades, has no graduates and charges a relatively low tuition.

University for Man, located at 1221 Thurston, is an educational/community development agency which helps rural communities deal with faltering local economies.

UFM's main focus and reason for starting is its local campus and community program. Sue Maes, executive director of UFM, said the program allows rural Kansas to grow as a community through volunteer-taught classes, sharing hobbies and skills with one another.

As well as offering local campus and community programs, UFM offers an outreach program. This program is available to help develop programs in rural Kansas which are attempting to keep people interested in living and participating in their communities.

The outreach program has highlighted the following three goals over the past year: to provide support to community-based educational programs through networking, technical assistance and regional workshops; to facilitate program development in community education by distributing information on available programs to interested communities and by assisting in developing these programs; and to disperse on a state and national basis the Kansas model of community education.

Another function of UFM is the appropriate technology program. The program was founded in 1978 and is a joint effort of UFM and the College of Architecture and Design. The program promotes self-reliance in areas of energy, food, shelter and waste management through classes, tours, seminars, demonstrations and hands-on co-ops, Maes said.

The Passive Solar Facility, located at UFM, is a solar greenhouse and aids students as both a training site and a research lab.

The solar greenhouse shows how edible plants can be grown year-around and the outdoor landscape shows a beautiful and edible garden for both the front yard and back yard which is adaptable for the aging and the handicapped, Maes said.

UFM publishes a catalog — featuring over 250 classes — and it is distributed three times annually. Registration for the current term will end Friday. UFM takes registration by mail, telephone or at the UFM house.

UFM was founded in 1967 and functions today with financial aid from K-State's Division of Continuing Education and Student Governing Association.

Over the years UFM has been responsible for such programs as Let's Recreate (a program of recreation designed for handicapped adults), the Ebony ball, the FONE Crisis Center, the Living Learning School and the Farmers' Market.

Long paid leaves rare for expectant mothers

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Most of the nation's major companies offer disability benefits to pregnant employees, but very few provide extended paid leaves, according to a survey released Wednesday.

Catalyst, a women's research group, said it also found an increasing number of companies offering some kind of "paternity benefits."

Although men and women are offered comparable unpaid leaves, men seldom take advantage of them, the group said.

Catalyst also found a "surprisingly" large number of women arranging to work part time for a period after returning from leave, with 60 percent of the companies saying that option had been granted.

The study said 75 percent of the firms said new mothers return on average within three months.

"Women return to work relatively quickly," Phyllis Silverman, Catalyst's director of career and family planning programs, said at a news conference announcing the survey's results.

The report said parental benefits are of growing concern to firms.

"Companies know that this is a hot potato," Silverman said. She said companies are torn between the short-term problem of getting the absent employee's work done and the long-term concern of attracting and keeping the best employees.

Forty-four percent of the labor force is comprised of women, and should be 50 percent by 1990, Catalyst said, predicting that 80 percent of these women will become pregnant at some point.

It said it got responses from 28.7 percent of the country's top 1,000 industrial firms and 500 biggest financial and service firms. The responses came from all regions of the country, Catalyst said.

The survey found 95 percent of those responding offer short-term disability benefits for pregnancy and that 51.7 percent offer extended unpaid leaves to women while 7.4 percent offer paid leave. About a third of those offering paid leave include men in the policy.

Disability is paid leave applying only to natural mothers. The Pregnancy Discrimination Act of 1978 makes a company's short-term disability policy treat pregnancy and childbirth as a disability.

This period spans the time when a woman is physically disabled by her condition, and varies, with 63 percent of the companies reporting five to eight weeks, 32 percent reporting nine to 12 weeks and 5 percent reporting one to four weeks.

Compensation varies more with the length of service than rank, Catalyst said. And the disability period is more often partially paid — by 57 percent of the companies — than fully paid — by 39 percent.

More than a third of the companies give men some unpaid leave compared to only 9 percent that offered some kind of paternity benefits in 1980, Catalyst said. But when men take leaves, they usually return sooner than the policy requires, it said.

Men often do not take the leaves, perhaps since they make more money than their wives and couples would lose more financially, it said.

While many firms offer men leaves, Catalyst said, the companies often believe such leaves are unreasonable, and that may discourage men from taking advantage of the offer.

Street name undesirable

By The Associated Press

HOPEWELL, Va. — A petition alleging "embarrassment of name" seeks a change of address for residents of Hooker Street.

"Anything but Hooker," John T. Topian told the City Council when the petition, signed by eight of the nine families living on the street, was presented Tuesday night.

The street is named after Maj. Gen. Joseph Hooker, who led Union forces in several Civil War battles. But residents say that when they give their address they often get funny looks from people who interpret the name in its slang meaning for prostitute.

"Each time — well, not every time — you give someone your address, they say 'Hooker' and snicker about it," said Jackie R. Smith.

But resident Michelle Jenkins said she opposed the change because it is important to preserve history.

"We're going to come across things in our lives that are going to cause a little ribbing, but we're not going to change those things. We're going to learn to live with it," she said.

Artists from five states plan to attend festival

About 160 artists from a five-state region, will be on hand to display their work at the Ninth Annual Arts and Crafts Festival this weekend in City Park.

The event, sponsored by the Manhattan Parks and Recreation Commission, will take place from 10 a.m. to 8 p.m. Friday and Saturday, and from noon until 4 p.m. Sunday, according to Don Cukjati, director of Arts in the Park and local crafts festivals.

"We will have all sorts of various crafts and artwork. It's just a very big affair. Last year we had a very large turnout and we are expecting the same for the festival this year," Cukjati said.

Special entertainment on the City Park stage will include folk singers Mark Selby and Criss Biggs at 8 p.m. Friday, and Southwind, a bluegrass band, 8 p.m. Saturday.

"I think one of the highlights will be the concert by Mark Selby and Criss Biggs on Friday night. Hopefully people will come for the day and then finish the evening with this fine concert," Cukjati said.

In addition to the exhibits from area artists and various food booths, there will be children's crafts workshops from 1 to 4 p.m. Friday through Sunday.

St. Mary Hospital Auxiliary will be fingerprinting children for the Ident-A-Kid program. Memorial Hospital will provide free blood pressure checks and the local Red Cross chapter will provide emergency care and health awareness information.

Cukjati said throughout the weekend, the Puppet Players and the K-State Complex Improvisational Theatre will be performing in the park at different areas and times throughout the day.

'Gremlins' hits viewers with fun, furry appeal

After seeing "Gremlins" you'll probably leave the theater assured that it was only a movie and could never happen in real life. Wrong.

I guarantee you that gremlins will be swarming through every American town next Christmas. There'll be "Gremlin" dolls, T-shirts, posters, pencil erasers, lunch boxes, notebooks and toilet seat covers. In fact, the invasion has already begun with a fast food chain offering "Gremlin" glasses with every grease burger.

My cynical side suspects there was a studio executive or even the makers of the film counting on life-imitating art in that way. Hollywood knows the box office is only part of big profits. But whatever inspired "Gremlins," it's a good time at the movies.

Although Steven Spielberg is only the executive producer, he obviously influenced director Joe Dante and screenwriter Chris Columbus to make "Gremlins" a Spielberg brand of movie. It's a special effects delight, has adorable and mischievous creatures, a misunderstood and slightly outcast hero (two of them, actually) and a story where evil — interesting and entertaining though it may be — ultimately loses out to good.

These qualities can be found in varying degrees in all of Spielberg's films.

"Gremlins" tells the story of what happens one Christmas when Billy Peltzer (Zach Galligan) gets a furry little pet called a mowagi from his eccentric inventor father played by Hoyt Axton. The mowagi (called Gizmo) comes with three "Thou shalt nots," all of which are disobeyed, of course, causing hundreds of nasty gremlins to be unleashed on the quaint village of Kingston Falls.

It's up to Billy, his soon-to-be-girlfriend Kate (Phoebe Cates), and Gizmo to save the town from the fun-loving, but destructive, little creatures.

As with any Spielberg film, the real star is the special effects. Gizmo is a hundred times more adorable than E.T. ever was (this can be proven scientifically by comparing the number of 'aws' from the audiences of both movies.) Whether he's climbing out of his box, driving a race car through a department store or just singing, Gizmo exudes cuteness. On the other hand, the gremlins are ugly and amazingly active. They attack the townspeople, smoke and drink in the local tavern, throw dishes, swing from ceiling fans, play poker — you name it.

LINCOLN KONKLE
Collegian Columnist

Watching the gremlins mimic human behavior, including pop cultural fads such as breakdancing, is where most of the film's humor comes from, as well as what Dante and Columbus try to say with the movie. The gremlins show us ourselves, doing what we do week in and week out.

At one point, we even see a theater filled with gremlins stuffing popcorn and candy into their faces — a lot like looking into the mirror. Perhaps that is why some people were grumbling their disappointment as I left the theater. We don't always like what we see in our reflections.

Anyway, for the money, "Gremlins" is the best movie of the summer so far. It's funny, touching and often very frightening. How all three are blended together in one story is a little amazing.

And there's still more fun if you're a film buff. "Gremlins" is filled with both obvious and subtle references to other movies. I can't wait for the "Gremlins" trivia test to come out but until then, I'd go see "Gremlins."

UPD schedules events; programs begin Friday

The Union Program Department has scheduled numerous events for this summer.

During the summer, "department" is used instead of "council" because the Union program staff members are mainly responsible for the summer events, not different committees as is done in the regular semester.

The Summer Artist Series, sponsored by the Student Governing Association Summer School Allocation Committee, Union Program Department, Department of Music and Manhattan Park and Recreation "Arts in the Park," begins Friday.

Mark Selby, a folk singer, will start the series at noon Friday in the Union Courtyard. He will also perform for the Arts in the Park Ninth Annual Arts and Crafts Festival at 8 p.m. Friday in City Park.

June 21, George Tompseo and Sugar Canyon Band will play a variety of music ranging from country to top 40 at 8 p.m. in City Park.

Hot Rize, a bluegrass band, will perform at 3:30 p.m. June 29 in the Union Courtyard. Hot Rize has four members: Tim O'Brien, Pete Warnick, Charles Sawtelle and Nick Forster.

Three-In-One, a contemporary Christian singing group, will perform at noon July 5 in the Catskeller.

Don Muro and his electronic band will perform in the Catskeller at noon July 13.

Vintage Jazz, a five-member group from Arkansas, concludes the summer series at noon July 26 in the Catskeller.

Performances, which are free, last about a half hour.

The Union's second floor Showcase Exhibit is featuring three different exhibits during the summer. Displayed until Friday are the University For Man Photography Contest winners.

Monday through July 6 Lindsay Smith's "New Prints and Paintings" will be featured.

The exhibit scheduled for July 9-27 will be announced at a later date.

The Union Art Gallery will display three exhibits through the summer. Currently, Barbara Reser's "Fragmented Images" is on on display until June 22.

Donald D. Perry will have his work on display June 25 through July 13. Perry's work consists of geometry and mechanics of construction. He is currently in the Division of Fine Art at Emporia State University.

Concluding the gallery shows, July 16-27, is ceramic work by Jeanneane Johnson, senior in fine arts, and Kevin Bailey, senior in fine arts.

The gallery is open 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday.

The Union Program Department also has 20 films scheduled to be shown this summer. All films begin at 8 p.m. in Forum Hall.

Boy George sees dummy likeness

LONDON — Wearing pink lipstick, yellow eye shadow and a green cloak, British rock star Boy George showed up at Madame Tussaud's wax museum Wednesday for the unveiling of his dummy likeness.

"It's very good but I wouldn't buy it," he said. "That would be too egotistical."

The figure goes on public display Thursday, Boy George's 23rd birthday, alongside those of such stars as Elvis Presley, David Bowie and tennis ace John McEnroe.

"It would have been quite nice to have been placed next to Princess Margaret in the exhibition," the singer said.

The queen's sister was quoted by the British press recently as having described Boy George as "an over-madeup tart."

Buckingham Palace later denied that she made the remark.

"I think the Princess Margaret incident did me a lot of good," Boy George said Wednesday. "I don't want the Corn Flakes seal of approval. I don't want to be accepted."

Hearst abduction 'exposed' need

SAN FRANCISCO — Michael Bortin, a former fugitive linked to the Symbionese Liberation Army, said the group's kidnapping of newspaper heiress Patty Hearst was worthwhile because it helped the poor in San Francisco.

"I liked the fact that by the kidnapping, they exposed how much poverty there was — seeing so many people in line for the food," Bortin said in an interview published Tuesday.

The Hearst family sponsored a $2 million food giveaway program in hopes of winning Hearst's release. The SLA did not release her, and she joined the tiny band of radicals. Hearst later said she had been brainwashed.

Bortin was interviewed by the San Francisco Examiner in his prison cell at the San Francisco County Jail.

He surrendered to authorities last month, after seven years in hiding, at the request of his dying mother. She died one day later.

"If you ask someone their dying request, you can't turn around and leave," Bortin said. "She said she wanted me to turn myself in."

He faces charges of falsifying a driver's license application and parole violation on a 1972 explosives charge.

Political extortionist leaves prison

ALLENWOOD, Pa. — Former Long Island Republican leader Joseph Margiotta left a federal prison Wednesday after serving half of a two-year term for fraud and extortion.

"I feel great, thank you," said Margiotta, smiling as he left the prison. "I'm delighted to be going home to my family and friends. I plan to concentrate on happy times."

Firing workers with seniority ruins incentive

The debate over the "last-hired, first-fired" rule drew to a legal close Tuesday when the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in favor of higher-seniority workers.

The decision means that minority workers hired on affirmative action programs probably will be laid-off first when an economic downturn occurs. The exception to this is when the "last-hired, first-fired" procedure would hurt a proven victim of discrimination.

The Supreme Court made the only fair decision on this sensitive issue. Protecting the rights of minority workers is important, and past Supreme Court decisions show a commitment do so. But, in this case, more was at stake than minority rights.

The goal of civil rights legislation is equality. It is not to ensure the jobs of some workers because of their race or sex — just as these factors should not keep workers from getting jobs.

Seniority-based job protection rewards workers who have contributed most to the company. Firing these workers before recently hired affirmative action employees destroys incentive to stay with one company and become a valued employee.

In the past, seniority rules have not protected minority workers. But affirmative action hiring has gone on long enough and many minority workers have moved into positions of greater seniority. The situation should continue to improve and minorities will no longer be the first to lose jobs in a recession.

'Star Wars' system promises more spending

The curtain was raised last week on Ronald Reagan's "Star Wars" defense system, so named because it extends the United State's defense system into outer space. The Pentagon announced Monday that a missile had successfully disabled a dummy intercontinental ballistic missile in outer space, well over 100 miles above the Earth's atmosphere.

With this event, the United States has made outer space a battlefield. At the cost of millions of dollars, America has jumped into a new sphere of military technology, foreshadowing further increases in military spending as the Soviet Union attempts to catch up to the United State's early lead in this field.

The technology in developing a defense system such as this is indeed incredible. One Defense Department official described this week's test as "hitting a bullet with a bullet." The new missile system has the ability to detect heat from a human body 1,000 miles away and does not require a nuclear explosion on impact with the enemy warhead, reducing risk to America's population.

As technology improves, these new "Star Wars" systems will become more and more sophisticated. Problems do exist in the present system. For example, the new systems cannot detect the difference between decoys and real missiles.

You can bet your tax dollar, or what's left of it, that spending in this field will increase even further in upcoming years. President Reagan has set the year 2000 as the target date for a working "Star Wars" system. By then, the Defense Department plan is to have both laser beam as well as conventional defense systems.

Unlike other weapons talks, the Soviets are more than willing to discuss regulations concerning outer space defense systems. Obviously, Russian leaders perceive a definite lead by the United States in this new defense capability, but whatever the Soviet reasons are, Reagan should consider dialogue on this issue.

With the name "Star Wars" defense system, many get the feeling this newest weapon danger is somehow glamorous compared to other machines of war. Although touted as a defense system, with better technology such as lasers, a weapon of this kind could easily be used offensively in a war situation.

Don't be fooled by the fairy-tale-like name of the new defense plan. This system is not in a galaxy far, far away — it is a danger that is in our own backyard.

For Burke, job led only to extreme frustration

Some people held it against her when the Rolling Stones didn't come to K-State, but Barbara Burke, former Union Program Council program adviser, put it bluntly, "K-State students are too middle of the road."

Burke resigned her position in the spring and is going to a similar job in Tennessee, where she says music is more important and more a part of people's lives.

She doesn't talk about her years at K-State with pessimism, as I would have suspected, but she acts as if the job experience has frustrated her. When asked how she thinks the new adviser, Janice Kiser, will handle the position, she says, "For what she has to work with, the best of luck."

More students should have looked at what Burke had to work with and maybe there could have been a better understanding of her position, but I doubt she wanted the students' sympathy.

The slogan, "Where the hell is Manhattan, Kansas?" says a lot. Promoters like traveling a straight route between highly-populated locations — Oklahoma City to Wichita to Kansas City. These cities are on routes that make touring easier and more practical. Manhattan is forced to sponge off any concert potential Salina has, which is minimal, and Topeka has, which is nil.

And if a band did make its way to K-State, where are they supposed to play? As Burke said, it extremely hard to schedule anything in Ahearn Field House during the spring semester because of the Department of Intercollegiate Athlete's rules about using the field house. For all practical purposes, K-State is limited to scheduling bands during the fall semester.

WAYNE PRICE

Other factors influencing K-State's lack of success in attracting major bands is the fact Manhattan isn't a magnet to top names, doesn't have a proper arena with enough seats to make a concert even alluringly profitable and most importantly, K-State's lousy track record.

Maybe some promoters would disregard the complications of coming to K-State, but few of them would risk their finances and invest in a concert here, which probably now is synonymous to purchasing ocean-front property in Tulsa, Okla.

Another reason for Burke's leaving, she said, was that there was no more money to work with after losing approximately $30,000 on the Ronnie Milsap and Stray Cats concerts.

Many students thought the Stray Cats concert was the final blow leading to concert destruction at K-State, but the Stray Cats had just sold out Kemper Arena in Kansas City, Mo. prior to their visit here. The group also had a new album high on the charts. A lot of K-State students couldn't understand why Journey, ZZ Top or The Police wouldn't come to K-State. The Stray Cats would.

The local cliché, "What about Shooting Star?" is probably an obnoxious ringing in Burke's ears. Shooting Star at K-State is compared to the discovery of penicillin by some students. Get Shooting Star and all the woes of having a concert will go away.

It may have been advantageous for Shooting Star to come to K-State but I think Burke was looking at the long run. Say she did get Shooting Star to come. Then what? Get them to come again for the next concert opportunity and the next and the next. Hey, they're OK, but they also make for a shallow argument. Even Shooting Star could get redundant.

I think Burke's problem was a lack of communication. She had a big-time mentality up against a large number of students with average taste which rarely deviated. Some students might feel that, since they indirectly pay her salary, she should have been on their level. I would rather pay for somebody who thinks bigger and has more ambition than for someone who thinks small and stubbornly.

Most people don't even read their fee card and know where their money is going anyway. They probably have many complaints, but Burke was just an easy scapegoat. Suddenly, students became worried consumers. People should condemn the church, not just the preacher. And the money for one concert ticket is what a lot of students exhaust in bars in one weekend.

Maybe the new coliseum will help. Time will tell. But Burke makes no bones about her job at K-State saying, "I don't judge a concert a success by how many tickets are sold but by how it's run, how it's set up and how smooth everything goes. And as far as that's concerned, I'm very good at running a concert."

Maybe K-State hasn't had the gold mines when it comes to concerts, but Barbara Burke certainly got the shaft.

Letters

Editorial needs clarification

Editor,

Re: Wayne Price's editorial, "Students lose with shorter summer session" in Tuesday's Collegian.

I don't see why Mr. Price thinks that faculty members derive some advantage from lengthy class periods and short sessions. In any case, he does not specify what this advantage is. As his editorial reaches critical mass, it becomes apparent that he perceives the University as a grocery store with convenient hours of operation and, of course, well-packaged products within easy reach.

With the passion of a no-nonsense consumer, Mr. Price argues that summer sessions provide insufficient instruction, yet generate excessive information. I am not sure what he is getting at, but I shudder to think what he means by "practical instruction" and "smaller doses" of information. Above all, I shudder when Mr. Price uses phrases such as "bombarded at," "falls to the extreme," and "instructors fighting to get all the information out," not to mention "a slightly bit tedious." It is, however, Mr. Price's concluding sentence that captures his style and point of view: "The question is whether their time should be hurried through the University system the way their tuition is." Need I say more?

Burglaries increase in Manhattan area

By LYNN TALPERS
Collegian Reporter

June has been declared Burglary Prevention Month. Riley County Police Department Director Alvan Johnson said the number of burglaries in the Manhattan area is increasing.

"As a rule, burglaries increase when the economy levels out," he said.

Sgt. Stephen P. Cutler, special projects and community service officer at RCPD, said this is because money is harder to obtain, so people steal.

Another contributing factor is the "increase in working wives," Cutler said. This makes homes easier targets during the day.

"We're noticing, too, that there are a number of garage burglaries," Johnson said.

"Tools to break in are in the garage and if it is attached, the burglar can work unseen," states the "Crime Prevention Tips for the Citizen" pamphlet prepared by and available at the police department.

"Failure to practice the fundamental techniques of home protection facilitated the estimated 383 burglaries committed in our city last year," Johnson said.

Cutler said most of these preventative measures are just common sense.

"People just don't take the time to think about them. The rush of daily living gets in the way," he said.

While at home, one should "take extra care to guard against intruders...your personal safety is also at stake," states the booklet "How to Protect Your Home and Family Against Burglary." Keeping all doors locked and never opening the door to a stranger are two ways to prevent a burglary while at home.

Installing a chain lock and a one-way door viewer will help to identify visitors, as well as asking for proper credentials from door-to-door salespeople. "Report any solicitor or salesman without proper credentials to the police," advises the booklet.

According to the booklet, locking all doors and windows may prevent a robbery. A lock set "using solid-brass pin-tumbler construction allows for more keying combinations, thus reducing the chance of other keys operating your lock." Also, double-key deadbolts on doors near windows may prevent a burglar from taking bulky items that won't fit through the windows.

Sliding glass doors "are frequent points of entry," states the "Residential Security" pamphlet prepared by the Kansas Bureau of Investigation. The KBI recommends both blocking the door with a bar or broomstick and installing screws into the upper door frame. This will prevent burglars from lifting the door from its track.

Windows can be secured with a lock or bar to prevent opening. Cutler says a more permanent protective measure is to "drill holes into the window sash and place a dowel or nail into it to prevent the window opening past that point."

"It's a known fact that light is one of the best deterrents to crime, yet most homeowners go out for an evening and leave their homes completely dark," states Cutler's report, "Home Burglaries Growing."

The report recommends plugging lights into an electric timer while the occupants are away. A light burning continuously is a good giveaway that no one is home. Leaving a radio playing on a timer will create the illusion that someone is home. Televisions can also be plugged into timers, the report states.

"An unexpected noise can frighten away a burglar attempting to enter your home," according to the booklet "How to Protect Your Home and Family Against Burglary." A burglar alarm attached to all doors and windows is inexpensive and effective, Cutler said.

One should notify the post office, the newspaper office, the police and neighbors when planning to be away. The post office can arrange to have mail held there until you return. Amy Tucker, a postal employee, said that only a day's notice is necessary to stop delivery and that one must be away for a minimum of three days.

The Manhattan Mercury will accept temporary stop notices up to 10 days before departure and will deliver all missed papers on the day you return, employee Charlene Smith said.

Cutler stresses it is important to "arrange with a friend to mow the lawn and sweep your sidewalk once a week and to pick up any circulars or handbills that may be left on your porch." Many Neighborhood Watch committees will do this.

The police department will check a home periodically if the residents notify the department that they will be gone.

"We don't do apartments. We will check doors and windows for signs of entry," said Cutler.

Operation Identification is used by the police to locate stolen possessions. The police department will provide an engraver and issue an identification number to individuals to mark belongings.

"We had 154 bicycles stolen since January 1983. If they're not marked, we have no way of finding out who they belong to," Cutler said.

It is important to "mark anything of value that a burglar (or two) could cart away," according to the "Operation Identification" booklet. All identification numbers are entered into the National Crime Information computer.

If one gets robbed, any serial numbers of items stolen and their Operation Identification numbers should be turned over to the police. This will facilitate recovery.

A pawnshop is not a good place to locate stolen items.

"People who steal know better than to deal with pawnshops. They know that we cooperate with the police," said Bruce Michal, manager of Manhattan Pawn Shop Inc.

Every time an item is brought in for pawn or sale, the broker will write down the serial numbers and any engraved numbers on the receipt. A copy of the slip is given to the police department. This information is then put into the national computer, which will discover if the item has been reported stolen, Michal said.

"A lot of students will bring valuables down to pawn for small amounts of money around vacation time," Michal said. "They know that it's safer here."

Drug provides relief for repeat of herpes

By The Associated Press

BOSTON — Researchers say a new drug provides the first effective treatment for repeated flareups of genital herpes, largely eliminating the rash and pain that are the chief misery of this common disease.

The drug does not cure herpes, and its long-term safety must still be tested. But for those who have taken it, the medicine "has made an enormous impact on the quality of their lives," said Dr. Stephen E. Straus, a government scientist.

The medicine, a capsule form of the drug acyclovir, is considered experimental and is not available for routine use. Herpes is so widespread, however, that once approved, this drug could become one of the most widely prescribed medicines in the United States.

Besides helping those who already have the disease, researchers hope that acyclovir capsules may someday be used to keep people from catching the sexually transmitted herpes virus.

Acyclovir is already on the market as a prescription ointment sold under the brand name Zovirax. The ointment helps speed healing of the first outbreak of infection, but is worthless against recurring outbreaks of the painful rash and sores. Earlier research has shown that the capsules also hasten healing if people take them after symptoms appear.

Burroughs Wellcome, which makes acyclovir, has asked the Food and Drug Administration to approve the capsules for prescription sales. "We expect to hear from the FDA in the next couple of months," said company spokesman Dulcie Straughan.

It's estimated that there are 10 million to 20 million herpes victims in the United States.

Two studies on use of the new medicine to suppress herpes were published in last Thursday's New England Journal of Medicine. Even though they found that the capsules eliminated or greatly reduced the frequency of the flareups, no one was cured. When the virus isn't causing a rash, it lies dormant in the victim's nerve roots. All the patients studied soon started having the rash again when they were taken off the drug.

In the studies, people took the capsules two to five times daily for four months. All had been plagued by frequent episodes of rash that typically occurred at least once a month.

SAILING

Henry Jones and Jeff Oaklief carry sailing equipment to the waterfront.

Marge and Charles Oaklief stand with their son, Greg, near several sailboats they own. The Oaklief's bought their first boat just after they were married, and later introduced their sons to sailing.

A family passion

Sailing takes me away to where I always heard it should be just a dream and the wind to carry me and soon I will be free

Christopher Cross sings of fantasy in his 1981 hit, "Sailing" — the fantasy of the wind's symphony of song, carefree waves of relaxation and freeness of spirit.

Charles and Marge Oaklief know that fantasy.

The Oaklief's and their sons, Jeff, 20, and Greg, 18, are a family of the sea, lake and ocean, and they have turned a one-boat hobby into a multi-boat family affair.

For Charles, associate professor in adult education, it all began back in the waters of Ohio when he was a member of the Ohio State University sailing club. His interest was prompted by his family's background.

"My family has a history in agriculture and boat building," he said. "Some were boat builders and sailors and continue to be to this day."

Charles later married Marge, who shared his interest in water activities, and they have enjoyed a lifetime of sailing ever since.

"I had some experience in boating and sailing before (marriage) but we took it up together," Charles said. "The first thing we bought after we were married was a boat."

"My husband mainly has been the one interested in sailing, and he got us all interested in it," Marge said. "We've always liked boating; it has always, more or less, been our family hobby. That's how it all started and we've been sailing ever since."

Charles and Marge soon incorporated their sons into the world of sailing.

"They (Jeff and Greg) started pretty young because they were 3 and 5 when we learned to sail at the University of Wisconsin. They were almost always on the boats with us," Marge said.

"My parents took a sailing class at the University of Wisconsin and they taught us from what they learned from that class," said Greg, K-State sophomore in general, whose first recollections of those sailing events were on small lakes with his parents.

Those earlier moments in the water led not only to a lifetime hobby, but an extra job as well, with Marge currently heading the instruction of canoeing, sailing and windsurfing classes offered through the Division of Continuing Education. Jeff, senior in architecture, also teaches, as Charles and Greg did in previous years.

The classes, each held twice a week at Tuttle Creek Reservoir, offer all the basic techniques to help even the most naive water enthusiast make the big splash into the world of water sports, said Marge, who is certified by the American Red Cross Association to teach both canoeing and sailing.

"We always start out assuming that people have no past experience in sailing, windsurfing or canoeing," she said. "When students come into the class we teach them the names of the parts of the boats, how to rig the boats and how to operate the boat safely."

Mastering these sports is not as difficult as it looks, Marge said, even for those young in age and especially for the young at heart.

"Windsurfing is the most difficult, whereas canoeing and sailing both take about the same amount of skill," Marge said. "We all feel that everybody ought to have the opportunity to sail. Age doesn't really limit one very much."

"Sailing itself is not difficult," said Charles. "I consider it easy to learn."

"Students spend approximately 18 hours on the boat (during the course) and after that they're usually pretty good," Jeff said.

With the knowledge the Oaklief's have acquired they have sailed the Great Lakes, the Florida Keys, Cape Cod, Chesapeake Bay and the Caribbean Islands — a few of the many places that this water-wandering family has traveled. The family took a 90-day sail which encompassed over 1,400 miles of sailing in the Pacific Northwest, and, as Charles admits, quite a bit of family togetherness.

"Sailing has many advantages for a family," he said. "It teaches appreciation of people because when you're on a sail boat you don't have a lot of room. You're like peas in a pod. It teaches respect and patience."

And this respect and patience goes hand in hand with the skill required to make a family voyage such as this possible, Charles said.

"We can't function unless everyone knows what they're doing, knows how to do it well and knows how to do it rapidly. It's critical in offshore sailing that you end up where you're going or you might end up in the Bermuda Triangle," Charles said jokingly.

But the skill that sailing teaches is not the only advantage that this water sport offers. The individual challenge and solitude are but a few of sailing's benefits, Greg said.

"You can really get wrapped up in your sailing," he said. "It's a challenge. If you get out in really heavy wind you just have to work harder."

"I enjoy it (sailing) tremendously," Jeff said. "It's a skill and just being able to do it is rewarding. It's a lot of fun."

Contrary to what many believe, the Kansas sailing enthusiast doesn't need to look to the far-away lakes and oceans for an abundance of water. Some of the best boating possibilities are nearby.

"We moved to Kansas which most people think is a dry state," Charles said. "We were absolutely amazed at all the water that is in Kansas."

"We like it because once you get out sailing it's very relaxing and yet challenging because every weather condition offers a new challenge," Marge said.

So much challenge and relaxation, in fact, that the family spends virtually all its sporting time engaged in some water activity. It's time that Charles gets very little of anymore.

"I don't get to sail enough," he said. "I'm just too busy. We usually do our sailing during vacation."

"On weekends I try to come out and do sailing and windsurfing," Jeff said. "I come out by myself and do it for the fun of it."

"We gave up all our other hobbies for sailing, windsurfing and canoeing," Marge said. "We don't have any time for anything else."

Nothing else but the sun, wind and waves — as this family attempts to keep its aqua activities afloat for many sailing years to come.

"It's just good, clean fun," Charles said.

Kansas City tops Seattle, 6-4

By The Associated Press

SEATTLE — Steve Balboni's RBI single capped a four-run first inning and relief ace Dan Quisenberry preserved the victory with three strong innings at the end as the Royals beat the Seattle Mariners 6-4 Wednesday night.

Larry Gura, 7-2, staked to a 4-0 lead, worked his way into the sixth before encountering control problems. Gura left with the bases loaded and no outs. Joe Beckwith struck out the side but allowed two runners to score in the process.

Quisenberry allowed just one hit in the final three innings to notch his American League-leading 16th save. The loser: Seattle starter Matt Young, now 4-4.

The Royals rapped out 10 hits off Seattle pitching led by two hit performances by second baseman Frank White and Center fielder Willie Wilson, who also batted in a pair of runs and stold his 11th base for the Kansas City cause.

Alvin Davis was the hitting star for the Mariners, hitting 3 for 4 while Al Cowens ripped two base hits for Seattle.

Tonight the Royals will conclude their three game series with the Mariners, sending Bud Black, 6-4, against Seattle's Jim Beattie, 4-7. Friday, the Royals will travel home to begin a series facing the Minnesota Twins for a three game series.

K-State's Colbert set for pro game

Cary Colbert, an all-Big Eight conference performer on last season's K-State baseball team, will soon be playing professional baseball with the Bristol (Va.) Tigers, a minor league organization affiliated with the major league Detroit Tigers.

Colbert was drafted in the 27th round of the major league collegiate draft last week. Colbert left Manhattan Tuesday for Bristol to join the Tigers' roster at the catcher position.

Being drafted by this year's hottest major league team topped off an eventful year for Colbert, that saw him hit .376, with nine home runs and 41 runs batted in. Colbert was the first 'Cat player gaining all-conference since 1978, when catcher Tim Pepper made the all-league squad.

Colbert began his collegiate career at the University of Iowa. After his transfer to K-State, it was undetermined whether he would lose a year of college eligibility due to the school switch. However, because of an NCAA ruling which made him a redshirt player his first year at Iowa, Colbert was allowed to play for the Wildcats in 1984. This decision was made only 17 days before the start of the '84 season.

Colbert had another obstacle to overcome. This season, he suffered an elbow injury that prevented him from fully extending his arm. After it healed, Colbert stepped into the designated hitter's role for the 'Cats, along with limited duty at first base and catcher.

K-State Coach Bill Hickey said he believes Colbert has a good chance to do well playing professionally.

"Cary Colbert can create as much bat speed as anybody in professional baseball," he said. "We'll miss his offensive punch next year."

Hickey added that a key to Colbert's success might be how well he does when he has an opportunity to play.

"He'll have to be hot the first day he shows up," Hickey said.

Runners ready for 10K race

The fifth annual Bridge to 'Burg 10K Road Race will be held this Saturday. Runners are set to begin the 6.2 mile course at 9 a.m., two miles east of Randolph on Highway 16, at the entrance to Fancy Creek State Park. The course runs along Kansas Highway 16 to the finish line in Olsburg.

Age brackets for the run include 13 and under, 14-17, 18-23, 24-29, 30-39, 40-49, and 50 and over in men's and women's divisions.

In team competition, three runners will make up a team and the age group they run in will be determined by their combined age. Men's division age groups are 75 and under, 76-120, and 121 and over. Women's age groups are 90 and under and 91 and over.

Individual and team entry fees of $6 will be accepted until 7 a.m. this Friday. Individuals wishing to enter on Saturday will pay an entry fee of $7. Team entry fees will not be accepted after Friday. A T-shirt is included with the $6 entry fee. Runners who do not want a T-shirt may pay a $4 entry fee by Friday a $5 entry fee on Saturday.

Club looks to the 4th

The Fourth of July is always a popular day to get out in the sun and hit the water, as large crowds seem to flock Tuttle Creek to hit the beach. But along with the swimming and sunning this year will be a show that glides across the water.

The Flint Hills Water Ski Club is putting together an acrobatic ski show for the Fourth of July Celebration held at the River Pond Area, according to Steve McDermit, president of the Flint Hills Water Ski Club and director of the skiing show.

"We have members of both community and University volunteers. Actually, the ratio is nearing 50-50 with people interested and who enjoying skiing," McDermit said.

Although plans for the show are running smoothly, McDermit said there is still room for more individuals who would be interested in joining the show.

"We would like to have more participation for this show. We've got the ski boats and the equipment, and we have received help from around the community, but we are still looking for more skiers, especially girl skiers," he said.

"Hopefully, the members of the show will be decided about two weeks in advance so we could still add skiers if they were interested until about next Wednesday."

McDermit said the club will be doing several different routines in the show including, clown acts, youth skiing, pyramids and double skiing.

City, county boards may close meetings

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Kansas Open Meetings Law specifically exempts city and county planning commissions and permits them to deliberate in private when making recommendations as to the zoning of land, Attorney General Robert Stephan said Wednesday.

In a non-binding legal opinion, Stephan told Donald Hoffman, attorney for the Topeka-Shawnee County Planning Commission, the planning commissions' deliberations are "quasi-judicial rather than legislative" and may deliberate in closed session "as a specific exemption" to the open meetings law.

"There can be no question but that planning commissions are public bodies or agencies which are subject to the provisions of the Open Meetings Act," Stephan said in his opinion. "While deliberations may be held in private session for quasi-judicial matters, no other business may be so discussed and any vote or other binding action must be taken in public."

Hoffman also asked Stephan whether the commission could speed up the voting process and avoid a one-month delay between the time of an initial hearing and the final vote on a topic. Hoffman asked if the commissioners could "sign off" on formal findings of facts and conclusions of law after the hearing but before the next monthly meeting.

Stephan said preparing the conclusions in written form and allowing the commissioners to concur or disagree with them prior to the next meeting would be open to challenge.

"The Open Meetings Law only exempts deliberations made in quasi-judicial matters, not binding action in the form of votes, which must be taken in public, open session," Stephan said. Circulating the proposed findings and conclusions would contravene this because the commissioners would be making the decision during a closed session or prior to the public session.

"In that (state law) requires the commission to adopt its recommendations by affirmative vote at the conclusion of the hearing, it is not possible to have a binding vote before such recommendations, in the form of specific findings, are prepared."

In other opinions, Stephan said state law prohibits the sale or consumption of alcohol or beer at any location open to the general public. He said it does not matter if the building or location is privately owned.

Stephan also told Jerry L. Harper, Douglas County district attorney, a license to sell beer is not necessary at functions where admission is charged but the beer is free.

"Cereal malt beverages may be dispensed at functions where an admission is charged, only if no part of the admission charge is directly or indirectly used to pay for the cereal malt beverage," Stephan told Harper.

Stephan said state law clearly restricts the sale or consumption of liquor or alcohol to private locations, such as clubs licensed by the state.

And he said it would be illegal to offer free alcoholic liquor or "strong beer" at a function, such as a dance or concert, because the general public has access for the price of admission. However, Stephan said state law draws a clear distinction between alcoholic liquor and cereal malt beverages — weak beer with an alcohol content of 3.2 percent or less which is legally sold to people aged 18-20.

"Such clubs are private in that they are open to members only, who have been granted membership only after paying a membership fee, waiting ten days and being screened for good moral character," Stephan said. "Cereal malt beverage is treated differently than alcoholic liquor under Kansas law and can be consumed in public legally."

House OKs illegal alien hiring law

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The House, in an effort to discourage foreigners from crossing the borders of the United States in search of work, voted Wednesday to make it a crime to hire illegal aliens.

Anyone hiring three or more unlawful aliens would be violating the law. He would get a warning for a first offense and a fine for second offenses. The fines could go as high as $2,000 for each violation.

Under a Senate-passed bill, a person guilty of a "continued pattern of offenses" could go to jail for six months.

Opponents urged rejection, arguing it would lead to discrimination against all Hispanics in this country, whether here legally or not.

But the House voted 304-120 to reject an alternative offered by the chamber's Hispanic bloc, which called for increasing enforcement of existing labor laws to discourage exploiting illegal immigrant labor.

Penalties for hiring illegal aliens are the enforcement heart of a bill designed to curtail the flow of millions of unlawful immigrants.

Another key element would allow illegal aliens who have lived in the United States since 1982 to stay legally and ultimately apply for citizenship if they can show they have jobs, good moral character and good health and are unlikely to become wards of the state.

The Senate bill carries a similar if less lenient amnesty. Differences will be ironed out after the House acts on the bill.

Sponsors of the House's immigration control bill scoffed at the Hispanic bloc's plan and said it was intended to scuttle their effort to stem the influx of workers over U.S. borders.

"If this amendment is adopted, the bill is killed," said Rep. Romano L. Mazzoli, D-Ky. "It is dead in the water; it goes nowhere."

The amendment was offered by Rep. Edward Roybal, D-Calif., leading the fight of the 11-member Hispanic caucus in the House to weaken a bill they say would encourage discrimination against anyone with a dark skin or a foreign accent.

"The tide is not going with us," a glum Rep. Robert Garcia, D-N.Y., speaking for the Hispanics, told the House. Privately, he told a reporter: "Things don't look good."

The Hispanics, joined by some but not all House liberals, are lined up against a powerful bloc of unusual allies — the Reagan administration, the AFL-CIO and the Business Roundtable. The AFL-CIO believes illegal labor lowers wages and takes jobs from citizens.

The Roybal alternative approach would authorize federal expenditures of up to $30 million a year on enforcing laws dealing with maximum hours, minimum wages, child labor and workplace health and safety.

In some places, such laws have never been enforced, argued Rep. E. (Kika) de la Garza, D-Texas. Enforcing them would take the profit out of employing illegal aliens and at the same time would "clean up the sweatshops" for all American workers, he said.

Mazzoli's bill takes a different approach. It would impose warnings and fines on people who hire illegal aliens — a practice not now unlawful. He argued that is the only way to be sure there will be no jobs waiting to lure immigrants from Mexico, other places in Latin America and other poor regions of the world.

Fines as high as $2,000 for each illegal alien employed could be imposed on repeat offenders.

Originally, an employer could have gone to prison for a fourth offense. But the House voted Wednesday to delete the prison terms and to fix the maximum fine at $2,000 per illegal alien hired.

On Tuesday night, the House also voted to exempt all people — except agricultural contractors who provide migrant workers — from the provisions of the bill if they hire three or fewer illegal workers.

That meant that households hiring an illegal alien to do housework, or take care of children or mow the lawn would be exempt. So would small businessmen who hire fewer than three undocumented workers.

Perez de Cuellar visits Middle East

U.N. leader hints at peacemaking role

By The Associated Press

JERUSALEM — The U.N. secretary-general said Wednesday his five-nation tour of the Middle East was meant to prepare him for a possible United Nations role as peacemaker between the Arabs and Israel.

Javier Perez de Cuellar also said he was encouraged by the interest Arab and Israeli leaders have shown in seeking a peaceful solution to the region's problems.

After his tour, he said it was too early to "digest the positions put forward by the various governments."

"But what I can say, which in some way is encouraging, is the fact that all leaders I have met are interested in a peaceful solution of the problem," he told a news conference.

"I have to make my own assessment of the situation in order to be prepared to take perhaps an initiative when the time comes," he said before heading for Tel Aviv to board a chartered jet.

He was due back in New York on Thursday after an overnight stop in Switzerland.

The nine-day tour took him to Egypt, Syria, Lebanon and Jordan before he arrived in Israel on Tuesday.

While publicly insisting here that "the time is always ripe for peace," the former Peruvian diplomat is known to feel that it would be premature to start thinking in terms of his undertaking a mediation effort.

He has emphasized that his office has political limitations, and it is doubtful that he would launch any initiative without a mandate.

Before leaving New York, he indicated the peacemaking field was wide open because a "diplomatic vacuum" had been created by the failure of Western initiatives.

While the Arab leaders he met supported a proposed U.N. peace conference involving all the adversaries and the two superpowers, Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir of Israel and opposition leader Shimon Peres both categorically rejected the idea.

Guineans hear tales of inhumanities

By The Associated Press

CONAKRY, Guinea — Almost every evening, in the gathering darkness of the West African coast, Guineans huddle around their radios, listening to stories of horror and inhumanity.

Since the military seized power here more than two months ago, state-run Radio Conakry has invited former political prisoners to recount their treatment at Camp Boiro, the dreaded prison of the deposed civilian regime.

There are accounts of electric-shock torture to extract confessions, of long stretches of malnourishment, of prolonged confinement in dank, crowded cells scarcely larger than closets.

Untold hundreds, perhaps thousands, of Guineans were imprisoned at Camp Boiro during the rule of President Ahmed Sekou Toure, one of the first generation of revolutionary leaders who led African nations to independence.

Toure, one of the earliest and most vigorous opponents of French rule in black Africa, ruled from 1958 until he died March 26 after emergency heart surgery in Cleveland, Ohio. Once an ally of the Soviet Union, Sekou Toure later sought closer relations with the United States and was warmly received at the White House in 1982.

Sekou Toure was frequently accused of abuses by such human rights organizations as Amnesty International, but the degree of his regime's harshness has only emerged since the April 3 military coup.

The evening radio program, called "The Floor is Yours" ("La Parole Est a Vous"), has forced Guineans to re-evaluate their old leader.

"We didn't know who he was or what he was until after his death," said Mohamed Kaba Bangoura, a foreign ministry official who was a bureaucrat during Sekou Toure's reign. "I didn't know what happened at Camp Boiro. And when I heard how they treated man, I said, 'No — we were in the dark.' It was a regime of intolerance."

While Sekou Toure was alive, former inmates at Camp Boiro generally kept silent. "Leaving Boiro, you said nothing. You knew that if you didn't keep quiet, you would go back. And if you went back, it was certain death," said Dr. Ibrahim K. Barry, who spent seven years at the prison.

Camp Boiro is a ramshackle, walled military compound not far from where Sekou Toure's body was buried in Conakry, Guinea's decaying capital.

The tight rows of dank, tin-roofed cells, some of them no larger than 6½ feet by 11½ feet, are empty now. But the walls bear traces of suffering.

In cell number 52, someone etched "God save me" in blood and dated the inscription June 1978.

The most dreaded part of Camp Boiro was the "head of death," high-walled chambers where, visitors are told, no prisoner came out alive. The walls are grotesquely adorned with small, neatly stenciled skulls, and the rooms open onto a common courtyard. During the summer rainy season, the courtyard would fill with water which spilled into the cells.

"As many as four, five or six prisoners died here a day," said Lt. Lansana Maen, who serves as a guide.

Former inmates said they suffered excruciating electric-shock torture upon arriving at the prison.

The Bridge to 'Burg 10K road race proved to be an uphill battle. See page 5.

York sculptor Duane Hanson. Over 75,000 people viewed Hanson's 23-piece exhibition during its stay in Wichita.

Life-like sculptures show human faults

By TIM CARPENTER
Collegian Reporter

WICHITA — Last week at the Edwin A. Ulrich Museum of Art in Wichita, a group of people exited an elevator on its way to viewing a special exhibition. One visitor rushed ahead of the others and asked for directions from a solemn-looking man leaning against a hand cart. The man stubbornly refused to reply or even acknowledge the visitor's presence.

The visitor, miffed, grumbled his thanks and quickly turned away only to wheel around with a look of pleasant surprise as he realized he was not talking to a living being, but looking at a Duane Hanson sculpture.

Hanson, a 59-year-old sculptor from New York, brought his 23-piece exhibition of life-like sculptures to the Ulrich Museum on the Wichita State University campus.

The exhibition represented the only showing of that assemblage of Hanson's work in the United States. The program attracted more than 75,000 people during its 50-day run at the university. The exhibitions will soon be flown to Japan for a two-month tour where millions of people are expected to view it.

"Hanson has gained a much-deserved reputation as a gifted sculptor, a rare artist, who combined a keen interest in human personality with an authentic and original style to produce stunningly original works of art," said Martin H. Bush, curator of the museum.

Hanson not only called attention to the good things about America in his sculptures, but also the failures of society.

In 1970, Hanson produced "Man with Hardhat." On the surface, the work seems to be a celebration of the significance of the hard-working blue-collar laborer in America. But the sculpture also has a dazed, thoughtless expression. The laborer appears more devoted to the can of beer in his hand and pack of cigars in his shirt pocket.

"I have a feeling and affection for blue-collar workers," Hanson said. "I can show the realities of life through them; the cement on a man's hands, the paint spattered on his clothes — these are the telltale things that describe people like that."

Each sculpture is designed to tell a story. "Artist with Ladder," is a sculpture of a tired looking man with old boots and clothing riddled with holes. His pants are held together with black electrician's tape.

"He was perfect," Hanson said of the man from whom he obtained the clothes. "He had worn those old boots for years, and they were all covered with resin and paint."

"The clothes are great just as they are."

Hanson bought all of the artist's clothes, including his folding ladder and included them in his sculpture.

Hanson's satire, combined with a

Elections characterized by Solidarity boycotts

By The Associated Press

WARSAW, Poland — Solidarity backers demonstrated in three cities Sunday and many boycotted Poland's first nationwide elections in four years.

Lech Walesa joined about 10,000 people in the Baltic port of Gdansk for a midday Roman Catholic mass for underground leader Bogdan Lis, captured by police a week ago, Western reporters said.

Afterwards, several hundred worshippers chanted pro-Solidarity slogans and tossed boycott leaflets into the air, but police did not interfere and the protest soon broke up, the reporters said.

In the Krakow suburb of Nowa Huta, more than 1,000 backers of the now-outlawed Solidarity labor group chanted "Regime, go away" and similar slogans, government spokesman Jerzy Urban said.

State-run TV showed workers hurling rocks at riot police.

These reports did not say whether force was used in dispersing the demonstrators and eyewitness accounts were not immediately available.

In Warsaw, where Solidarity urged backers to hold peaceful marches after morning Masses, some 250 gathered in one election district and briefly walked in silence before dispersing, Western reporters said.

No other demonstrations were reported in the capital.

Several Western newsmen were detained briefly by police in Warsaw as they covered the demonstrations and elections, which were to fill 110,428 seats on local and regional advisory councils.

Solidarity leaders had urged a boycott of the election to protest suppression of the union that began with martial law in December 1981.

Communist authorities screened all candidates, and the government and the union saw voter turnout as the true test of support. Both sides said they would provide an estimate of the turnout, but the results promised to be impossible to confirm independently.

The election was the first for Poland's 26 million voters since the birth of Solidarity in August 1980.

Solidarity supporters in some cases tried to embarrass those who voted. About 40 union backers stood across the street from one Warsaw polling station near St. Stanislaw Kostka Church after a mid-morning Mass, clapping and jeering voters.

"They get ashamed when you watch them come out after voting," said one woman in her 60s, who said she was a doctor. She said she was collecting turnout figures for Solidarity.

Several voters approached by Western correspondents and cameramen refused to be interviewed or photographed.

One retired economist, a 61-year-old Communist Party member, said he cast his ballot because "we have to live in an organized state."

The ballots listed two candidates for each post but did not give political affiliations. If voters cross out all the names, or deface the ballot, the top name listed for each post will get the vote.

Urban last week predicted a turnout in the 65-80 percent range, acknowledging it would not reach the usual 99 percent level officially reported in Soviet bloc countries.

In a random, unscientific sampling of 43 people in Warsaw, AP reporters found 17 who said they were voting, 25 boycotting and one undecided.

Iraq may begin assault after alleged violation

By The Associated Press

A top Iraqi military chief said Sunday Iraq may have to begin a preventive assault on Iran after allegations that Iranian forces violated a cease-fire on civilian targets. Iran denied it.

Meanwhile, Arab nations, anxious to prevent indiscriminate bombing of commercial shipping — particularly oil tankers — in the Persian Gulf area, urged a broader U.N.-mediated cease-fire in the war.

Iran flatly denied Iraq's charge that Iranian forces violated the U.N.-arranged agreement by shelling an Iraqi border village. Iran's armed forces chief of staff was quoted by Iran's official news agency as saying the accusation was "meant solely to justify unwarranted (Iraqi) attacks" on Abadan, an Iranian oil center.

Iraqi Gen. Maher Abdul-Rasheed, in a statement distributed by the Kuwait News Agency, said "a preventive attack on Iranian troop emplacements is not to be discounted." He cited recently acquired Soviet-made missiles of "high destructive strength, which will be ready to greet waves of Iranians in the next offensive."

The general, who controls forces near Basra, said Iran has some 200,000 regulars for a Basra offensive, possibly "within days."

The Iranians in February tried a major offensive into the Basra area where, he said, the Iraqis killed 15,000 and wounded 25,000.

He contended Iran was "not sincere" in accepting the U.N.-brokered moratorium on attacking Iraqi and Iranian border civilian areas.

In a report by the Iranian news agency IRNA, monitored in Cyprus, Brig. Gen. Qasemali Zahir-Nejad, chief of staff of the Iranian armed forces, called the shelling accusation "utterly false. Iran has not shelled or otherwise attacked residential quarters in Iraq ever since June 12," the date the cease-fire took effect.

IRNA quoted Zahir-Nejad saying despite the agreement, the Iraqis had "rained artillery fire" on Abadan and a nearby suburb.

The Bahrain-based Gulf News Agency said Sunday Iran would not heed calls for peace until it reached economic collapse. Iraq's strategic objective has been to sap Iran's economy by stopping oil exports. It said Iran spends about $1 billion a month to keep the war going.

As a result of Iraq's attacks on Iran's Kharg Island, its main oil shipping terminal in the gulf, Iranian exports "have dropped by more than 50 percent," the agency said.

It said Iraq's crude oil exports also had been cut by more than half as a result of the conflict, which started in September 1980.

Prime minister-elect calls for visit

Turner vows improved ties with U.S.

By The Associated Press

OTTAWA — John Turner, winner of the campaign to succeed retiring Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau, promises to improve U.S. ties without compromising Canada's independent outlook.

Turner, a corporate lawyer from Toronto, said Saturday night he hopes to meet soon with President Reagan and hopes for closer ties with the United States "while preserving our own economic and political independence and our independent foreign policy."

Turner will take over as prime minister in about two weeks — the exact date has not been set — ending a 16-year era in which Trudeau has given Canada unusual prominence on the world stage.

Turner is expected to be more conciliatory than the prickly, intellectual Trudeau, both within Canada and internationally.

Turner said he expected there would always be problems in Canadian-U.S. ties, but hoped to improve "the atmosphere in which those problems are met." He said it was important to counter "the rising mood of protectionism in the United States," and suggested a bilateral clean air treaty to deal with the issue of acid rain.

Under Trudeau, Canada made little headway in persuading the Reagan administration to launch a large-scale controls program on acid rain.

Turner has a head start on good U.S. relations because of a decade-long friendship with Secretary of State George Shultz. They met when Turner was finance minister and Shultz was his counterpart, treasury secretary, in the Nixon administration.

Turner said he would make job creation his top priority. Economic recovery has not been nearly as robust in Canada as in the United States, and unemployment remains stubbornly high at 11.7 percent.

In assembling a Cabinet, he will try to "recruit men and women of quality throughout the country, especially in western Canada."

Article claims plane was on U.S. mission

By The Associated Press

LONDON — The Sunday Observer newspaper quoted a British defense magazine as saying the South Korean jetliner shot down by Soviet fighters last September with a loss of 269 lives was on a mission to test Soviet radar.

In Washington, a White House spokesman denied the allegation. "There's nothing to the story," spokesman Pete Roussel told The Associated Press.

The Observer quoted the magazine, Defense Attache, as saying the Korean Air Lines Boeing 747 carried no eavesdropping electronics of its own, but flew deliberately into Soviet airspace so that Western intelligence could monitor the resulting Soviet radar and electronic signals.

The Defense Attache article was written under a pseudonym, P.Q. Mann, by a person who "appears to have access to hitherto unpublished technical information," the Observer said.

Defense Attache said a close-orbiting Ferret spy satellite and the just-launched Challenger space shuttle were used to monitor the KAL jet. It said the entry within Soviet radar range of a U.S. RC-135 military aircraft, with a similar profile to the Boeing 747 and flying just before it, was intended to get the Soviets to turn on their defense radars and critical communications links between the Far East and Moscow.

Ads to replace stork in baby delivery

By LORI WONG
Collegian Reporter

The stork may not bring Mark and Louise the baby that they have wanted for five years, but a classified advertisement just might.

The couple, who live in New Jersey, have requested to have their names withheld. Because of a medical complication, the couple cannot have children, so they have worked with a lawyer for the past nine months to place classified advertisements in 40 newspapers throughout the country.

The ad, which is currently running in the Collegian, reads "ADOPT — CHILDLESS couple wants to share love with white infant. Expenses paid. Legal." Through this ad, Mark and Louise hope to find a pregnant woman who is interested in giving up her child for a private adoption.

The ad has twice nearly brought Mark and Louise the child they want. Each time, the couple received what appeared to be a promising response, but in both cases, the adoption fell through.

"The first time, a woman contacted us and we had everything worked out. She went to the hospital, had the baby and then she changed her mind and decided to keep the child. This was very rough on us. In the second case, the woman's boyfriend had left her and when he came back, she changed her mind," Mark said.

So far, Mark and Louise said they have spent approximately $3,000 on the advertisements. In addition, they have paid expenses for both women from whom they had planned to adopt.

"With the first woman, we paid for her rent, phone and utilities. We also gave her money for weekly expenses," Louise said.

After the woman changed her mind, Mark and Louise did not contact her right away and have still not made any contact with her. They have not received any reimbursement from the woman.

"With the second woman, we only paid for four doctor's visits, so we didn't spend hardly any money. After her boyfriend came back and she changed her mind, she told us that she would pay us back. I think that she has paid part of it back through the lawyer," Louise said.

There are other expenses that Mark and Louise pay aside from the medical costs and expenses for the mother. They pay for all the legal expenses, and if they find a woman to adopt from, they will pay for all traveling expenses necessary to pick up the child.

"If we find a woman from out of state, we will fly out right away to pick up the child. I'd like to have that baby the minute it is born. Of course, if the mother prefers for us to not come out and pick up the child, we'll make some arrangement to have a lawyer or some close friend pick the child up. We are really willing to work with the mother to accommodate her wishes," Mark said.

The advertisements have been rejected from some newspapers even though they are legal in most states.

"I hate to take no for an answer and when a newspaper says no, I always ask them why. Most of the time they can't answer. Sometimes the people are just so nice, and other times, they aren't. I just don't know why they reject the ads. If there were any other way, I'd do it," Louise said.

Mark and Louise are not working with an adoption agency. If the couple did work through an agency, their combined incomes would place them in the highest income bracket which means they would be paying anywhere from $8,000 to $10,000 to adopt a child.

"The lists at adoption agencies are just so long, especially in our case, because we want a healthy white child. Even if we went through an agency and they did find us a child, it would be a matter of weeks before we would actually get the child because the agency makes several checks on the prospective parents to make sure that the parents and child are compatible," Mark said.

"My wife and I would like to have the child as soon as it is born," Mark said. "There is bonding that is lost in the time between the birth of the baby and actually receiving it in the agencies method of adoption."

"If we waited for an agency to find us a child, I'd be 50 before we got a baby," Louise said.

Mark and Louise have rejected the idea of adopting an older child.

"There are babies out there. Why shouldn't I have one?" Louise said. The ads have elicited many different responses.

"We get a lot of phony calls," Louise said. "Nothing threatening though."

"What I mean by phony is that the calls are from people asking to be surrogate mothers, or donors, but nothing obscene. We get a lot of calls from people calling just to see what it's about. It's frustrating," she added.

Both Mark and Louise said they have taken off from work for periods of weeks in order to remain home and answer the phone. Mark stayed home for a week when the advertisement last ran and Louise stayed home for two weeks when the ad ran the first two times.

"We aren't getting paid when we stay home," Louise said. "Mark took vacation leave this time."

"Last time when I stayed home we didn't end up with a baby; I said it wasn't worth it. But, if we get a baby this time then I'll say that it was all worth it," she said.

Mark and Louise screen the callers to separate what they feel are the sincere callers from those who are risks. After they talk to a woman who they feel is sincere, they ask the woman to send them a medical background.

"We are very concerned with the prenatal care," Louise said. "We want our child to be healthy. If the mother is from out of state, I would call the hospital where she is seeing an obstetrician and hire an obstetrician to work on my behalf. We will pay for the medical expenses if she doesn't have insurance, but our lawyer has advised us to not pay out any money until after the first three months of pregnancy."

Mark and Louise both wonder about the parents' backgrounds, and would like to know things about their ancestry, looks and medical history. In one of the situations they received photos of the mother. They often get written descriptions of the parents, and they always get medical background information.

"I'd like somebody to meet her, but whether it would be me...well we toy with this idea a lot," she said. "Somebody who is impartial should meet her," Louise said.

Mark and Louise agree that family and friends have been supportive in their search for a child.

"There are a lot of people out here who can't have children," Mark said. "It's amazing how many people want children but can't have them."

"We haven't been successful yet, but I really feel that we will be," Mark said.

Summer brings new cases to Lafene

By KRISTIE FABER
Collegian Reporter

Even with the majority of students gone, it's business as usual at Lafene Student Health Center this summer.

"With the drop in students, the summer is a good time for our staff to take vacations and enroll in their required continuing education classes," said Cindy Culver Burke, health educator.

The types of emergencies in summer are similar to those in the fall and spring. The majority are sprains and cuts that need sutures. Usually the emergencies are sports-related, Burke said.

The main differences in cases for the summer session are the increase in sunburn cases, poison ivy, insect bites and allergies, she said.

"Due to grasses, pollen and rain which stimulates the growth of mold, we have an increase in allergy patients," Burke said.

Lafene will be open for emergency services 24 hours a day. The clinic portion of Lafene, however, will be open 8 to 11:50 a.m. and 1 to 4:30 p.m. Monday through Friday.

"Students are encouraged to set up appointments, however walk-ins are welcome," said Dr. Robert Tout, director of Lafene.

Services are available to all summer students enrolled in classes for credit. The $3 per credit hour (up to six credit hours) paid at the time of summer school enrollment entitles students to use Lafene's services.

"Services are also available to students who were enrolled in the fall and spring and who pay an additional charge of $15," Burke said.

Lafene will close for two weeks this summer effective July 27 — the last day of summer classes — through Aug. 10.

Correction

Due to a reporting error, the story about K-State tour guides in Thursday's Collegian said the guides are not paid for their work. It should have said that campus guides receive both pay and personal satisfaction for their work.

Red Cross sees drop in blood donations

Red Cross blood donations in Riley County decrease during the summer months, but the need remains steady.

Area Red Cross volunteers will hold a bloodmobile for Riley County residents from 12:45 to 6 p.m. Thursday and from 9 a.m. to 2:25 p.m. Friday at the College Avenue United Methodist Church, 1609 College Ave.

"There is a donor potential of 20,000 in the Riley County area, yet summer brings set-backs in donor participation," said Louise Henricks, Riley County blood drive chairman. "The need is here all year-round and the Kansas Blood Region is counting on Riley County to do its part."

The county is part of a three-state region responsible for supplying 140 hospitals with a minimum of 635 units of blood each week.

Red Cross officials said they are hoping that they will help to meet this minimum, despite the fewer Manhattan residents during the summer.

"A lot of people go on vacation or work on the farms in the summer, but the main reason (for the lack of blood donors during the summer) is that until a person needs a blood donation to survive, or someone they love needs one, they do not realize the importance of donating. Once they have given, they usually remain faithful," said Joan Mosier, publicity chairman. "The public, as a whole, has become somewhat immune to the advertisements and publicity of the blood drives."

The county must reach its set goal of 300 units at this month's blood drive in order to sufficiently contribute to meeting patient needs. O-positive and O-negative blood types are especially in demand, Henricks said.

This is Riley County's fifth blood drive of the year. The county has reached the unit goal set by the Wichita Region three of four times this year.

People who have been rejected as givers in the past, should not let that stop them from returning to the drive.

Mobile units keep no past history of rejections and everyone starts new by taking a mini-health physical before they are allowed to give. There are allowances for many illnesses, considering how long it has been since the donor recovered, Henricks said.

Seven Manhattan women make up a committee which publicize the drives to various businesses, schools and churches.

"With new people working on the drive and increased exposure throughout the area, we expect increased participation. New blood brings new blood and there are a lot of strong workers behind the units, including my right-hand (person) Joan Mosier," Henricks said.

Supreme Court decision jeopardizes fairness

The American justice system is one of the worlds' fairest. It is this fairness that has hampered the effectiveness of the system in recent years. The nation's courts have become overloaded as crime rates have risen, and gaping loopholes in the system have appeared. Criminals who should be punished for their actions have, instead, been set free with a chance to commit another crime against society.

In a ruling last week, the U.S. Supreme Court attempted to patch holes in the system. These decisions should have great effects on the nation's courts in years to come.

The court ruled that evidence obtained illegally by law enforcement officials can still be used as evidence in a trial. The exclusionary rule, as the illegal obtainment ruling was called, was a major loophole in the system — sometimes leading to the freeing of obviously guilty individuals. The court ruling has tightened the noose on this flaw.

Another Supreme Court ruling led to restrictions in the protection offered by the "Miranda rights" — the law requiring suspects to be informed of their rights upon arrest. The Supreme Court ruled that if a suspect says something incriminating even before the warning, this statement can now be used in a trial. Judge William Renquist said officers "prompted by a concern for public safety" do not need to inform suspects of their "Miranda rights" until the situation has been brought under control.

These new rulings should make groups supporting law-and-order legislation very happy. But it remains to be seen whether these decisions will truly benefit the nation. America's system has put tight restrictions on the people in charge. By looking at the misuse of power by heads of state in other countries, our system was created to make it fair for the have-nots, as well as the haves.

Loosening the restrictions on the law enforcement body in this country could open a Pandora's box of power abuse. Obviously, the court system is growing rapidly into a less effective organization, but whether increasing the power of the courts — possibly at the risk of individual rights — is what's needed looms as a large question.

Americans are making a cry for stricter law enforcement. Caught up in a wave of conservatism during the term of the Reagan administration, many think the time is now to allow more freedom for the judicial branch of the government. The Supreme Court showed last week it has heard this plea and is working toward that end. But by asking for a toughening of the laws in this country, the public has put an increased amount of trust on people in positions of power.

It is hoped that these new rulings will lead to improved effectiveness of the courts instead of abuse and a lack of fairness for those people who are supposed to be protected by the law in the first place. But by many asking for an increase in power for those in charge in this country, Americans may be asking for a decrease in the rights they have taken for granted for so long.

Television diary provides a viewing education

CHANUTE — Have you ever wondered who is chosen by television ratings companies to determine the ratings for programs?

To tell the truth, I never thought much about that question. I always thought morons were chosen to determine the ratings, because the shows I watch seem to live (and then die) at the bottom of the ratings ladder.

After I came home, I made a terrific — or maybe terrifying — discovery. My family was chosen by a ratings company to compile a diary of television shows we watch for one week.

Actually, Mom had been compiling the diary for a few days before I returned home. When she went out of town for a few days, the responsibility of finishing the thing fell on my shoulders.

No problem, I thought. I don't watch television just to have something to do. I watch it when there is something important on the thing. I watch programs which will make a difference in my life, such as President Reagan's news conferences, "60 Minutes" and the Los Angeles Lakers vs. Boston Celtics basketball games.

There wasn't much to keeping the diary. It was divided into 15-minute intervals. All any idiot had to do was fill in the program being watched, who was watching it and the station's channel number and call letters. Needless to say, it was an easy assignment to complete.

The diary proved to be educational. Keeping the diary for three days showed me how my beliefs were in error.

For example, I discovered I would watch a hockey game "just because it was the only decent thing on the tube." I dislike hockey. You couldn't pay me to go to a hockey game. The professional hockey games are dull. But who watched two hockey games? Me.

Late-night movies also destroyed my beliefs. I watch all kinds of late-night movies. The reason why still escapes me. The garbage on late at night wouldn't attract flies, yet I would watch it.

I discovered a pattern I didn't expect to find: once a channel is selected, it usually isn't changed. I'm not sure why that happens, but it seems to be holding true.

One of my beliefs did prove to be true. The shows I like to watch (e.g. "Cheers," "St. Elsewhere") are near the bottom of the ratings list, except for "60 Minutes," which hovers near the top of the ratings every week.

You've probably noticed I didn't name the ratings company which asked my family to compile the diary. I'm not going to divulge the company's name. Most ratings companies use a similar type of ratings system.

The companies don't like to publicize who they choose to compile diaries for obvious reasons. Networks use the ratings compiled by the companies as a basis for setting rates for commercials. The higher the ratings a network gets, the more it can charge for commercial time slots during a particular show.

In other words, ratings mean big bucks to the networks, the advertisers and the people who write, direct, produce and star in the various shows on television.

The next time I see a list of television show ratings, I'll know I had a part in choosing the top shows and the rates the networks charge advertisers.

If only "Cheers" and "St. Elsewhere" could move up in the ratings....

Demos put price of winning over conscience

WASHINGTON — Not since the old Groucho Marx television show, when non sequiturs were as common as sex on "Dallas" has there been anything like the way Democratic Party leaders have handled the issue of Jesse Jackson and Jews. Jackson has been called an anti-Semite, to which Gary Hart, Walter Mondale and Party Chairman Charles Manatt respond that they disagree with him on the Middle East. Send down the duck.

Who's talking Middle East? Who's talking Palestinian homeland? Nathan Perlmutter, the director of B'nai B'rith's Anti-Defamation League (ADL), mentioned all of that when he called Jackson an anti-Semite but he mentioned a great deal more as well.

Perlmutter cited Jackson's "Hymie" slur, his flippant remark on the Holocaust (he's tired of hearing about it), his written reference to a pair of boxing promoters as "two Jews" and even his ability to see Jews where they ain't. On a couple of occasions, for instance, he referred to Richard Nixon's former White House aides, John Ehrlichman and H.R. (Bob) Haldeman as Jews — which they are not. None of that has anything to do with the Middle East.

When it comes to Israel, Jackson's views are unorthodox for an American politician, but hardly the hallmark of an anti-Semite. Not only do some American Jews agree with him, but so do a fair number of Israelis. Even some of the remarks cited by the ADL were made in a context that proves, not that Jackson is anti-Semitic, but that he is impolitic and occasionally insensitive.

But what the Democratic Party leadership fails to understand is that the issue for American Jews when it comes to Jackson is not just Jerusalem or Tel Aviv, but Kiev...or Warsaw...or wherever in the recent past Jews have been persecuted and killed. What they see in Jackson is not someone with policy differences on the Middle East, but a man whose hostility to Jews is manifest, who singles them out for criticism — whose head is chock-a-block with anti-Semitic stereotypes.

That assessment is totally beyond the understanding of Gary Hart, for instance. He subscribes to the CAT-scan theory of anti-Semitism — that it can not be revealed by what you say or the way you act. "I am not in a position to put myself inside Rev. Jackson's head or mind," Hart said in the California debate. He and most of the Democratic Party, though, were quite willing to do just that when it came to James Watt. All he had to do was mention Jews and "cripples" and he was out. No CAT scan for him. Words were enough.

When it comes to Jackson, virtually the entire Democratic Party herniated itself in an effort to distinguish between the man — what's in his head — and what he says. It apparently has not occurred to Hart and others that they might be related — that speech is the window to the soul.

In this connection, it hardly matters if Jackson is "officially" an anti-Semite or not. What matters is that his statements are offensive — and his apologies overshadowed by a pattern of rhetoric. He could change his Middle East views tomorrow and it would still not erase the stain left by his countenancing of the Rev. Louis Farrakhan.

Jackson seems to have no appreciation of how his remarks are received. He is so full of his own sense of victimization that he can not understand that others, in this case Jews, feel the same way. He is so arrogantly "right" that he can't entertain the notion that he just might be wrong. He seems so convinced of the validity of anti-Semitic stereotypes — Jews as rich, powerful, influential — that he can not comprehend how a millennium of anti-Semitism culminating in the Holocaust haunts even the rich, the powerful, the influential. This is the ugliest fight of all — one between victims.

Everyone realizes that politics is occasionally a sordid business, but there is no more sordid business than bigotry. The Democratic Party, to its shame, has run from the moral issue that's before it, apparently thinking it exists only in Central America. Like moderate Republicans in the McCarthy era, the party seems to value victory above all other things. It wants to win — even at the cost of its conscience.

Dog wins Frisbee-catching contest

NEW YORK — Brutus raced, leaped and took a big bite of plastic as he won the regional finals of the national Frisbee-catching competition for dogs, beating out more than 50 tail-wagging competitors.

But Saturday's victory for Brutus and his owner Bill Murphy, 22, of Lubbock, Texas, was no surprise: the 4-year-old Australian shepherd and border collie mix is the defending national champion in the Gaines Ashley Whippet Invitation, the national championship of dog Frisbee catching.

He and seven other regional winners will compete in the finals at Comisky Park in Chicago Sept. 8 before a baseball game.

The sport was born in 1974 when Stein and Ashley Whippet jumped onto the field at Dodger Stadium during a baseball game and put on an unauthorized exhibition for eight minutes before being thrown out and fined.

Wild bunny scratches for relief

AKRON, Ohio — When Genny Bartoletta switched on her clothes dryer, she got a surprise in the form of a Peter Cottontail whose bunny trail led right into the back of her machine.

"My wife...turned the dryer on and she heard something clanging at the pipe," said her husband, Victor. "She could see him."

The little wild rabbit apparently had slipped into the dryer through an outside vent.

"I had to tear the whole back off and couldn't get him out and wanted him out of there alive. It was down in the back in a hole and his front paws were caught," Bartoletta said.

Firefighters came to the rabbit's rescue Saturday. The Bartolettas took it and four other bunnies from a nearby nest to the Akron Zoological Park.

Steinem urges women to vote

BILLINGS, Mont. — Feminist writer Gloria Steinem says the women's movement shouldn't be a "captive" of the Democratic Party even though she opposes the re-election of President Reagan.

"Reagan smoked out the gender gap," Steinem told delegates at the National Organization for Women's state convention Saturday. "He opposes every issue that the majority of women feel is important. He hasn't missed a one."

But Ms. magazine's founding editor said the women's movement should be non-partisan if it wants to achieve its goals.

Steinem urged women to vote in the general election to make the so-called gender gap work for them.

"I'm worried that if we don't turn out at the polls...we will be treated with contempt," she said.

Race horse dies of heart attack

NEW YORK — Swale, who emerged as this year's top 3-year-old by winning the Kentucky Derby and Belmont Stakes, died of an apparent heart attack Sunday, eight days after winning the Belmont.

The colt had just returned to his barn area at Belmont Park after a 1½-mile gallop when he reared, flipped over backwards and died, said trainer Woody Stephens.

K-Staters win road race

Staff/Chris Stewart

Leo Tauer, Wamego, runs uphill after crossing the bridge between Randolph and Olsburg Saturday in the Bridge to 'Burg 10K race.

Alfredo Rosas savors his second consecutive victory in the men's division.

For the second consecutive year, Alfredo Rosas, senior in physical education, and Nancy Hoffman, sophomore in industrial engineering, clinched the overall male and female division titles in the Bridge to 'Burg 10K race Saturday.

Rosas' time of 32:20 broke the 33:11 course record for men which he set last year. Hoffman came in at 40:30, just short of the 40:28 course record for women which she established last year.

Hoffman, a runner on the K-State women's track team, predicted before the race that the heat and humidity which was already uncomfortable at 9 a.m. might affect some of the runners.

"It was too hot, really humid. I could have done better," said Hoffman, disappointed with her time.

Rosas who finished his last competitive season as a K-State runner this spring, also noticed the heat and humidity.

"The race was the same as last year but the humidity was really bad. There wasn't much water down there at the third mile mark," he said. "There should have been three or four water stations instead of just one."

After the race, runners joked with Rosas saying that the only reason he ran so fast was to see if his wife had gone into labor. Saturday was the delivery due date for his wife Mary who waited at the finish line for him.

Out of 125 entrants, 119 runners finished.

"I didn't finish. It was the hills and humidity," said 12-year-old Tracy Fleming of Riley. "I dropped out at the three-mile mark. I'm used to running one-mile races, and I doubt I'll run this next year."

The heat and humidity did take its toll on runner Lisa Rosenow, junior in radio and television. According to Garry Sigle, race director, Rosenow suffered heat cramps after she finished the race. She was flown by helicopter to the St. Mary Hospital where she was treated and released.

The course, which has attracted runners for five years now, has a reputation for being one of the toughest around.

"It's hard. The first mile is flat as you go over the bridge, but after that it's all uphill," said another runner, Maj. Lee Rials of Birmingham, Ala. "You don't get any breaks."

"It's a good course. It's a good test of stamina and ability. It really pushes you," said Lt. Eileen Volpe of Fort Riley.

Hickeys quit positions, get set for A&amp;M move

K-State women's basketball coach Lynn Hickey and baseball coach Bill Hickey have both resigned so Mrs. Hickey can become head women's basketball coach and assistant athletic director of women's athletics at Texas A&M University.

Mrs. Hickey has coached the Lady 'Cats for the past five seasons, leading K-State to a 125-39 overall record and two AIAW and three NCAA post-season tournament appearances.

The Lady 'Cats finished the 1983-84 campaign with a 25-6 record, sharing the Big Eight Conference crown with the University of Missouri and winning the Big Eight Post-Season Tournament. The No. 7-ranked Lady 'Cats then lost in first-round action of this season's NCAA tournament to Northeast Louisiana University.

Mrs. Hickey was a unanimous recommendation of a Texas A&M search committee and will assume coaching duties July 1. Her assistant athletic director's responsibilities take effect Sept. 1.

"We are pleased to acquire a person with such excellent credentials," Tom Adair, chairman of Texas A&M's athletic council and member of the search committee, said in a released statement by Texas A&M. "I am confident she will be a real asset to our women's program and Texas A&M University."

No replacement has yet been named for Mrs. Hickey, who leaves a Lady 'Cat squad consisting of all freshmen, sophomores and juniors. Senior Angie Bonner — the squad's leading scorer and rebounder and a member of the second-team all-Big Eight and Kodak all-District squads — joined junior center Tina Dixon and junior Sheronda Jenkins, who both left the squad earlier this spring for personal reasons.

"This was a very tough decision to make," said Mrs. Hickey, who cited the opportunity to become involved in both administrative work and coaching as the main reason for leaving K-State. "I'm leaving a fine basketball team, (but) I feel like I'm leaving the program in good shape. The only reason you leave a school like Kansas State is to go to a larger school that has the potential to be very good. That's how I see A&M."

Mr. Hickey, who recently completed a 14-24 season during his first year as head coach of the Wildcat baseball team, will also make the move to A&M. It is not known if he will assume coaching duties there.

"I'll be looking for employment down there but there's a lot of excellent baseball being played in that area and I'm sure I can continue to enhance my baseball coaching career," Mr. Hickey said.

Royals drop three to Twins

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Minnesota is riding a four-game winning streak, but there is no danger, Mike Smithson said, that overconfidence will topple the Twins.

"How can the Twins get overconfident?" Smithson asked Sunday after he and two relievers combined on a 3-1 victory for a three-game sweep of the slumping Kansas City Royals. The sweep left the Twins solidly in second place behind the California Angels, beginning a stretch in which 17 of Minnesota's next 23 games are at home.

"It's going to be a big home stand," Smithson said. "We know we can play good baseball but I don't think anybody is going to get overconfident."

Overconfidence is definitely no concern of the Royals, who are going through one of their worst offensive slumps in years. In losing seven of their last eight, the Royals have averaged 856 runs per game and compiled a team batting average of .196.

"There's really not much you can say," commented Kansas City manager Dick Howser. "We're not kicking the ball around and giving up runs. We're pitching good, but we're just not hitting."

The Twins scored all of their runs in the third against Charlie Leibrandt, 2-1 Ron Washington and Kirby Puckett singled leading off and Tim Lincecum walked to load the bases. Engle lashed his two-run double and Kent Hrbek delivered a sacrifice fly to make it 3-0.

U.L. Washington doubled leading off the Royals' fifth and went to third on a single by Pat Sheridan. Washington scored on George Brett's pop to deep short, which went for a fielder's choice RBI after Ron Washington dropped the ball but forced Sheridan at second.

Norman, Zoeller to meet in Open playoff

By The Associated Press

MAMARONECK, N.Y. — Australian Greg Norman made a miraculous save from the grandstand on the 18th hole Sunday, tied Fuzzy Zoeller at the end of regulation play and forced a playoff for the United States Open Golf Championship.

Zoeller and the powerful Norman, who scored his first U.S. victory only two weeks ago, completed four rounds over the Winged Foot Golf Club course with matching totals of 276, four shots under par.

They will engage in an 18-hole playoff Monday afternoon for the 84th American national championship and a $94,000 prize.

Zoeller, an easy-going guy who was whistling while he worked, played the last round in par 70.

Norman, reaching vast distances with his driver, made scrambling pars on the last three holes and saved a 69.

Norman struggled on the last three holes but it was on the 18th that the high drama came.

Tied for the lead and playing immediately in front of Zoeller, Norman pushed his second shot into the bleachers on the right of the 18th green, where someone caught the ball in self defense. Norman flew his third shot across the green against the fringe and then dropped a 50-foot putt to save par, forcing the Monday playoff.

bit of humor, is present in the 1973 sculpture, "Young Shopper."

Partly from overindulgence and little physical exercise, and clad in wretchedly mismatched clothing the "Young Shopper" brings to light the American preoccupation with conspicuous consumption. The sculpture plays on the folly of tasteless affluence and a reluctance to improve one's taste.

Hanson also explores the frailties of the American existence.

"The Drug Addict" is a throwback to the bowery derelicts that I did in 1969," Hanson said. "I wanted to call attention to drug abuse in modern society. So I did this single figure to show the injection of heroin and needle marks on the arm. It's a statement about drug abuse."

"Queenie: Lady with Cleaning Cart" and "Old Woman" are a criticism of a society that casts aside the elderly and prohibits them from participating in the mainstream of life.

"These sculptures look as though they want to scream out and fight for their own survival," Bush said.

"Sculptures of older people are studies in alienation, being cut off from everybody," Hanson said. "There is a strong expression in their faces that gives a certain meaning to old age."

Hanson's technique at sculpting is very time consuming.

"Models are first asked to remove their clothing, although they are usually allowed to keep their undergarments on to eliminate embarrassment, especially older people whose bodies are not as firm as they once were," Bush said.

The model's body is shaved and coated with petroleum jelly to prevent sticking. Liquid silicone rubber, containing a fast-setting catalyst, is spread over one leg at a time, and shreds of inch-long fiberglass and plaster are added to help the mold retain shape. Once the silicone has dried, the mold is slit down the back and eased off the leg, Hanson said.

The torso, arms and head casts are made in much the same way.

Each sculpture is made out of a polyvinyl acetate that has been heated before it's poured into the body casts. The finished product is a somewhat translucent material that gives the feeling, the appearance of flesh, Hanson said.

Hanson then begins attaching the six pieces of the sculpture by placing the feet in a pair of shoes. He then proceeds by working up the body, attaching each piece one by one. The sculpture requires no props because each piece is balanced to stand evenly. The body is then painted with oil paints and hair is sewn on the body.

The final step is the selection of the sculpture's clothing.

"People see me picking out stuff in stores and want an explanation," Hanson said. "I don't like explaining. I was picking out eyelashes the other day, and the woman asked what I was using them for. When I told her I'm an artist, I could tell she didn't believe me. Some of the worst times are those when I pick out bras and underpants. I hate it when the bras aren't priced. The clerk will hold up a bra and shout across the room that she needs a price. So then, everyone else in the store turns around. I guess the clerks think I'm some kind of pervert or something."

Hanson makes about three or four sculptures each year. Currently, each is valued at anywhere from $75,000 to $150,000. Although Hanson is able to create fewer sculptures in a year's time than he used to, he has accumulated nearly 70 of his life-like sculptures.

"Basically they, (the sculptures) say something about people's physical, not abnormalities, but excesses," Hanson said. "Their stomach and hips are too wide. They wish they could go on a diet and look a little better physically, but that is why I picked them in the first place. I think they are more human that way."

"Something is intriguing about all those imperfections in life because that is life, and to be a realist, an illusionist-realist, as I consider myself to be now, one has to deal with those imperfections, because it is part of life."

"I wanted to do something on my own," Hanson said. "I didn't care what my colleagues thought about my work, or what the critics thought. It is just a personal fulfillment. I wanted to express an inward feeling I had. I wanted to relate our times."

"I'm basically an impressionist at heart. I always was able to express myself some way with textures and maybe exaggerating a bit more than I needed too. I wanted to hold back, be more subtle, make more details, as a challenge, all the while fitting it into the overall theme of my work, working with people and the elderly, all of whom I have a great deal of affection for," Hanson said.

"We live in difficult times, with difficult problems. I try to portray honestly what I see around me, in the world. I see it, I think you see it, and I think everyone sees it," he said.

Archbishop defies rule on homosexual hiring

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — The New York Archdiocese would rather lose millions of dollars in child-care contracts with the city than pledge not to discriminate against homosexuals in hiring, Archbishop John O'Connor told a homosexual group.

"We would rather close our child-care agencies than violate church teaching," O'Connor told members of Courage, an organization of homosexuals committed to celibacy, last week. His remarks were published in Catholic New York, the archdiocesan newspaper.

O'Connor said his speech was prompted by Mayor Edward Koch's Executive Order 50, which says employment may not be denied because of sexual preference or orientation.

The Salvation Army lost $4.5 million in contracts with the city in March after it refused to comply with the directive, saying the order's wording violated its religious principles.

O'Connor indicated that incident sparked the church's need to address the subject of homosexuality.

In its Sunday editions, the New York Daily News quoted church officials as saying the archdiocese, which has 1.8 million members in Manhattan, the Bronx, Staten Island and seven upstate counties, has contracts with the city worth about $60 million a year.

The bishop said his representatives have met with Koch and described the mayor as "deeply interested in trying to respect the position of the Catholic Church."

O'Connor said the church is "on record" in favor of anti-discrimination efforts, but added, "There is a tremendous difference between a controlled inclination" and active homosexual behavior.

"I cannot change church teaching," O'Connor said. "I can't be ambiguous. I can't fudge on it."

Vet school drops class size

The College of Veterinary Medicine will be decreasing the number of first-year students it accepts beginning in the fall of 1985.

The new policy, recently approved by the Board of Regents, will allow the college to admit 100 students with the option of increasing or decreasing that number by five. Whether or not to accept more than the limit would be decided after reviewing the applicants' credentials.

This cutback was done with the acceptance of the school. J.L. Noordsy, assistant dean of veterinary medicine, said there is a trend today involving professional schools such as medicine and law, to decrease their enrollment numbers.

Noordsy said the development of more schools and education becoming more regional in nature also have an effect on the decreasing enrollment numbers.

The regents are considering a proposal which would guarantee 20 seats in each entering class for Nebraska applicants.

Noordsy welcomed the regents' cutback decision. He said the school, which was completed in 1972, was built with the idea of handling 100 entering students per year. Because the school received federal financial assistance to help in the construction, it was required to accept 105 applicants each year.

Senate defeats amendment prohibiting U.S. intervention

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Legislation to prohibit U.S. air and ground forces from entering combat in El Salvador or Nicaragua was rejected 63-31 by the Senate on Monday night, despite protests that "the stage is set" by President Reagan for American bloodshed in the region.

Sens. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., and Mark O. Hatfield, R-Ore., battled unsuccessfully for an amendment — passed overwhelmingly by the House last month — to prohibit any expenditures "for the purpose of delivering weapons fire upon any enemy" in those two nations.

Their amendment would allow Reagan to order Americans into combat in El Salvador or Nicaragua only if necessary to rescue embassy staff or other U.S. citizens — or unless authorized by further action of Congress.

The issue arose as the Senate wound into yet another late night over a $291 billion Pentagon spending bill.

Today, another major showdown is expected over a proposal by Sen. Sam Nunn, D-Ga., to withdraw up to 90,000 U.S. troops from Europe unless other NATO nations move to substantially upgrade their own conventional forces.

As things stand now, said Nunn, NATO's defense posture is "nothing more than a nuclear trip-wire," because of allied foot-dragging on the conventional front — and despite massive U.S. contributions.

Kennedy said massive air, sea and land exercises in Honduras and the CIA backing of covert actions against Nicaragua demonstrate that the administration "is systematically placing U.S. personnel and ships in harm's way," and "the stage is set for the United States suddenly and without warning to intervene with troops."

A virtually identical amendment to the Pentagon budget bill was passed 341-64 by the House on May 22.

The proposal was hotly resisted by Sen. Barry Goldwater, R-Ariz., and chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, which has oversight responsibility for secret operations against Nicaragua.

Goldwater told Kennedy that presidents, with good cause, "have called out the troops something like 202 different times in our history, but there have been only five declarations of war — and two of them in the same war."

Nunn, the ranking Democrat on the Senate Armed Service Committee, noted that the United States already is spending one-third — about $90 billion — of its defense budget in support of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, while other members of the alliance have consistently failed to meet their commitments.

Those shortfalls, he said, are behind the assessment of U.S. Army Gen. Bernard Rogers, the supreme allied commander, that NATO's conventional deterrence is inadequate and "leaves the nuclear threshold at a disturbingly low level." "Nuclear threshold" refers to the point at which NATO commanders would resort to using nuclear weapons to respond to a conventional attack by superior forces.

"It is a policy that basically says that after the first tanks come across the border, we're going to start popping off theater nuclear weapons," Nunn declared.

He said he does not favor cutting U.S. forces in Europe.

Arson expenses take toll on state

Arson in Kansas caused $6 million in property damages last year and took three lives, the Kansas Committee on Arson Prevention (KCAP) reported recently.

In addition, 76 persons — 51 of them firefighters — were injured by arsonists during 1983.

The figures were presented to Gov. John Carlin who proclaimed June as "Arson Awareness Month" in Kansas for the fifth straight year.

The data comes from the fire incident reporting system of the Kansas State Fire Marshal's office. KCAP is jointly sponsored by the fire marshal, the Kansas Bureau of Investigation, local police and fire authorities and property-casualty insurance companies.

The committee also announced that it was merging its 4-year-old arson tips hotline with the highly successful crime hotline established by the KBI. In Kansas, 1-800-KS-CRIME is now the single toll-free and confidential phone number for citizens to report crime tips — including information about suspicious fires.

Dan Scott, Topeka insurance executive and chairman of KCAP, said arson in Kansas accounts for 10 percent of all fires and 18 percent of the property damage caused by all fires.

There were 14,660 fires reported through the Kansas fire reporting service in 1983. They caused an estimated $35.5 million in property damage. There were 1,402 arsons reported, which caused $6.4 million in property damage.

"Those are very conservative figures. We expect that the actual economic loss from arson in our state is higher," Scott said. "The arsonist is a cruel coward who commits a heinous crime against the citizenry, our neighborhoods and our property."

Insurance industry studies indicate that arson accounts for 10 to 20 percent of residential fire insurance premiums, and more than 30 percent of fire premiums for businesses.

KCAP also maintains a fund that provides awards of up to $5,000 for persons who are instrumental in helping authorities clear arson cases.

In January, the committee gave cash awards totaling $1,700 to six Kansans who helped solve separate arson cases during the past year.

Council delays Van Zile renovation

Putnam Hall closing plan receives approval

By STEVE ONKEN
Collegian Reporter

After extensive examination of current and future housing conditions, the housing council decided Monday to close Putnam Hall.

The council, spearheaded by Chet Peters, vice president for student affairs, unanimously passed the resolution "with sensitivity" to close K-State's third oldest residence hall, which was built in 1953.

Thomas Frith, director of housing, moved that the council decide not to use Putnam unless demand warrants the reopening of the hall and is beneficial toward the entire housing system.

"We have to look at this problem as a total system. We have to concentrate this problem into one area," Dan Beatty, vice-president of business affairs, said.

"I hope the students in Putnam will work to make this motion unnecessary; if not this year, then for the fall of '85," Peters said.

The council also approved a recommendation by Frith to delay the renovation of Van Zile Hall for a minimum of one year and then examine the housing system from all angles at meetings during the upcoming year.

Peters reported that the renovation bid the housing department is reviewing now is $250,000 above what is available for the project. He said "it might be able to come down $100,000," but recommended that the council take another look at Van Zile given the current housing conditions.

"Is it wise to spend the money on Van Zile when we look down the road and we know that the enrollment at this university will not go up by the year 2000? Or is it wise to put that money into the other (housing) units to bring them up to date? We should look what alternatives we may have to better enhance the University," Peters said.

The housing department has received approximately 3,200 contracts for next year, and estimates there will be a total of 3,800 when school starts. Frith said there are 440 fewer contracts than there was a year ago at this time.

"But the critical thing about this is that these are all estimates," Frith said.

A study presented by Frith gave the total spaces available in K-State residence halls at 4,402. Without Van Zile, the number drops to 4,240 and without Putnam and Van Zile, the number drops to 4,015. The total contracts received stands at 3,259, and subtracting refunds, the total comes to 3,133. The spaces that will remain after Putnam and Van Zile close will be 882.

This year, Frith said, the housing department will probably just "break even" financially. Even if both halls close, the department expects a deficit of $400,000 while operating at 95 percent occupancy.

Putnam houses 225 residents, but only 68 contracts have been sent to the housing department for occupancy there. For Boyd Hall 108 contracts have been received.

"Upperclass students (applying for hall residency) are ahead of where they were last year. Women are ahead by maybe 30 to 40 contracts; men are ahead by 30 to 40 contracts. Freshmen are down by a great number and I cannot account for it," Frith said.

But Peters pointed out that other schools in the Big Eight Conference are closing residence halls because of fewer applicants.

Mary Culver, sophomore in business administration and 1984-85 president of Putnam, represented the hall and felt that the permanent closing would be harmful for the University.

"Generally, the feeling is that we are being evicted. I think it would work negatively toward the University," Culver said.

"If the resolution was not worded with such permanency, if it wasn't a cut-and-dried decision saying that this is what will happen, then I think the Putnam residents would better accept and back the decision, otherwise you will probably receive a lot of opposition," Culver said.

She requested to hear the alternatives to closing Putnam, and Frith said that it is possible that alternatives, such as closing floors, reducing staff and moving food services will occur even with the closing of Putnam.

Council member Margaret Nordin, associate director of student development, felt a re-evaluation of recruiting students should be considered.

"We know what K-State has to offer, but maybe we are not getting this message across," she said.

"I still believe that we can get a campaign out to build momentum to save the hall. Putnam is very dear to me. Maybe if we had a drive saying 'let's keep Putnam open'...but it seems to me that a lot of people around the state hold K-State very dear to their hearts and when they suddenly realize the predicament we are in, maybe something would happen. We need to ask ourselves what we can do in helping those people make their decision to come to K-State," Nordin said.

"If we make this decision on emotion, it is an incorrect decision. It should be made on cold hard facts, because that's what we are dealing with. The point is that we don't have the money to do it (keep Putnam open)," Frith said.

Peters said he has received a report from Oklahoma State University which dealt with the cost of housing at 32 colleges in a nine-state area including Kansas. In this report, the highest contract agreement was $2,851 while the lowest was $1,708. K-State's contract total was $1,820 making the University the third lowest resident hall contract fees in this area.

"I believe that if we work effectively next year, we would be back close to 4,000 contracts. We don't want to leave Putnam closed for very long," Peters said.

According to Frith, current Putnam residents will be notified of the closing in time to make other arrangements for transferring to another hall or moving off-campus.

Freshmen will be placed in residence halls since housing policy states that all single, freshman students, under the age of 21, are required to live in either a residence hall or greek house.

Wind blasts croplands in Great Plains

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — This was one of the worst seasons for wind damage to land in the Great Plains since records began 49 years ago, the Agriculture Department said Monday.

Peter C. Myers, chief of the department's Soil Conservation Service, said 12.3 million acres were damaged in the 10-state area between last Nov. 1 and May 31, seven months in which land is most vulnerable to wind erosion.

Myers said that compared with 5.5 million acres damaged in 1982-83 and 5.1 million in 1981-82. Last season's damage was second only to the 15.8 million acres damaged by wind in 1954-55, the most since the agency was started in 1935. However, there were some years in the early 1930s when the damage was much more extensive.

Land is considered damaged when the wind has removed or deposited so much soil that the land is subject to further damage, or when the erosion has reduced the soil's productive capacity, the report said.

Of land damaged this season, 84 percent was cropland, 15 percent rangeland and 1 percent other land.

"Texas and New Mexico received below-normal precipitation throughout the winter and spring, so the soils were dry and readily moved by wind," the report said.

"Partly as a result of the dryness, Texas reported more damage than any other state — 5.7 million acres or 46 percent of the total for the entire Great Plains."

New Mexico showed the biggest increase in damage with 857,800 acres or nine times the 1982-83 damage.

"During one severe storm in the eastern part of the state in late April, winds as high as 60 to 70 miles per hour completely stripped off the topsoil in some places and blew it into Texas," the report said.

In Wyoming, however, snowfall was heavier than usual, so the ground was protected through much of the seven-month period. As a result, Wyoming was the only state in the region to report fewer acres damaged than in 1982-83.

"Throughout the Great Plains, windblown soil particles destroyed crops or cover on more than 1.3 million acres of land not damaged by soil loss," the report said. "Another 19.5 million acres of land not damaged were reported unprotected by plant cover or residue and susceptible to damage by high winds."

All or parts of the 10 states making up the Great Plains were surveyed. The state-by-state breakdown comparing damaged acres in the seven-month period ended May 31 with the damage in 1982-83, included:

- Colorado, 1,020,000 acres damaged in 1983-84 and 372,900 in 1982-83.
- Kansas, 94,500 and 77,100.
- Montana, 1,484,600 and 359,900.
- Nebraska, 245,100 and 97,800.
- New Mexico, 857,800 and 93,900.
- North Dakota, 2,241,400 and 747,100.
- Oklahoma, 239,200 and 208,200.
- South Dakota, 378,700 and 303,000.
- Texas, 5,691,800 and 1,805,900.
- Wyoming, 79,200 and 1,475,500.

Carlin requests loans from federal agency

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Gov. John Carlin's office on Monday asked for federal disaster aid from the Small Business Administration for six northeast Kansas counties to help homeowners and businessmen with flood and tornado damage.

Carlin made the request for a disaster declaration covering Brown, Nemaha, Johnson, Doniphan, Jackson and Pottawatomie counties. If the aid request is approved, the federal agency will provide low-interest loans to cover losses.

Damages to private non-agricultural property has been estimated at $3.2 million by the Division of Emergency Preparedness and $15.4 million for public property. Preliminary estimates place agricultural damage between $60 million and $80 million.

Carlin, who is in China on a trade and economic development mission, made the aid request in a letter to William Powell, regional administrator of the SBA in Kansas City, Mo. The governor said federal assistance is needed to cover damages to homes and businesses.

Officials expect flood waters to retreat

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The end of more than a week of flooding in Missouri and Kansas appeared to be in sight Monday, as the Missouri River began a slow retreat to its banks.

Residents of eight northwest Missouri and northeast Kansas counties began returning to their homes Monday. In Atchison County, Mo., Sheriff Jack Millsap gave the all clear for evacuees to go home early Monday morning.

Across the river in Doniphan County, Kan., volunteers continued their round-the-clock efforts to pump flood waters from the small town of Elwood.

Refueling the four tractors that powered the pumps has become a community event, said Harvey Dupree, who farms along the river. Volunteers from town come out, "and we form a chain and we refill with five-gallon buckets," he said.

Down river in Holt County, the Platte River, which joins the Missouri just west of Kansas City, continued to rise, closing off a highway and keeping residents near the village of Tracy away from their homes. The Platte should crest Tuesday, said Maj. John C. Carson of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers in Kansas City.

Although the Missouri River was falling, workers were sandbagging a federal levee near the small Platte County town of Farley, about 20 miles north of Kansas City. The levee had begun to seep and the sandbagging was a precaution, said George Hanley, a spokesman for the Corps. All other federal levees were holding and no new problems were expected, he said.

At least 1,000 families were forced from their homes in eight northwest

Missouri and northeast Kansas counties when heavy rains sent the Missouri River flowing over levees more than a week ago.

Susan Clowe of the Red Cross said Monday that 308 families have sought emergency assistance and that hundreds of others have been helped by friends and relatives.

Damage estimates last week topped $30 million, but were expected to go much higher before the flooding ended, Ms. Clowe said. As many as 70,000 acres of land along the Missouri River and its tributaries were expected to have been flooded by this week.

Officials in both Kansas and Missouri were waiting word on a federal disaster declaration, which would provide loans and other assistance for cleaning up flood damage. Sen. John Danforth, R-Mo., wrote President Reagan Monday, urging him to declare the area a disaster.

In Atchison County, Mo., the Missouri rose slightly Sunday night after dropping 17 inches since Saturday, Millsap said. "But this is something we'd expected" because of heavy rains upstream, he said.

The additional flooding appeared to be a local problem and was not expected to happen downriver, Carson said. Barring more rain, the river should continue to drop very slowly, he said.

The Missouri River at Kansas City crested at about 24 feet Sunday, and was expected to drop to about 23.5 feet Monday, then to 21 feet today, Carson said.

Farther east, the river was expected to crest above flood stage later this week, but there should be few serious problems, Carson said.

"What crests are predicted, it's not something that we haven't experienced" and could be easily handled, he said.

Government training includes 3 graduates

Three of seven Governor's Fellows for 1984-85 are K-State students in the Master of Public Administration Program in the Department of Political Science.

The recipients are Gretchen Storey, Raul Guevara and Richard Arbuthnot, all graduates of political science.

The competition was designed several years ago under former Gov. Robert Bennett to encourage political science graduate students in the various Kansas regents institutions toward a career in state government.

"The state legislature wanted to recognize some outstanding students in government and to keep them in the state of Kansas," said Naomi Lynn, head of the Department of Political Science. "During their year of internship, the students work for three or four agencies and gain a wide range of experience. The internships encourage these bright students to seek public service careers in Kansas."

Of the four who applied this year from K-State, three were selected. The applicants submitted copies of their academic records and were interviewed by a governor's committee in Topeka, Lynn said.

The students select work on a rotating basis among various agencies and receive a salary of approximately $15,000. For their six hours of graduate credit, they must also submit a written report of the year's experiences. At the end of the year, they are hired by a state agency.

Storey said she might be placed in an agency concerned with health care because of her previous experience in that area.

Program analyzes career possibilities

Students study goals with computers

By ANNE HOPKINS
Collegian Reporter

Finding job opportunities that better fit the personal needs of students has been made easier.

By experimenting with the System of Interactive Guidance Information, one may get a better idea of what type of job to pursue. SIGI, which is located at the Career Planning and Placement Center, is a computer program intended to give the student a broader range of knowledge of the job market with his interests in mind.

"Using SIGI, you can find out possible job opportunities based upon the values you place on a career," said Twila Mattia, receptionist for career planning.

The process of finding job opportunities begins with 28 value questions about careers in a particular field. The computer then determines possible job opportunities, courses that may be valuable in pursuing these jobs and the chances of attaining personal career goals, Mattia said.

There is no charge for this service. It takes a minimum of two hours (not necessarily all at one sitting), and must be done by appointment.

"SIGI helps students to focus on things never thought of before. This is good because it is foolish to force yourself down a road with challenges foreign to your ability," Mattia said.

"SIGI helps the students get the best education possible and learn to market themselves to the outside world," she added.

The program was new to K-State in September and several hundred students have already used it, Mattia said.

However, job availability is always changing, said Bruce Laughlin, director of the center.

If the question of a lifetime career is the determining factor in a college curriculum, one should take into consideration that, in the time it takes to complete an education, the job market could change drastically. Also important to consider is the individual's aptitude, interest and abilities, Laughlin said.

"Making a career decision is not simple. Most able students in a given curriculum can get a job. One should pursue his own interest no matter how crowded that field is at a given time. If they are truly interested they will succeed no matter what the competition is," Laughlin said.

The abilities to think clearly, to speak and write well and to use good English are all very important to employers.

"They are looking for the return to basics, regardless of curriculum. Most employers want well-rounded employees that can adjust to other people and have interests outside of themselves. They want leadership, not mere membership," Laughlin said.

He added that grades are very important when seeking a job, but not all-controlling. They are much more important in some fields than in others.

"A person seeking employment as a salesman may have a lower grade point average, but get the job because of his outgoing personality, whereas someone in research may be hired on his GPA alone," he said.

All of these qualities must be orchestrated to be successful in the job market.

Generally, there will be more students seeking employment than are already employed at the time of graduation.

"They are usually all employed within five or six months of graduation. It would be an exaggeration, though, to assume that everyone is employed in his particular field of study," he said.

"There is sometimes too much stock placed on the curriculum choice toward future success. Many people tend to go with a different curriculum than they had intended, by either changing majors several times during their college career, or by going into a different field than they graduated in," Laughlin said.

"There is quite a bit of similarity in majors within an individual college. One can see this by looking at the similarity in core courses. The specialization is tacked on later when one enters the job market," he said.

The Career Planning and Placement Center also offers counselors who can advise students and informative pamphlets on career choices.

K-State plans new honors program

New students who hold Putnam Foundation and University scholarships will be a part of a new honors program this fall implemented by the New Student Programs office.

"Attraction, retention and supporting the colleges are the main objectives of the new student programs," said Marilyn Trotter, director of New Student Programs.

"The program will emphasize intellectual and cultural stimulation for these new honor students," she added.

Plans for the program includes special trips to McCain Auditorium for an introduction to the activities offered there. The group will also attend the Landon Lecture Series and take special tours of the Union Art Gallery with the artist present.

"In the future, we hope to expand the program to include other students as well," Trotter said.

Due to staffing problems, New Student Programs was forced to choose a particular group of students to start the program.

"New Student Programs went to the honorary societies on campus — Blue Key, Golden Key and Mortar Board — for volunteers to help staff the retention program," Trotter said.

Golden Key agreed to be the main coordinator for the program and will work in conjunction with the other honorary societies.

With approximately 300 expected participants in the program, there will be 100 volunteer leaders and five paid seniors. The seniors will be responsible for the record keeping and organizing that will be necessary.

"With so many volunteers the program will be tailor-made with small groups for personalized attention," Trotter said.

Manhattan construction brings more choices

Many people feel that the recent rise in Manhattan apartment construction poses a threat to the city's economy. With a drop in interest rates, many builders have taken advantage of the situation and have invested in such projects. In the process, they have seemingly failed to take into account the recent decrease in University enrollment.

But hidden behind this issue of economics lies a possible benefit for K-State students seeking off-campus housing.

Many people have spent most of their time protesting and concentrating on the business aspect of additional apartment construction. However, these new apartments may help to provide the student with more of a choice in deciding where to live off-campus.

In the past, many students have been faced with a decision between low rental dumps or high-priced apartments. With the new apartments being built, this may possibly bring about an "in-between" alternative for the student looking for an apartment that would best meet his needs.

The addition of new apartments may also lend itself to developing a slight competition between owners and may cause owners of existing higher-priced dwellings to lower their prices.

So, the construction of additional apartment complexes in the campus area may not be the best thing economically for builders because of the decrease in K-State's enrollment, but for the student tenant these investments might prove to produce some type of benefit.

As in every issue, there are pros and cons to the increase in Manhattan apartment construction. Construction contractors don't just start a project and invest a lot of money into it just because they feel it's the "in" thing to do. Thought is put into it before the project actually takes off. Maybe bringing the prices down to better fit the needs of the student is one thought behind the additional apartment construction.

Foreign relations include American bankers

Much has been written about the large debts Latin American countries owe to United States banks. But what many people fail to realize is that 20 percent of the region's staggering $336 billion in debts is owed by private companies in nations such as Brazil, Mexico, Colombia, Venezuela and Peru.

What this means is that American banks are having a hand in destroying the very capitalistic system in Latin America that the U.S. government has been trying so desperately to instill on our neighbors to the south.

Prior to the recession that plagued Western economies in 1981, U.S. banks encouraged many businesses in Latin America to take large loans in hopes of expanding the operations of these companies. U.S. banks saw great potential for growth for the economies of several Latin American countries, particularly Mexico, Columbia and Brazil.

Soon U.S. banks became caught up in the competition for loan business and, in turn, made mistakes in transacting business — often overlooking inefficiency and bad management in some companies just to make what was considered a possible high-profit deal.

As a result, U.S. banks helped turn Latin American economies into turmoil. As the recession hit in 1981, companies holding huge debts, especially those plagued by mismanagement, were left without the capital-generating volume of business they had before the slide in economic growth. Soon most Latin American companies fell behind in their payments to U.S. banks.

What this has done is forced many Latin American companies to turn to their respective governments to help pay off loans. This, in turn, is giving Latin American governments more control over businesses, which goes against the theory of capitalism the United States promotes in the region.

To offset this turn of events, U.S. banks must work with private debtors in Latin America faced with large loan bills. A plan involving Mexican banks that helps convert pesos to dollars at a much lower exchange rate than that of its devaluated currency on the regular market is one plan being utilized to help Grupo Alfa, a Mexican subsidiary with large U.S. debts. Another plan being developed involves exchanging company equity positions in exchange for debts, similar to the program used by the Chrysler Corporation in recent years.

American banks need to cease their current trend of tacking on additional charges as they spread out late loan payments. In addition, a plan to devalue the dollar, inflated by deficit spending by the U.S. government, is necessary.

Debts in Latin America threaten the stability of an already shaky region. The Mexican and Brazilian economies are burdened by the largest debts owed by any countries in the Western world. If the United States wishes to avoid adding to its already growing problems in Latin America, American banks must realize they play a large part in our relations with other countries, regardless of their profit margins.

Drivers should pass waste trucks with caution

"Every nuclear power plant produces copious amounts of high-level waste; each year about 30 tons of nuclear waste must be removed from each reactor and replaced," according to Dr. Michio Kaku and journalist Jennifer Trainer. And on an undisclosed day a few weeks ago, flatbed trucks carrying some this waste rolled through the streets of New York City, after a nine-year moratorium as the direct result of a Supreme Court ruling in late February. This ruling overrides shipping bans similar to New York's, which have been passed by more than 200 American cities.

Why is this something that we in Kansas should care about? So what if we lose New York, after all the Yankees are getting pounded this year and the Jets and the Giants can easily be replaced. Well, to begin with the nuclear waste from the Brookhaven National Laboratory — the people contesting these bans — are to be trucked to the Idaho National Engineering Laboratory. Please bear in mind that Interstate 70 is one of the primary east-west arteries going from New York to Idaho, thus making Kansas one of the potential "hosts" to these nuclear garbagemen.

Secondly, our past record of handling this stuff hardly inspires confidence. At the Hanford nuclear plant in Washington, nearly 115,000 gallons of radioactive material escaped when a transferee tank developed a leak.

Examination of the 1,100 hazardous materials accidents reported between 1977 and 1981 shows that 40 percent of these incidents occurred along nuclear transportation routes. This figure is now probably higher since more nuclear routes to different reactors have been selected. Since shipments of highly radioactive waste is on the increase, the threat increases dramatically each day.

Any accident that occurs would have an incredibly destructive effect, with a highway accident killing tens of thousands of people directly, and hundreds of thousands more cancer deaths from those indirectly exposed, according to the Environmental Policy Institute.

Dr. Berndt Bauer further clarified the impact when he observed that "...released radioactive material could contaminate hundreds of acres of land for thousands of years." Such a mishap would definitely require a permanent detour sign. Even the government's own study, the Sandia Labs report on the hazards of atomic transportation in large cities, noted that a 1 percent release in a highly populated area would be catastrophic in scope.

So why would the Supreme Court, generally a concerned and intelligent bunch, subject the nation to such a perilous problem? Perhaps they, and other government officials, were reassured by the studies of two governmental agencies which placed the probability of such an accident at an incredibly low number.

But in this case, just as in the fable of the emperor's clothes, the justices may just lose their proverbial robes. You see, the people who did this study are the same people who said that Three Mile Island couldn't happen. As the "Stanford Law Review" uncovered in an indepth analysis of these reports, "both the AEC and NRC studies considered only shipping accidents occurring at nuclear power plants; mishaps during transportation of the casks were omitted." On top of that, an accident at the power plant itself has already happened; who's to say that it will not happen again? And more importantly, no study is going to be able to predict dogs running in front of trucks, brakes failing on mountainous roadways, drunken drivers smashing into transport vehicles, or radwaste truck drivers on speed. I won't even bother mentioning intentional releases such as terrorist attacks.

In a world governed by Murphy's law, perhaps we should plan on the worst.

So, just to be on the safe side, if you see a large west-bound transport truck whose driver is sweating bullets with a sign on its side that says, "Caution — Hazardous Materials Inside," please remember to pass with care.

justice? Being ignorant and a mere spectator at this point would not only be a disservice to the unity of the entire Indian Republic, but also to the principles of democracy and justice.

I therefore urge you, the journalists of the media to help in bringing out the truth, and also your readers to pressure Indira Gandhi's government in India to stop this injustice and her dictatorial ways, which are an insult to democracy.

I also request you not to use in your paper adjectives such as "terrorist," "criminals," "fanatics," etc., for the peace-loving Sikhs who have always stood for religious freedom for all religions.

Journalists urged to expose truth on India

Editor,

I am a Sikh who has been living here for the past 6½ years. Deeply hurt over the recent invasion of the Indian Army into the Golden Temple in Amritsar and the relentless killings, I would like to share something with you and your readers.

The U.S. news media must be commended for reporting the situation in Punjab as fairly as possible. They have not failed to mention that the reports of the situation and accusations against the Sikhs came from the Indian government channels and could not be independently verified. This type of fairness in reporting is totally absent in the Indian news media which are under complete control of the government, contrary to democratic principles.

As reported in the Thursday Manhattan Mercury, reporting and publication of news about the operations against the Sikhs is totally banned. Therefore, the government is able to effectively mislead the people and their opinions, outside Punjab. The government has used the media not only to defend itself by making unverifiable accusations, but also for negative publicity by using words like "terrorist" and "criminals" for peaceful demonstrations.

In addition, no effort has been made in informing the public about the demands of the Sikhs in Punjab, which are not only non-religious, but also within the Indian Constitution. Fair distribution of river-water and electricity produced in the state, are examples of this.

The fact that the Sikhs, who have felt suppressed all along, have been staging peaceful demonstrations which progressively became more intense and finally violent, show that they are dissatisfied with the government. To ignore their voice and treat them as futile fanatics and criminals is not justifiable and should not be tolerated.

While the Sikhs and the Indian government stand at opposite banks of this river of accusations, it is not the duty of every proponent of democracy and human rights around the world and particularly the Indians, regardless of their religions, to try one's best to know the truth and to work toward

Acker names lecture chairman

Charles E. Reagan, professor and head of the Department of Philosophy, has been named chairman of the Landon Lectures on Public Issues Series.

President Duane Acker made the announcement June 6. Reagan succeeds William Richter, professor of political science, who has been chairman the past three years.

Biologist wins award for article

John L. Zimmerman, professor of biology, has been awarded the Ernest P. Edward prize "for the best paper published in the Bulletin of the Wilson Ornithological Society during the year." Zimmerman's paper was titled, "Cowbird Parasitism of Dickcissels in Different Habitats and at Different Nest Densities."

The award was based on research conducted in eastern Kansas, including the Konza Prairie Research Natural Area.

Katlin to work for alumni office

Jerry T. Katlin has been named director of alumni/student programs for the K-State Alumni Association.

The director of alumni/student programs is a new position that reflects a change in the focus of activities of the alumni association, said Lawrence Weigel, director of the alumni association.

Katlin will be working with alumni throughout Kansas to identify, train and supervise volunteers to assist with the overall University student contact effort.

KSAC radio personnel win awards

KSAC, K-State's public radio station, won several programming awards for non-commercial stations in the annual Kansas Association of Broadcasters' competition.

The awards were presented at the 34th annual convention held in Manhattan last week.

Award winners were Dev Nelson for public service announcement and feature program; Richard Baker for complete newscast; Deanne Wright for public affairs program; Eric Atkinson for agricultural service; and Ralph Titus for station promotion announcement and DJ personality.

Jack Burke, station manager, said "it is very pleasing to have others recognize the quality of the people and performance that are available on KSAC."

Jack Burke, station manager, also reported that KSAC was presented the Small Business Administration's "Media Advocate Award" for the strengthening of small business and effective reporting.

Steve Martini, assistant director of Recreational Services, and director of intramurals at the L.P. Washburn Recreational Area, has been in charge of intramural sports on campus for four years.

Martini directs 22,000 students as University intramural director

By STEVE ONKEN
Collegian Reporter

Steve Martini has the kind of job many people would jump at the chance to have.

Martini is assistant director of Recreational Services at the L.P. Washburn Recreational Area and director of intramurals.

To some, it might appear that Martini is a man playing in a child's world.

But nothing is farther from the truth, because beneath the athletic title and the sporting connotations, there is a man who supervises more than 22,000 students at various times throughout the year and organizes many different intramural activities.

"Basically, my job is in organizing and developing all of the intramurals that we have for teams and individuals, which is around 30 different activities that we offer the faculty, students and staff," Martini said.

I'm also in charge of hiring training supervisors, and hiring and training all officials for the games," he said. "I also administer to the programs, organizing leagues and helping with the signups."

Martini, who will begin his fifth year at the Rec Complex, said although it can become very complicated handling such a large number of students and spearheading the program, he still enjoys his job, with much of his background showing an emphasis on intramural competition and organization.

"Obviously, I am doing this job because I like it. I got my bachelor's and my master's degrees (in physical education) from California State University, where I also received my high school teaching credentials," Martini said.

"When I was getting my master's, I was an intramural official for about four years. While I was getting my teaching credentials, I worked for the intramural department, and when I was getting my master's, I was the graduate assistant to the intramural department for two years. I really became involved with the program," Martini said.

"I did my master's thesis on sports club programs at the university there and, with that experience, was able to work as sports club director and to coach volleyball," he said.

Despite his job satisfaction, there are times Martini likes to escape from occupational pressures.

"I like to go bicycle touring. I teach bicycle touring on campus through the continuing education programs and it is probably one of my favorite pastimes. I like to teach others how to get involved in bicycling," he said.

"Also, I like to listen to music, and I take a lot of pictures and do a little photography work when I am able to get outside to do it," he said. "I usually try to do it in conjunction with my bicycle riding."

His main focus in his occupation may lie in the area of intramurals, but Martini freely boasts of the fact that the Rec Complex offers more than intramural competition.

"We are not just intramurals, we are definitely a lot of the recreation found across the campus. The nice thing about the rec services is that it offers a multitude of activities for all of the people on campus. It is important because you spend seven, eight, nine hours a day in school and you get all of that mental exercise. Physical exercise is just the other part of students' lives," he said.

"We just try to provide students with all different varieties of things that the students can do in intramurals activities, but if you just want to come out and shoot some buckets you can do that anytime," he said.

But when it comes to competition, the intramural program is as strong as many of the teams in competition and the many games being played. Martini said that there was about 22,000 participants involved with the intramural programs, but one individual may be involved several times.

"As far as intramurals go, the most teams that I have in any one sports are (in) intramural basketball. Last year I would say we had 400 teams participate," he said.

"The whole program of the rec services here at K-State, per population of the amount of students that we have, the participation level is the highest I have seen almost anywhere. The students are real fortunate because the administration had the foresight a few years ago to provide the Rec Complex. The students helped pay for and they should be proud of themselves for doing it, for a lot of schools don't have this kind of facility," Martini said.

Martini said he has very few problems with student participants.

"The kids at K-State are good here and they don't cause many problems. They understand the rules the way they are — not that they don't question them — but they usually don't cause a lot of problems compared to some of the other schools I have been connected with," he said.

Royals continue streak, lose to A's

By The Associated Press

OAKLAND — Davey Lopes became the first Oakland player in nearly four years to hit an inside-the-park home run and Dave Kingman slugged his 18th homer of the season as the A's swept to a 10-2 victory over the Kansas City Royals Monday night.

Lopes looped a soft liner that fell in between diving outfielders Willie Wilson and Pat Sheridan in right-center with one out in the sixth. As the ball rolled behind them, Lopes circled the bases behind Corny Lansford, who had doubled earlier as the A's took a 4-0 lead.

The last Oakland player to hit an inside-the-park homer was Rickey Henderson on July 6, 1980 in Chicago.

Winner Ray Burris, 6-3, gave up two runs in seven innings to gain the victory, while Keith Atherton pitched the final two innings of scoreless relief. Larry Gura, 7-3, suffered the loss.

The Royals dropped their fourth straight game with the loss after losing three at home to the Minnesota Twins in a weekend series.

Kansas City continued to suffer with a scoring slump against the A's. The Royals could manage only two runs on nine hits. Right fielder Pat Sheridan led the Kansas City attack, going 3 for 4 while Darryl Motley and U.L. Washington drove in the only Royal runs.

Tonight the Royals will try to get back on the winning track, sending Bud Black, 6-5, to the mound.

Zoeller wins U.S. Open title

By The Associated Press

MAMARONECK, N.Y. — Fuzzy Zoeller, victim of a cross-country putt Sunday, holed an even longer one Monday that propelled him to the United States Open Golf Championship in a record-setting 8-stroke playoff decision over struggling, scowling Greg Norman.

Zoeller, a happy-go-lucky man who strolled the Winged Foot fairways in apparent ease and unconcern, added the 84th American national championship to the Masters crown he won in 1979 with a solid playoff round of 67, 3 under par.

Norman, the 29-year-old Australian import known as the "Great White Shark," was speared with the loss of three shots to Zoeller on the second playoff hole. He never led, simply couldn't do anything right and eventually made his way through rain-dampened rough, wet sand, dripping trees and 3-putt greens to a fat 75.

It was the most lopsided, 18-hole playoff in U.S. Open history, in fact, the largest in any of the major championships. Bobby Jones beat Al Espinosa on the same Winged Foot course 141-164 in a 36-hole playoff for the 1929 Open title.

Norman provided the greatest drama of regulation play when he dropped a breaking, across-the-green putt of perhaps 50 feet in length to save par on the 72nd hole and force the playoff. Each finished four rounds at 276, 4 under par.

But, long as that Sunday putt was, Zoeller made one of even greater distance.

After both players had birdied the first hole in a misting rain, Norman drove into the rough on the second, couldn't reach the green and chipped on in three.

Zoeller put his approach on the back right of the green. (The distance later was measured at 68 feet.)

He tapped the downhill putt then stood, and watched and waited, watched and waited some more as the ball, moving slowly over the wet green, rolled inexorably toward the cup and died in the cup for a birdie.

The shaken Norman then 3-putted from 20 feet for a double bogey.

It was a 3-shot swing, a 3-stroke lead for Fuzzy. And, at that early point, it was all but over.

Both bogeyed the third.

Fuzzy's leading margin went to four when Norman bogeyed the fourth from a bunker. It went to five when the Australian failed to get up and down from still another bunker on the eighth.

By the third hole, Zoeller, occasionally whistling softly to himself, was walking to the gallery ropes to shake hands with friends.

The sixth victory of Zoeller's 10-year PGA Tour career was worth $94,000 and increased Zoeller's earnings for the year to $154,442. Norman, a dedicated globe-trotter who had won more than 30 tournaments around the world before he settled in the United States last year, took some consolation from a $47,000 check.

Swale's owners bid farewell

By The Associated Press

LEXINGTON, Ky. — The people who foaled, raised and broke Swale buried him in silence Monday, bidding farewell to the colt who gave them lots to brag about with Kentucky Derby and Belmont Stakes wins.

Swale, who collapsed and died Sunday after a gallop at Belmont, was only the third Claiborne horse to be buried in entirety in the shady cemetery behind the farm office.

The whole bodies of Nasrullah and Princequillo are also in the tiny graveyard, but only the head, heart and hooves of the others — including Bold Ruler, Hoist the Flag and Buckpasser — are there.

"Each man in his own mind said his farewell. Everybody was standing there. It was very simple and very quick," said John Sosby, general manager of the famed breeding farm in nearby Paris.

No outsiders were there he said, "just the Claiborne family." That includes Claiborne president Seth Hancock, his mother Waddell, sisters Clay and Dell and brother A.B. Hancock III, as well as about 45 full-time members of the staff.

Meanwhile, officials in New York said pathologists were still trying to find the cause of Swale's untimely death. They first suspected a heart attack, but a post-mortem showed no signs of cardiac failure.

Trainer Woody Stephens also was mystified about why Swale reared up and collapsed during a sponge bath: "It's all in the hands of the veterinarians now. The horse never had a sick day in his life."

Claiborne has been among the best-known thoroughbred farms for years, but Swale was the first colt to carry its unadorned orange-gold silks to the Kentucky Derby winner's circle. He ran away with the Belmont Stakes June 9, but a No. 7 finish prevented him from following his sire, Seattle Slew, to the Triple Crown.

Frozen embryos may be heirs to real estate

By The Associated Press

SYDNEY, Australia — Questions about the fate of two frozen embryos after the death of the couple who produced them have pointed up the dilemma posed by creation of life in a laboratory.

Are the embryos human beings? Are scientists ethically obliged to try to bring them to birth by implanting them in a surrogate mother? Do they have rights of inheritance from the people who produced them?

In this case, the couple that produced the embryos are said to have amassed a fortune — Australian newspapers say $7 million — from real estate in Los Angeles. The couple, South American-born Elsa and Mario Rios, were killed in the crash of a private plane in Chile on April 2, 1983, Chilean newspapers said.

The couple had enrolled in a "test-tube baby" program at Melbourne, Australia's, Queen Victoria Medical Center in 1981 after their young daughter died.

Several eggs were removed from Mrs. Rios, fertilized with her husband's sperm in a laboratory container, and one of the fertilized eggs was implanted in her womb, according to hospital records. She had a miscarriage 10 days later.

The two remaining embryos were frozen so doctors could try a later implantation. But the couple died before that could be done.

Since then, doctors have successfully thawed frozen human embryos, and this year the first birth resulted. But Professor Carl Wood, head of the medical center's in vitro fertilization team, said it was unlikely that the dead couple's two embryos would survive thawing because they were frozen at a time when the method was just being developed.

A doctor, Linda Mohr, who is head of embryo-freezing at the medical center, where the embryos of the now-dead parents were produced, says there are more than 200 frozen embryos in storage there.

Experts say the questions raised by this case go to the heart of the issue of in vitro fertilization, the scientific term for the process of fertilizing a human egg in a laboratory dish.

The premier of Victoria state, John Cain, said a committee studying ethics of test-tube births would decide the fate of the frozen embryos, and Attorney General Jim Kennan indicated Monday that the state would follow the committee's recommendations.

"The present legal status of the embryos is unclear. It may be that they are not owned by anyone," he said.

The head of the committee, Louis Waller, a professor, said the group would try to reach a decision quickly on who decides the fate of the embryos.

"Our recommendations need to be formulated, they need to be published and then the attorney general and the whole Cabinet will have an opportunity to consider them and to decide what response the government is going to make to those recommendations," Waller said.

The dilemma highlights how the rapid advance of in vitro fertilization has outstripped laws and attitudes, experts say.

Justice Michael Kirby of the Australian Law Reform Commission has been trying to revise the nation's laws to cope with the process.

Are embryos that are conceived outside the womb a form of property with no defined rights as conventional laws suggest? Kirby asked.

Mohr said recently that society must give scientists guidance on how far to go with in vitro fertilization.

"If the parents die or they separate or they don't want their embryos, are they my responsibility? Can an embryo inherit things? I don't know what the answers are," she told a medical convention.

Kirby said scientists are creating life in the laboratory and gaining the ability to change it while society stumbles behind trying to comprehend the implications, he said.

"We're dealing with the question of humans deciding their future," he said.

While officials and scholars ponder the fate of the embryos whose parents have died, other experts face equally disturbing questions, Waller and Kirby said. The questions include:

- Should experiments be allowed on fetal tissue, including the possible production of embryos for "spare parts" that could be used in transplants? Melbourne scientists have been asked to do such work.
- Should in vitro fertilization be used to create human beings physically and mentally suited for particular tasks such as space travel?

"The scientists are not manipulating human beings for pure science or inhuman ends but for the alleviation of human suffering, the plight of childless couples," Kirby said.

Opponents of in vitro fertilization contend scientists are operating without control. Mary Pretty, head of a group that opposes the technique as unnatural and immoral, called on the state of Victoria to appoint a legal guardian to look out for the rights of embryos if the people who produced them die.

"Although the possibility of tragedies such as this occurring have been pointed out by many people, the IVF (in vitro fertilization) scientists had insisted on going ahead before any ethical or legal framework existed for protecting the rights of the test-tube babies involved," she said.

Dr. Robyn Rowland, formerly on the Melbourne in vitro fertilization team, said: "Until we sort out who owns the embryos already in existence I think we certainly should not create or freeze any more."

West Bank remains center of conflict

'Jewish underground' draws criticism

By The Associated Press

KIRYAT ARBA, Occupied West Bank — By day, children pedaled tricycles and chased each other across the grassy lawns of this Jewish settlement while their mothers rocked baby carriages and kittens frolicked among the flowering shrubs.

By night, the settlement looked like a town under siege. Most people stayed inside their apartments with their families. Floodlights illuminated the barbed-wire fences, and armed guards moved into a stone bunker at the front gate.

Kiryat Arba's security chief, a U.S.-born Vietnam veteran who asked to be identified only as David, climbed into his jeep and drove slowly down the hill into the sprawling Palestinian city of Hebron. A spotlight mounted on top of the jeep swept across the road and over the roofs of Palestinian houses.

The few Palestinians on the streets blinked and scowled as David swiveled the spotlight into their faces.

"The Arabs would love to get this jeep. They've offered a couple thousand dollars to anyone who kills the driver," he claimed.

Kiryat Arba, a compact collection of four- and five-story apartment buildings, is a pioneering symbol and ideological center of the Jewish settlement movement in the West Bank.

At least a third of the 27 men arrested in connection with a "Jewish underground" accused of committing acts of terror against Palestinians have ties to Kiryat Arba, either as residents, former residents or relatives of settlement leaders. To many settlers they are heroes.

"Anything they have done was done for the sake of their country," said Rachel Klein, a middle-aged mother of four who has lived in Kiryat Arba since 1975.

Not all residents have that opinion. Three people who met a reporter in an alley after nightfall requested anonymity for fear of retaliation against their families by fellow settlers.

"The Jewish underground is basically misinformed young idealists who were led to believe they could do anything and the authorities would look the other way," said a settler who is an Israeli army reserve officer.

One of his friends added that Kiryat Arba was the source of "moral values for all settlers in Judea and Samaria," the biblical name for the West Bank. "There are people here who tell them that stealing and killing are OK, because the outcome is holy, that they can do anything they want and it's OK because they are doing it to reclaim the land of Israel."

Two of the men said that 72 semi-automatic rifles have been missing from the Kiryat Arba arsenal for several months. "We need to clean our own house," one of the men said. "There are people here who should have been disciplined a long time ago."

Kiryat Arba's 5,000 Jews are surrounded in all directions by the more than 200,000 Palestinians of Hebron and nearby villages. The hilltop settlement is both revered and reviled as the home of modern-day Jews who are not afraid to live in the midst of hostile Arabs, Jews who are not afraid of killing or being killed.

The settlement started in 1968, less than a year after Israel captured the West Bank from Jordan. Since then, eight Jewish settlers have been shot or stabbed to death in Hebron. Three of the six attacks in which the Jewish underground is charged occurred in Hebron, including last July's machine gun ambush at the Islamic University which killed three Palestinian students and wounded 33 others.

Most Kiryat Arba settlers carry guns when they go down the hill to ## Computer voice tells directory information

By The Associated Press

HARRISBURG, Pa. — The stereotypical nasal voice of the directory assistance operator is being replaced all over the country with a voice generated by computer microchips.

Slowly but inexorably, telephone systems nationwide are installing computer equipment that generates a female-sounding voice that recites the requested number twice.

Forty percent of the old Bell Telephone system nationwide has the computerized audio response system, and all directory assistance offices will be using it by mid-1985, said Richard Keener, a district manager for Bell Communications Research.

The reason, quite simply, is economic. Operators can handle 25 percent more calls with the help of their computerized sidekick.

With the new system, an operator takes a call, finds the requested number on a monitor and then punches the information into a computer that could be a hundred miles away. The computer voice synthesizer repeats the phone number twice and then tells the caller he or she can stay on the line if they want to talk to a human again.

"It saves six seconds of working time per call for operators," said Dan Sands, division manager of operator services for Bell of Pennsylvania.

"That may not sound like a lot. But when you're getting 100,000 calls a day, six seconds adds up to a considerable amount of time," he said. Without the computer-generated voice, an operator uses an average of 25 seconds per call.

Company officials said callers using directory assistance seemed to be accepting the body-less voices.

House gives approval to amnesty provision

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The House tentatively agreed Tuesday to allow illegal aliens who have lived and worked in the United States since 1982 to become legal residents, eligible for eventual citizenship.

But that decision, by a 245-181 vote, could still be reversed. An attempt was to be made later to kill all the amnesty provisions in the immigration control bill before the House. Amnesty "rewards lawbreakers," said the proponent of killing the legalization program, Rep. Bill McCollum, R-Fla.

Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr. said knocking out the amnesty provisions would have the effect of killing the bill itself. President Reagan said last week the bill's enactment is needed to enable the nation to regain control of its borders.

But Reagan supported less generous amnesty provisions than the House tentatively accepted.

Reagan wanted a proposal under which illegal aliens who have lived continuously in this country since 1980 would be eligible to become temporary legal residents. After three years they could have applied to become legal residents.

The INS said 1.6 million illegal aliens would qualify under the administration proposal, which was sponsored by Rep. Daniel Lungren, R-Calif. It said 2.9 million would qualify under the plan tentatively approved.

"Legalization is a critical element of comprehensive reform legislation," Attorney General William French Smith said in a letter read to the House. "At the same time, legalization is an extraordinary benefit which must not be conferred lightly."

The Senate-passed bill, passed a year ago, carried the legalization provisions favored by the administration.

A third alternative, proposed by McCollum, would kill all amnesty proposals.

"I think legalization is a slap at the face to millions who stood in line to come into the country legally," McCollum told the House. "It rewards lawbreakers."

Added a colleague, Rep. Tom Lewis, R-Fla.: "Illegal is illegal."

Rep. Robert Garcia, D-N.Y., leader of the House's 11-member Hispanic bloc, replied: "You can't fault people just for trying to feed themselves. I know that if I were hungry I would probably end up breaking the law, and if my children were hungry I would break the law even faster."

Lewis said illegal aliens were taking jobs from his constituents.

The immigration measure, nearing a final vote after a week's intense, often personal debate, also would make it illegal to employ illegal aliens and would create a "guest worker" program under which an estimated 300,000 foreign workers would be imported to harvest perishable crops on the West Coast. They would do work now performed by illegal aliens.

O'Neill, D-Mass., predicted that the controversial bill would be defeated if amnesty were not included.

Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass., backed the more generous legalization date. He said the 1980 date proposed by Lungren and supported by the White House would leave millions of workers in the United States who could not find jobs but who could not be located for deportation proceedings without unacceptable regimentation of U.S. society.

"It cannot be in our interest to create so large a class of desperate people," Frank argued. He said under Lungren's proposal people who had lived in the United States for 3.5 years would be in an underclass — unable to work, but unwilling to leave.

Those granted legal residence under the bill — no matter what dates were adopted — would be eligible to become citizens of the United States after five years.

Hispanic leaders disputed the contentions that millions would apply for legal status. Helen Gonzales of the Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund said the requirements are so stiff that few would qualify.

To qualify, an alien would have to show that he had earned a living while living here, had not returned to his homeland for any but short periods and had not gotten into serious trouble with the law.

Those in the debate agreed that no one knows how many illegal aliens live in the United States or how many would come forward and seek legalization. The INS has estimated that 6.25 million illegal aliens live in the country and about 35 percent would apply for amnesty.

Those who didn't make it would be deportable.

Lungren said the five-year federal cost of reimbursing the states for educational and social services for legalized aliens would be $6.6 billion. Under his proposal, the cost would be $3.4 billion, he said.

Ellen Gormely, 10, of Manhattan, asks Kim Rahlfs, graduate in education curriculum and instruction, a question during the computer section of the K-State Enrichment School Tuesday afternoon. About 50 children are participating in the school offered through the Division of Continuing Education.

Program offers 'no grades' enrichment

By SHERRI HAGER
Collegian Reporter

The children line up single file, each ready to spread their frozen bananas with peanut butter that they've just made.

These children are participants in the K-State Enrichment School offered through the Division of Continuing Education.

The summer enrichment program is for children ages 8 to 12 and is designed to provide students with curriculum not usually available in elementary schools.

The program — which started June 7 — lasts for about four weeks and meets from 1 to 4 p.m. Monday through Thursday on campus.

Enrollment in the program is kept to a minimum in order to meet the students' special needs within the curriculum, said Marilyn Ball, director of this summer program. About 50 children are enrolled this summer.

"The summer enrichment school has been in existence for three years. This year the staff consists of four certified teachers and myself," Ball said.

The four classes offered are science, introduction to foods and nutrition, computers, and folklore and fantasy. Computers is the only class which has been offered before, Ball said.

The science class, taught by Larry Liotta, deals with concepts in earth science, ecology and rocketry. Last summer biology was taught.

The class began three weeks ago with a "space" presentation by Thomas E. Vallilee from the NASA Lyndon B. Johnson Space Center. A tour of the K-State planetarium was given the following week.

The students this week continued building their own rockets and learning about the different parts of the rocket.

"What are the fins for?" Liotta asked.

"Balance and direction," chorused the students.

"Right," Liotta said. "They make it fly straight instead of crooked."

Introduction to foods and nutrition is taught by Janet Helm. Principles of instruction include nutrition, food science and meal preparation. The students participate in weighing and measuring ingredients, cooking, tasting and evaluating food products.

"Each week we learn about a different nutrient," Helm said. "Last week we studied the milk group and the mineral calcium, and then

Long-distance call costs to decrease

Telephone rate reduction receives OK

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Kansas Corporation Commission has given final approval to a $6 million rate reduction for AT&T Communications of the Southwest, which is expected to reduce costs for long-distance calls made within the state an average 8.5 percent.

The utility regulatory commission on Tuesday announced it had given final approval to the company's proposal the previous day. However, the reduction in rates will not take effect until late June or early July when a schedule of the lower charges is filed with the agency.

AT&T Communications, which generally provides long-distance services between area codes in Kansas, proposed the reduction of $6.03 million in late May saying its operating expenses were lower than expected so far this year.

The company was granted a $12.3 million rate increase last year and it took effect Jan. 1 on an interim basis, pending application for a permanent rate hike. The rates were based on projections of the company's revenues and expenses when it began to operate as an independent telephone company in January following divestiture of American Telephone & Telegraph Co.

As approved by the three-member corporation board, the rate reduction will cut charges between 1 cent and 6 cents per minute of long distance calls. Costs of the first minute of any call will remain unchanged, but most rates for every additional minute will be lower.

For example, rates will drop from 39 cents to 33 cents per additional minute for a call covering 56-70 miles.

A five-minute call from Topeka to Wichita will go from $2.38 to $2.18 excluding taxes.

Although they are in the same area codes, a similar call from Topeka to Kansas City, Kan., will drop from $1.94 to $1.74 because metropolitan Kansas City is in a different long distance service area.

A call from Topeka to Garden City will go from $2.59 to $2.39.

Under the plan approved Monday, rates will remain unchanged for toll-free WATS line services, surcharges for operator-assisted calls and rates for private lines services, which are leased long-distance lines such as used by the state of Kansas and some businesses.

The corporation commission's action completes a rate case filed by the company last October. AT&T originally requested a $23.7 million rate increase last October, in anticipation of divestiture. It later reduced the request by about half and the KCC granted $12 million in temporary rates in December.

City delays ruling on service programs

By MELISSA BRUNE
Staff Writer

The Manhattan City Commission decided Tuesday to postpone decisions concerning the funding of area social service programs.

Commissioner Rick Mann was appointed mayor pro tem, in the absence of Mayor Dave Fiser and Commissioner Suzanne Lindamood. Mann moved to delay decisions on these items until all commissioners could be present.

The Crisis Center requested $30,000 from the city to meet operational expenses for the first quarter of fiscal 1985, which begins July 1.

Crisis Center Director Judy Davis projected the center's budget for fiscal 1985 to be $128,895, compared to fiscal 1984's budget of approximately $127,000.

Davis said the center needed the funds because funding from other sources for fiscal 1984 was less than the center had anticipated.

The commission decided to postpone making a decision on the request until a July 10 work session on revenue sharing. Davis also said utilization of the center's shelter for battered and abused women increased 27 percent in 1984, causing funds to be depleted more rapidly.

The center serves Manhattan and Junction City, as well as other communities in the Riley and Geary counties.

Commissioner Gene Klingler said he did not believe Junction City or Riley County were providing enough financial support to the center.

"I think it's time Riley County started doing something in this," he said.

Davis said the Riley County commission was approached by the center last year for funding, but was told the county is not legally capable of funding social services. Commissioners suggested the funding decision wait until more information on this issue could be provided by the county.

The authorization of contracts with four local agencies was delayed, also. The Special Alcohol and Drug Program Funds Advisory Committee recommended to the commission in May that the city fund four separate agencies and two special programs for a budget of $84,900.

The four agencies were recommended by the committee from a field of seven agencies which appealed to the city for a total of approximately $113,000 in funding.

Consideration of the contract authorizations was placed on the agenda for the July 17 regular commission meeting.

In other business, Bruce McCallum, director of public works, informed the commission of the recent storm effects on public facilities and drainage systems.

Both drainage and sanitary sewer systems experienced problems, especially on June 6 and 9, when rainfall was extremely heavy, McCallum said.

The K-State recording station reported 9.2 inches of rain from June 6 through Saturday. McCallum said the heavy rain caused drainage problems, but most drainage systems functioned "as well as could be anticipated for the way they were designed."

On June 6 the public works department received 12 calls from residents with sewer problems. On June 9 the department received 25 calls. McCallum said City Hall and Manhattan Public Library both had 10 to 12 inches of sanitary sewer water in their basements due to the rain.

Senate hears debate on national increase of legal drinking age

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — At a hearing filled with all the anger of a barroom brawl, the Senate was urged Tuesday to approve raising the legal drinking age to 21 and the wiping out "blood borders" between states.

The drinking age bill, which cleared the House overwhelmingly on June 7, was opposed by student groups and owners of taverns and restaurants who said that if teen-agers want to drink, they will.

The two sides waged an emotional battle with statistical weapons as they sat before a map with "blood borders" outlined in red, showing state boundaries that teen-agers drive across to obtain liquor they are too young to buy legally at home.

Representatives of parents' groups, safety organizations and the Reagan administration told a Senate Labor and Human Resources subcommittee that much of the nation's highway carnage is caused by teen-agers who drive into other states with a lower drinking age.

"I'm tired of the argument that 'if you're old enough to fight you're old enough to drink,'" said Candy Lightner, president of Mothers Against Drunk Driving.

Michael M. Birkley, executive director of the Tavern League of Wisconsin, was no less emotional. "In addition to our commercial interest, we have children, too," he said. "We care more about our children than our cash registers."

Birkley warned Sen. Paula Hawkins, R-Fla., the subcommittee chairman, not to "take anybody's word" that raising the drinking age to a uniform 21 nationwide will reduce highway deaths.

Teen-agers, he said, would get their liquor anyway, just as Americans did during Prohibition.

The heat of the debate suggested that the measure, which the Reagan administration has endorsed, will have a tougher time getting through the Senate than it did the House, which approved the bill, 297-73.

Sponsored by Sen. Frank R. Lautenberg, D-N.J., the bill would withhold a portion of federal highway construction funds from any state that refused to set a 21-year drinking age for buying beer, wine or liquor.

Twenty-three states have set a legal drinking age of 21, already in effect or taking effect by next January. Other states have varying age limits, some as low as 18.

Under Lautenberg's bill, states not raising the minimum drinking age to 21 within two years would have 5 percent of their 1987 federal highway aid money withheld. The figure would rise to 10 percent of the 1988 allocation, but withheld funds would be released retroactively once a 21-year limit was enacted.

Improvements for disabled lack funds

By TIM FITZGERALD
Collegian Reporter

Gretchen Holden can speak with solemn honesty or unyielding determination. A determination which shows when she says there are no students who can't go to school at K-State because they are in a wheelchair.

Holden, who has been K-State's coordinator of services for physically limited students for almost two years, isn't located in a lavish office filled with scholarly books. Instead, one of the tiny walls is covered with a map of the entire campus highlighted to show accessible and inaccessible buildings and the curb cuts around campus.

Her bookshelves are filled with studies on services for the handicapped and addresses of businesses who supply equipment for the handicapped. Her office embodies Holden's determination to make K-State more accessible to handicapped students.

K-State is the least accessible campus that the Kansas Board of Regents oversees, Holden said. Many of the problems, though, stem from the fact that many of the buildings with little accessibility are highly important to students. Buildings such as Anderson Hall, which houses the University's administrative offices; Fairchild Hall, home of the financial aid office and the graduate school; Kedzie Hall, location of the political science and journalism and mass communications departments; and Calvin Hall, location of the College of Business, all have limited accessibility to students in a wheelchair.

By no means does Holden feel every building and every classroom on the campus needs to be accessible. But, she said the latest classroom listing she has seen showed only 52 percent of the classrooms scheduled for use next fall are accessible. This low percentage has already caused Holden to ask the registrar's office to move some classes.

Moving classes is a practice which usually causes little trouble, but one time Holden said a lecture class based around the use of dual slide projectors had to be moved from Justin Hall to Kedzie where facilities for the use of the dual projectors didn't exist.

'It takes leadership from the top to start things.'

— Gretchen Holden

One of the biggest problems Holden faces is the lack of substantial funding to conquer the items she has listed as highly important. A $300,000 allocation by the state legislature in 1978 was quickly exhausted and ever since then Holden said they have had to scratch for every possible dollar. But funding is a problem Holden feels could be diminishing.

"(K-State) President (Duane) Acker has been very generous this year in funding curb cuts and has taken some interest in making some of these improvements and we're very grateful to see his support. A lot of times that is where you see these campuses get their accessibility. Emporia (State University) is accessible because years ago the president said 'we're going to lead in this area' and they did. It takes leadership from the top to start things," Holden said.

No matter how much support Holden receives from University, it may be difficult for the campus to become highly accessible. A study completed in January by Gene Cross, vice president for University Facilities, states $2.19 million is needed to make the campus thoroughly accessible to the physically handicapped.

Curb cuts are a high priority to Holden, but the cuts which allow accessibility of wheelchairs cost about $800 each.

"A curb just doesn't seem like anything at all. What's a curb? But when you realize you can't go from building to building because there is a curb between these buildings, curb cuts become critical," Holden said.

Another large problem with accessibility is due to the many older buildings on the K-State campus. Retrofitting — modifying the design to incorporate improvements — the older buildings is sometimes close to impossible to do, Holden said. Also, the expense in remodeling existing structures is tremendous.

"My next reward is Kedzie, because I think journalism is a very attractive area for someone in a wheelchair," Holden said. Holden said she would also like to see Calvin Hall retrofitted, because she said she believes a business degree is highly flexible for a person in a wheelchair.

A lack of active concern exhibited by the Student Senate worries Holden. She said that students can't simply be asked to go to Emporia State if they are in a wheelchair, for more reasons than Emporia State doesn't offer their desired major.

"Almost everybody we're seeing here in a wheelchair right now was going to K-State when the accident occurred. We have four young men who were all severely injured in the last two or three years who were already enrolled here. So, they wanted to come back here and be with friends, where they had social support. Where they knew their way around. Where they would be thought of first as a person and second of as a person in a wheelchair," Holden said.

Financial assistance from the Student Governing Association to help fellow students would help, Holden said. She pointed out that the University of Colorado's Student Senate has a practice of pledging money to accessibility in its allocations process. But, she puts little hope in K-State's senate acting with CU's concern, based on her battles with senate concerning the on-campus building-to-building shuttle for handicapped students.

"My experience with SGA is they don't want to give any money. They're not very concerned about (the shuttle), they even put in a users fee this year to ride it, rather than fund it. They'll fund $6,000 for debate, but transportation for the physically limited? They don't want to do it," Holden said.

The presence of students in a wheelchair is not a hindrance to the students, but something which Holden feels is a motivation for the entire student body.

"We become a little bit apathetic when everybody is like us. When we see somebody meeting a challenge like (being in a wheelchair), it really does tend to make us think more about why we are complaining that a teacher popped an exam on us. It puts things in a whole different perspective when you see that life is that much harder for other people," Holden said.

Despite the never ending battle for funding and the long list of possible projects, Holden says she is happy with K-State's accessibility, because there is progress. It is a happiness which grows from her own determination to make K-State a school attendable for all students, whether they are walking or in a wheelchair.

Ruling may prevent grain dust explosions

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — An Iowa safety official urged the federal Occupational Safety and Health Administration Tuesday to give quick approval to a regulation to prevent deadly explosions of grain dust in elevators and mills.

"Don't let people rely on a safety program stored in a file cabinet for the protection of real people in the real world," Jerome M. Skeers of the Iowa Bureau of Labor told the OSHA hearing.

Skeers was one of more than a dozen government, industry and union officials scheduled to testify during three days of hearings in Kansas City on regulations proposed by OSHA to improve safety in grain handling facilities.

Rules proposed by the federal agency would require grain handlers to take steps to cut down the amount of dust that accumulates within their facilities and allow accumulations of no more than one-eighth of an inch.

Skeers and Walter Johnson, deputy commissioner for the Iowa Department of Labor, said grain handlers in the state have delayed safety programs in anticipation of federal standards. They contended that industry groups have tried to drag out the scientific studies of grain dust dangers to avoid swift implementation of standards to reduce the hazards.

Parent Guaranteed LOANS

Parent guaranteed loans, another good idea from the Idea Bank.

Kansas State Bank is making parent loans. Parent loan enables the parents or parent to borrow directly from the Kansas State Bank to pay for their sons' and daughters' cost of attending post-secondary schools.

A parent loan does not require collateral and is a guaranteed loan by HEAF.

Rate is 12% and repayment starts 60 days after the parent has received the funds.

Kansas State Bank is making these loans available in the Manhattan trade area.

Call or write the Kansas State Bank Student Loan Department for more details.

FONE keeps initial goals after 10 years

In late 1969, a K-State student pulled together a number of students and professional resources to begin a telephone crisis center for the campus and community.

At the same time, the results of a student survey were compiled and evaluated. When students were asked who they would turn to when needing help, the majority of them stated they would turn to their peers before consulting a professional.

The first page of the FONE Walk-In Crisis Center Training Manual gives this information to prospective volunteers.

The concept of the FONE Crisis Center is now over a decade old and still follows the basic objectives it started with: that the facility is there to offer help, not judgments, that alternatives would be made available and that professional resources were available if needed.

Also, the center extends community awareness of some of the problems in contemporary society.

During the summer of 1973, the Walk-In Center was started. Today, the center is known as the FONE Walk-In Crisis Center. According to Jody Hackerott, assistant director of the center, it has two purposes: to listen to someone when they need to talk and, if appropriate, to refer them to professional agencies or persons who are better able to aid the individual during a crisis.

Hackerott said the FONE receives about 3,000 calls a year, which averages around eight to 10 calls a night. About 60 percent of the calls tend to be five to 10 minutes in length — the rest are longer. About 40 percent of the center's calls concern loneliness or depression, while the rest fall into other problem categories such as suicide or drug abuse.

"Our volunteers must be non-judgmental and must have respect for confidentiality," Hackerott said. "Confidentiality is highly stressed in the FONE Training Manual and also in training sessions. The FONE asks that each volunteer never discuss a call with someone outside the service."

"No moral judgment" is the basic guideline of the FONE, therefore, it helps if the volunteers possess the ability to remain nonjudgmental regardless of personal feelings or beliefs.

According to Hackerott, the primary functions of the FONE are to listen and be supportive, giving feedback to what is heard and to be empathetic, to share with the person that he or she is hurting.

The FONE is in operation from 5 p.m. to 8:30 a.m. every weekday with 24-hour operation on weekends. The FONE office is located at 1221 Thurston and the telephone number is 532-6565.

Local SPURS chapter hosts national meeting

The K-State chapter of SPURS, a sophomore honorary, will host the national SPURS convention today through Saturday on campus.

Approximately 110 students from 26 chapters nationwide will attend, said Molly Meisenheimer, SPURS regional director and junior in elementary education. The students attending the convention will be housed at Moore Hall.

Workshops and business meetings will be held in the Union throughout the week. University professors will speak on several topics: motivation, leadership, interpersonal communications, time management and public relations.

Activities planned include a beach party at Tuttle Creek Reservoir, a banquet and talent show.

The national SPURS convention is held every other year and K-State was chosen as this year's site during the 1982 convention in Las Vegas, Nev.

The convention is to promote unity among national members, Meisenheimer said. Ideas about service project and goals will also be exchanged.

Membership in the SPURS honorary is based on sophomore standing, leadership qualities and maintenance of a 3.0 grade point average.

Comedian to perform at FONE benefit

Steve Landesberg, best known for his role as Sgt. Arthur Dietrich on the television comedy series "Barney Miller," will be performing at 8 tonight at the Manhattan High School auditorium as part of a benefit for the FONE Crisis Center.

Collegian reporter Lisa Ford interviewed the comedian by phone June 12.

Collegian: Where are you from, Steve?

Landesberg: I'm from New York, where are you from?

Collegian: I'm from Wathena, Kan. Do you know where that is?

Landesberg: No. Do you know where New York is? What part of Kansas are you from?

Collegian: The northeast corner, near Kansas City.

Landesberg: Oh, I know where that is; I've been there. I worked there.

Collegian: What did you do in Kansas City?

Landesberg: There was a theater there that I did.

Collegian: What was it called?

Landesberg: I don't remember.

Collegian: Did you come from a large or small family?

Landesberg: I'm an only child.

Collegian: Were you shy as a child?

Landesberg: Yeah. I was basically shy, but I'd talk to people that I knew fairly well. That's kind of the way I was with my comedy. I was kind of "closet funny." The people I was comfortable with, I was funny with. I don't think it matters if you're shy or outgoing or whatever, though. It depends on how much talent you have and what you do with it. Eventually I just started getting up (doing stand-up comedy), but the truth is that there was a period of time where I was just funny with certain people. Even now I think I keep my humor personal, because it is personal. You know that if you're not really into what you're doing, it's not going to come out of you. There are certain people that literally turn you on and make you funny.

Collegian: What did you and your friends do when you were younger?

Landesberg: We hung out, we played ball, we shot pool. Stuff like that. We hung around the schoolyard and played cards.

Collegian: How did you do in school? Were you a good student in school?

Landesberg: No. I didn't like school. I was a good student in the early days, but afterward I wasn't. I just didn't like school. I didn't even like acting school. It just wasn't for me. I'd go to acting class, I'd sit around, maybe I'd do a scene — I just wouldn't last long. I'm not even good at rehearsing. When we were doing "Barney Miller," it really wouldn't happen until we were doing it for real. I like acting itself, not the things that lead up to acting.

Collegian: Didn't that put a scare into your producer or director?

Landesberg: No, because they know me.

Collegian: They knew that when the time came, you'd come through?

Landesberg: Yeah, absolutely. That's why I had confidence, too. I didn't have to be under the pressure of "Oh, no. Here they (the producers) come. They're going to look at us," because they knew me and I knew that when the time came, it would happen.

Collegian: Do you like to read a lot?

Landesberg: Yeah, I read a lot. I like journalism. I like good sports writing. That's my favorite.

Collegian: Do you like stand-up comedy?

Landesberg: I like it, but I don't like it all year round. The last couple of years I've been doing a lot of it and I've been flying all over the country. I miss acting, but nothing good has come along. I wouldn't want to give up stand-up comedy, though, because it's a great thing to have. It also keeps me on "The Tonight Show," but I'd like to cut down on it (stand-up comedy) and do a little more acting.

Collegian: Are you choosy about which parts you audition for?

Landesberg: Yeah, I'm choosy, but I miss it (acting).

Collegian: Do you enjoy doing "The Tonight Show"?

Landesberg: Carson's great! It's like being in the World Series — there's electricity out there.

Collegian: How did your career get started?

Landesberg: I really started as a stand-up comic. I just started doing a couple minutes of my act in different places in New York, then I went uptown to the Improvisation and that's where I worked for about four years. It was me and David Brenner and Jimmy Walker and Bette Midler. It was a good place to work, until I was ready to audition for "The Tonight Show."

Collegian: Were you influenced a lot by other comedians?

Landesberg: Well, Jonathan Winters more than anybody else. He does a lot of characters. That's more or less what I do, too.

Collegian: How did you like doing "Barney Miller"?

Landesberg: It was fun. It was the best job I ever had, but eventually it was time to go. It just ran out of gas.

Collegian: Who did you especially like working with on "Barney Miller"?

Landesberg: If I had to pick who I'd like to do a scene with, it'd be Ron Carey. He played the role of Levitt on the show. We had a lot of laughs, even though we didn't get to do that much together scenewise. It depends a lot on the material; even more so than the people. You're as good as the writers make you.

Collegian: What was the toughest job you've ever had?

Landesberg: The toughest job? That's hard to say. The most boring job I ever had would have been when I worked in the post office.

Collegian: Why was that boring?

Collegian: If you had a couple of months' vacation time coming, where would you go?

Landesberg: Well, right now I have been on vacation so I can answer you that question. I had a month off and I didn't go anywhere. I fly all the time and I didn't want to go anywhere, because to go somewhere, I'd have to get on a plane. I do like northern California in the summer, though, around San Francisco. When the rest of the country is sweltering, it's very comfortable up there. I'd kind of like to go to Venice or the Orient sometime in the near future, too.

Tickets for the Landesberg performance are on sale now at Oasis Records and Tapes and The Sound Shop, both in Aggieville, and at Middle Earth Records and Tapes in Junction City or by calling 776-0622. Tickets will be $7 in advance or $8 at the door.

All proceeds will go to the FONE Crisis Center, which is a confidential, anonymous and nonjudgmental listening and referral service.

Woman astronaut eases way for others

By The Associated Press

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — Judy Resnik, who next week will become America's second woman to travel in space, said she and the other women astronauts owe a lot to Sally Ride for easing their path into orbit.

A year ago, Ride became the first female to take a trip on a U.S. spaceship.

"We've come a long way in a year," said Resnik, who is scheduled to soar into orbit Monday aboard the shuttle Discovery with five male companions — one of them Ride's husband, Steve Hawley.

In October, Ride will share the shuttle cabin with five men and another woman, Kathryn Sullivan.

"I think Sally did an outstanding job of fielding a difficult situation," Resnik, who is also the first Jewish astronaut, said in an interview. "A very bright spotlight was on her as the first one to go, and she handled it very well."

When Resnik and Discovery's other crew members held a news conference last month, it was evident that the focus on women flying in space had changed.

Last year, at a news conference before Ride's flight, most of the questions were addressed to her.

One reporter even asked if she wept when things went wrong in the shuttle simulator.

This time the questions were spread around, and Resnik was not asked once how she will get along in orbit with five men. She was asked more about her duties during the weeklong mission and her background as an electrical and biomedical engineer.

Resnik has several assignments on the mission, but her principal job will be to test the solar sail, a 105-foot panel squeezed into a 4-inch-high package for launch. She will remotely unfurl and retract it several times. The device one day may pull energy from the sun to power permanent space stations.

The 35-year-old Akron, Ohio, native, who said she was always "good in math," graduated with a degree in electrical engineering from Carnegie-Mellon University in Pittsburgh in 1970.

She went to work designing radar circuitry for RCA, while pursuing a doctorate at the University of Maryland.

After switching to the biomedical applications of her field she became a staff fellow at the National Institutes of Health in Bethesda, Md., where she did research on the retina of the eye.

Frozen embryo issue brings new life debate

Now we are not only debating about whether a fetus is a human being or not; we must determine whether two frozen embryos have the right to live, and to what length their rights extend.

In Australia, two embryos were frozen so they could be implanted in the womb of their mother at a later date. She and her husband died before the implantation took place.

This new kink in the "when does life begin?" syndrome creates more than just a legal commotion. It could seriously ruffle the feathers of those both for and against in vitro fertilization, as well as those debating the abortion issue. After all, if one believes it is wrong to abort an unborn fetus on the grounds that it is human, one must surely believe these embryos should be implanted into a surrogate mother.

Or it is possible others believe it is wrong to inhibit the natural process of human fertilization by taking the sperm and egg and placing them in laboratory conditions to conceive an embryo? People must have questions about the ethics of freezing human embryos.

Whatever solution the Australian government finds, it will not adequately satisfy everyone's moral convictions.

The world is facing a period of self-evaluation and life-evaluation. Situations such as this one force us to formulate some new-era moral fiber to apply to our scientific, social and cultural advances.

It is hoped the Australian government will realize the magnitude of its ultimate decision and formulate a response in a thoughtful and sensitive manner. The last thing society needs is a hasty answer which fails to consider all implications of the situation. This would provide no insight into the issue, but would instead pique the already embattled forces on both sides of the issue.

Radio host slain in front of home

DENVER — Homicide investigators on Tuesday reviewed hate mail and on-the-air threats against radio personality Alan Berg, the acid-tongued talk-show host ambushed in his lighted driveway.

Berg, 50, who reported several death threats during his decade-long tenure on the city's airwaves, was shot several times with a .45-caliber weapon as he stepped from his car about 10 p.m. Monday.

Ironically, gun control was to have been the theme of his 9 a.m. KOA radio show Tuesday. The program instead was dedicated to Berg's memory. "Life goes on," said Ken Hamblin, who was the show's host, as callers reminisced about Berg.

Berg, a talk show host at KOA since 1981, was featured in a "60 Minutes" segment in February because of his on-air antics. He would hang up on some callers and once described himself as "the man you love to hate."

Jackson fans wait for newspaper

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Scores of Michael Jackson fans waited in the early morning darkness Tuesday to grab copies of The Kansas City Times containing coupons for ordering tickets to the Jacksons' Victory Tour concert appearance here next month.

The Times published an extra 20,000 copies to meet the demand. By 2 a.m., more than 700 copies had been sold to people standing outside distributors' buildings.

"I guess you feel like if you get down here early, you have a better chance," said Steve Johnson, 25. He ripped out the coupon, and handed the rest of the paper back to the vendor. "I got what I wanted," he said.

Promoters of the three concerts, which will be July 6-8, say that being early won't necessarily pay off. Applications for the $30 tickets, which will be sold only in lots of four, will be filled by random drawing.

Court lifts stay of execution

ATLANTA — A federal appeals court Tuesday lifted a stay of execution for Florida killer Carl Shriver, and authorities said his execution had been rescheduled for 7 a.m. today.

Richard Dugger, superintendent at Florida State Prison at Starke, Fla., said the execution was reset for 7 a.m. — five hours before a death warrant was due to expire.

A three-judge panel of the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals lifted the stay it had issued Monday following a review of a transcript from a lower court hearing on Shriver's appeal. The panel heard oral arguments on the appeal earlier Tuesday.

Shriver was sentenced to death for the Oct. 23, 1976, slaying of Judith Ann Carter, a Gainesville, Fla., convenience store clerk.

Weather

Partly cloudy today with a 40 percent chance for thunderstorms. High from 85 to 90 and south wind at 10 to 20 mph. Partly cloudy tonight with the low around 70. Partly cloudy Thursday with the high in the upper 80s to low 90s.

Putnam Hall closing warranted by economics

Losing a home you have been in for two or three years can be devastating. Yet, that is exactly what is happening to Putnam and Van Zile hall residents.

K-State's Housing Council voted to "conditionally" close Putnam Hall and hold off on renovating Van Zile Hall next year. Emotionally, these are sad decisions. Economically, these decisions make a lot of sense.

Questions have been raised as to why the housing department wants to put Putnam and Van Zile Hall residents out of their homes.

Answers to these questions do not come easy. However, what the council is doing is trying to keep student cost down. Proof toward this statement comes from the fact that an Oklahoma State University report showed that cost-wise K-State is the third lowest University in resident hall contract fees.

The council has decided that by keeping the cost down, it may be able to attract more residents. However, this does not seem to be the case. Instead fewer students are contracting for rooms and the housing department is left searching for ideas as to what to do next.

The council is open to suggestions and to other alternatives. However, at this moment, the best thing to do seems to be to close Putnam with the option of it opening back up if demand for rooms is warranted.

Women of Putnam have expressed their concern for the closing of the hall. Their concern is primarily from an emotional standpoint, not an economical one.

If consolidating the residents on campus is the answer to keeping

LAURIE RANDALL

cost down, then why argue? I fully understand being attached to a place you have lived in for years. And I know that some workers may have to relocate, or even be dismissed. But isn't it better to cut cost, than pay out the ears for half a room?

Furthermore, the council did not vote to close the hall unconditionally. If demand should warrant the reopening of the hall and it is beneficial to the system as a whole, then the council would be pleased to open the hall in the fall.

One might ask, what kind of a demand? Well, one that would show that it was economically feasible to house students in Putnam. As it is, the number of students scheduled to return to Putnam now does not warrant keeping the hall open.

With the University coming up with fees for this and fees for that, it is refreshing to know that at least one department is able to keep costs down.

Often when a person is placed in a situation where things seem impossible, there is a way out.

The challenge here is to the residents of Putnam Hall. For those women who want to live in Putnam, why not start up a slogan or get on the bandwagon and start recruiting people to live in the hall? University officials want to work with students toward the possibility of keeping the hall open.

There must be a reason why fewer students have contracted for a room next year. Why not find out why? It is a lot more difficult (personally) for college officials to try and recruit students to live on-campus, then it is for a student to reach out, ask some questions and make others think about it.

Granted, there are students who despise residence hall living. To these students, I excuse myself. But, to those students who really haven't tried residence hall life, then the only way for each to learn about it is for those who have lived in a hall to offer the information needed. I'm just suggesting that there may be a way to get students in these halls and keep costs from going up.

I have always heard that if you want something bad enough you will find a way to get it. How badly do you want to live in Putnam?

Ignorance of news events stems from apathy

I remember last spring semester reading the front page of the Collegian to discover that the Faculty Senate Committee had recommended that Ben Mahaffey associate professor of forestry, not be dismissed from the University, as advised by several university administrators.

I remarked to a friend that they had finally made a decision about Mahaffey.

He turned to me and said, "Oh yeah, isn't he that organized-crime leader in Kansas City?"

I was flabbergasted. For more than a semester, the Mahaffey epic had been chronicled on the front page of the Collegian and had been covered by the local and state media. Not only that, but Mahaffey was a precedent setter; never before had a tenured K-State professor been recommended for dismissal. The outcome of the appeal hearing was extremely important to the University and other tenured professors. I could understand if someone didn't know all the details of the case, but to confuse Mahaffey with a crime leader in Kansas City was remarkable.

While many did know and follow the Mahaffey hearing and didn't confuse him with celebrity criminals in large metropolitan areas, this case is just one example of the lack of information and apathy on the part of many K-State students.

Reading an entire newspaper does consume a large amount of time, and many students, if they do have extra time, do not choose to spend it getting their hands smudged from newsprint.

However, the Collegian is not a mammoth production, no matter

KAREN BELLUS
Collegian Columnist

how important to the University community, and to not even read the front page of the paper reflects an attitude of apathy on the part of some students.

University communities have long had the reputation of instigators of public awareness. One only has to look back to the 1960s when sit-ins and protests were almost everyday occurrences to realize that. Currently, this is evidenced in countries with civil unrest in which the universities are the first communities closed down — not because students are troublemakers, but because they are aware of current situations and because they think.

Too many times we hear the words of our parents, "wait until you get out into the real world." This could be more of a threat than most of us care to admit, especially when some of us have no idea what is going on out in the "real world."

Students have an obligation to be aware of the world around them, not only because they are students, but because they are thinkers and learners and will be the future policy makers.

Jacksons deserve no crowd

Editor,

Comment: In the wake of the announcement of the possibility of Jackson's concert in Arrowhead Stadium (in Kansas City, Mo.), I feel the need to write this letter. I am happy for the Jackson fans in this area for their opportunity to see their favorite; however, they will not get any money out of me.

Dear Michael,

Asking $30 for a ticket to a concert is preposterous. I realize the place holds only 60,000 people and that comes out to only $1.8 million on ticket sales alone. How about pay toilets to up that figure even more?

Then again, you probably need that money to buy the other glove before winter sets in.

I wish you superstars would deflate your egos enough so that all your fans could see you, not just your rich ones. After all, most of your most avid fans are in high school and college and these are not high-paying jobs. How do you expect them to pay these prices? But then again, what do you care? Once you hit stardom it is "make as much money as fast as you can." Mommy and Daddy will pay the tickets because it is what Junior (or Junorette) wants.

Mr. Jackson, put on a good show for your fans. They deserve it. You deserve to have no one show up.

Folk festivities mark museum opening

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Three days of music, crafts and ethnic festivities leading to a formal dedication ceremony will mark the grand opening this weekend of the new $8 million Kansas Museum of History.

Only the selected best of about 77,000 artifacts, accumulated during more than a century of collecting, will be on display as state historians put out the "welcome mat" to the public for the first time at the spacious new museum.

Joseph Snell, executive director of the Kansas State Historical Society, said he thinks it will be a great weekend and he'll be "tickled to death if the weather holds."

"We're excited about the weekend," Snell said during a tour of the 90,000-square-foot building, which is characterized by its cottonwood limestone facade and location on an 81-acre tract adjacent to a branch of the Oregon Trail near Smith's Crossing on the Kansas River.

"This building is great. It's just what we needed — room for exhibits, outdoor activities and nature trails and storage space."

The main entrance of the museum is graced by Italian artist Lumen Martin Winter's marble sculpture "The Great White Buffalo," located in a reflecting pool at the front square.

Early in the week, the sculpture was still encased in a protective box and the pool remained empty. But Snell said it would be ready when the festival begins Friday evening.

Snell said he expected museum employees would work "right up to the last minute" preparing exhibits for the dedication ceremonies.

One gallery to open this weekend holds "Samples of Our Heritage" — a display Snell said "is a selection of the best from our personal state collection."

The items to be displayed include an infamous Winchester 1873 lever-action rifle owned by Henry Brown, an outlaw who masqueraded as a marshal in Caldwell just more than a century ago.

Brown was given the rifle by townspeople grateful to him for his diligent law enforcement in 1883. However, he died in the hands of a posse a year later after he used the weapon to kill a bank president and cashier during a hold-up in Medicine Lodge.

Also on display will be a pair of boots owned by Gen. George Custer. Custer was stationed at Fort Riley, near Junction City, prior to his death at Little Big Horn and his wife donated the boots to the state.

"We wanted to put out the best from our collection," Snell said.

"We have banners from Abraham Lincoln's presidential campaign; the doors from the statehouse that were smashed in the 'war' between the Populists and the Republicans; and of course the train."

The train is the Cyrus K. Holliday steam engine built by the Baldwin Locomotive Works in 1880. The locomotive, coal tender and two passenger cars dominate the 20,000-square-foot main gallery.

In fact, the "Cyrus K." and its cars are the only exhibit in the main gallery, which eventually will tell the history of Kansas in a permanent display. The historic locomotive will be used to illustrate the importance of railroads in the development of the state.

Snell said the main gallery will be open to allow viewing of the train, but the entire exhibit will not be completed for about three years.

Another item yet to be completed is the road leading to the museum. Wet weather prevented work from starting on the access street and visitors must travel a winding gravel road until the new paved lane is built this summer.

Besides the two main galleries, Snell said the museum lobby will serve as an exhibit area, as will an area in the building's educational section.

"We also plan to develop outdoor activities and nature trails to expand that even more," Snell said.

The festivities start with a barbecue and a country-western and bluegrass music festival Friday night.

Some of the outdoor activities include the wheat thrashing display planned for Saturday, along with stage shows, ethnic dancing and cooking and musical entertainment beginning at 8:30 a.m. and lasting until 5 p.m.

The museum galleries, gift shop and audio-visual theater all will be open.

The displays of ethnic food and dance, along with agricultural and folk displays, will lead up to official dedication ceremonies scheduled for 1 p.m. Sunday. A band concert will precede the ceremony and speech by Gerald George, director of the American Association for State and Local History.

A public reception from 3 p.m. to 5 p.m. will follow.

The grand opening will be highlighted by guest speakers including Lt. Gov. Tom Docking and Gordon Jump, a native Topekan who achieved fame as an actor in shows such as WKRP in Cincinnati. Jump will speak at a banquet Saturday night.

The museum is located in Topeka's western outskirts on Interstate 70 near its junction with I-470 and the Wanamaker Road exit.

Storm-damaged areas eligible for federal aid

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Residents of Effingham and other towns in nine northeast Kansas counties which suffered property damage and losses from a series of tornadoes which struck on April 26 have been declared eligible for federal disaster assistance from the Farmers Home Administration.

FHA officials announced Tuesday the residents of Atchison, Doniphan and Jackson counties are eligible for assistance, in the form of low-interest loans to storm victims to aid in rebuilding damaged farm homes and buildings.

The decision was announced in a joint news release from U.S. Sens. Nancy Landon Kassebaum and Bob Dole, both R-Kan.

In addition, six counties contiguous to the disaster relief zone are eligible for emergency assistance under recently passed farm legislation. Those counties are Brown, Leavenworth, Jefferson, Nemaha, Pottawatomie and Shawnee.

Iranian captives reveal disillusionment, anger

By The Associated Press

RAMADI PRISONER CAMP, Iraq — Fifteen-year-old Iranian Hamid Rezaei said Revolutionary Guards took him out of school, trained him for eight days and sent him to fight the Iraqis.

He said he was captured and imprisoned two years ago in this dusty corner of a military base 65 miles northwest of Baghdad.

Fellow prisoner Hassan Karipur, captured at age 12, said he had been "happy to fight for the national honor of Iran." But after two years as a prisoner, he said he now feels Iraqis were "stupid to fight and die for nothing."

Hundreds of Iraqis are held at this camp, where the authorities take journalists to show how they treat Iranian captives. Officials said the prisoners range in age from 12 to 75 and that many were captured early in the Iran-Iraq war — now nearly four years old.

Journalists taken on a weekend trip to the camp were presented with some captives and were free to talk to others. Under the watchful eyes of their Iraqi guards, few wished to talk.

Hassan, the 14-year-old who has been interned for two years, said of Iranian leader Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini: "He does not have the amount of honor that could fit into the end of a needle. Otherwise, he would not have led Iran into the darkness it is enduring now."

Many of the youngest prisoners only asked to have their pictures taken. Older ones walked around the camp's barbed-wire perimeter.

Some seemed to be looking angrily at the Western journalists. Others only stared into the distance.

Of those who would talk, most said they were torn between a desire to go home and a fear that life would be little better there.

The prisoners cook their own food and are responsible for their personal needs. They have two long exercise fields, a soccer field and table tennis for recreation.

Inside the compound the Iraqis have provided a small medical clinic and a dentist's office. There is a library containing books in English, German, French, Arabic and Farsi.

The Iraqi Foreign Ministry announced last week it was planning to sponsor "a special school for children Iranian prisoners between 14 and 16 years."

The prisoners have a camp representative who is their liaison with the Iraqis. He said the Iraqis are treating them well.

"We treat them according to the Geneva Convention as prisoners of war, and there is no problem between us and them," said camp commander Maj. Hamid Ahmed. This was quickly echoed by the Iranian representative as Iraqi guards hovered nearby.

As the visiting journalists left, the chanting played over the camp's loudspeaker from the Koran, Islam's holy book, switched to Western pop music. One of the songs, from the movie "Saturday Night Fever," was "Staying Alive."

Report recommends further arrests

By The Associated Press

ROME — Bulgaria, possibly with Soviet support, masterminded the 1981 plot to murder Pope John Paul II in an apparent attempt to eliminate papal support for the union Solidarity in the pontiff's native Poland, an Italian prosecutor said Tuesday.

"That's the conclusion of my investigation," the prosecutor, Antonio Albano, told The Associated Press in an interview.

Albano confirmed that his report on the pope's shooting said, "There was a specific interest in killing the pontiff — the social convulsions in Poland." The now-outlawed Solidarity labor union took encouragement from the pope's statements.

Albano said he submitted the 78-page report on his inquiry to Judge Ilario Martella, who heads the state investigation into the May 13, 1981, shooting of the pope by Turkish terrorist Mehmet Ali Agca in St. Peter's Square.

The report recommends that three Bulgarians and four other Turks be tried in connection with the attack on the pope, Albano said. But he gave no details on how the seven allegedly were involved in the shooting.

The emotional atmosphere in Poland during John Paul's 1979 visit to his overwhelmingly Roman Catholic homeland was regarded as encouraging to the labor activists who created Solidarity the following year. He later made statements supporting the union.

Bulgaria has denied any involvement in the shooting of the pope, and has charged the allegations were part of a Western plot to discredit the Communist nation. Albano's report was criticized Tuesday by the official Soviet news agency Tass.

"The reactionary forces are now feverishly pressing ahead for the opening of a trial of the Bulgarian citizen..." Tass said, adding that Albano's report "recognizes as trustworthy the evidence given by (Agca)... But at the same time totally disregards the numerous distortions of the facts and controversial statements made by the criminal."

Agca, who is serving a life term in prison for shooting the pope, told reporters last year that the Bulgarians and the Soviet KGB were behind the attack.

Albano also strongly suggested the Soviet Union might have been behind the plot to kill the pope, although he confirmed that his report does not specifically mention any Soviet connection.

"Do you think Bulgaria could do this sort of thing without Moscow's agreement?" Albano said. "Do you think Bulgaria's decision to boycott the Olympic Games was made by Bulgaria alone? I don't think so... But of course this is my personal opinion."

The 47-year-old prosecutor also dismissed as "a strange argument" a contention by critics that Agca had been pressured to implicate Bulgarians in the attack on the pope.

Albano said much of the information on which his report was based came from Agca. But he stressed that Agca's tips were only "starting points" for the state inquiry.

"Agca told a lot of lies, but he also told a lot of truths," Albano said.

The prosecutor said his report was covered by judicial secrecy and that copies have been given only to the investigating judge and defense lawyers.

"We do creative writing and creative dramatics," Kvasnicka said. "Creative dramatics are activities which focus on expressing and interpreting various action, emotions and feelings. Creative dramatics are also used to develop group interaction and cooperation through group-developed pantomime."

"A lot of the things that we are doing simply teaches the children to share, because the younger ones are really shy," Kvasnicka said.

None of the children are graded. There is no competition for letter grades; these classes are simply for enrichment, Ball said.

Scientist explains tick habits

By JIM ORTH
Collegian Reporter

Ticks — those pesky little blood-sucking parasitic arachnids — can be such a nuisance this time of the year. If you're like most people, your knowledge of ticks is limited to what you see on the family dog.

Judy Bertholf, extension entomologist, says that ticks go through a cycle growth of three stages after being hatched: the six-legged larva, the eight-legged nymph and the adult. The adult ticks will then mate on a host animal.

After mating, the female will drop to the ground and lay a large number of eggs. When these eggs develop into the larva stage, the larvae climb up to vegetation and wait for rodents or other animals to pass within reach, Bertholf said.

After attaching itself to the animal's body, the larva pierces the skin of the host animal and feeds on its blood. When finished feeding, the larva will fall to the ground, shed its skin and emerge as a nymph. The nymph will again climb on the vegetation and wait for another host.

When a host is found, it will feed, then once more fall to the ground, molt and become an adult. This cycle will then be repeated, Bertholf said.

"The mouth parts of a tick allow it to shear the skin (of the host), which is made easier by its saliva which helps dissolve the tissue," she said. "This saliva carries the organisms that cause diseases associated with ticks."

Prompt removal of ticks is very important because infected saliva is injected several hours after the initial attachment, Bertholf said.

The three most common species of ticks found in Kansas are the American dog tick, brown dog tick and Lone Star tick. The latter is primarily found in southeast Kansas.

"Both the American and Lone Star tick carry Rocky Mountain Spotted Fever, probably the most common known (disease carried by ticks) in North America," Bertholf said.

If an individual notices a tick problem, such as a reoccurrence of ticks on their animals or in their yard, he should preserve a tick specimen in a small bottle of alcohol and bring it to the county extension office for proper identification.

"Ticks take about an hour before they bite and become attached," Bertholf said. "The attaching process also is slow and most ticks can be found before they become attached firmly. They can then be removed with a gentle, continuous tug. It is helpful if you grip the head of the tick next to your skin with tweezers."

More firmly attached ticks require a lot of patience to remove and possible medical attention, Bertholf added.

Daily hand picking of ticks from your dog or pet is a must if the animal frequently visits tick-infested areas. Favorite tick attachment sites on dogs are the face, below the eyes, in and around the ears, and the back and shoulders. Tick repellent and collars seldom do a complete job, so grooming is important, according to an Extension Service Kansas insect newsletter.

The newsletter suggests that in order to help prevent ticks from being a problem, keep grass and weedy areas cut short throughout the year. This helps discourage tick infestation and provides less opportunity for ticks to transfer to hosts.

People should also avoid unnecessary trips into tall grass and weeds, brushy and forested areas. But if it is necessary to wander in tall grasses, keep on the move and seek open areas or trails in preference to dense growths, the newsletter stated.

Sitting on bare ground in the sunlight, rather than on grass, is recommended. For the best protection against ticks, a tick repellent is recommended for spraying on outer clothing and unprotected skin when in possibly infested areas.

A Kansas Board of Education ruling to increase minimum graduation requirements to 20 credits will not affect Manhattan High School students.

Graduation credit requirements at the high school are currently 21 hours.

"A student must be here at school six hours a day," principal James L. Rezac said.

"I can't see any impact because we're already at 21," James Benjamin, superintendent of schools, said.

Manhattan High School graduation requirements were raised to 21 credits in response to national reports on the state of the educational system.

"When I get calls from universities asking for increased high school requirements, I tell them to increase college requirements," Benjamin said.

According to Benjamin, the average high school student spends approximately 37,000 hours in the classroom while a college student spends about 2,000 hours.

"We're only giving about one class unit leeway. Failed classes can mean more than four years," Benjamin said.

The major impact came this year when the high school increased its science requirement to two credits. This resulted in a need for more laboratory space, supplies and teachers, Benjamin said.

The high school now requires that the students complete four credits in English, three in social studies, two of math, two of science and two of physical education. The remaining eight hours are electives.

"All the programs are related to 21 credits. The only difference is in how the student earns them," Rezac said.

The school has three special learning programs: the educable mentally handicapped (EMH), learning disabled (LD) and the continuation school.

The EMH program puts students into the mainstream of Manhattan High School as much as possible.

"Their teacher plans their program and can bring them back (to their classroom) for special assistance," Rezac said.

The LD program, is for "average or near-average students who are about two years behind," Rezac said. These students are placed in the regular classroom but spend 1-3 hours per day with an LD teacher.

Rezac said that individualized instruction in smaller classes is characteristic of the continuation school program. This program is traditional but taught by teachers "adept at working with kids with personal problems," Rezac said.

Some students earn part of their 21 credits outside the school in their senior year.

Students have their choice of vocational electives and can attend classes at Manhattan Area Vocational-Technical School.

There are no future plans for increasing graduation requirements at Manhattan High School.

"We'd be facing the possibility that students wouldn't complete the program in four years," Benjamin said.

Up and over

Ron Gifford, of the Gwordheads, prepares to jump over teammate Bill Wagoner to retrieve a dropped ball during a co-recreational intramural softball game at the L.P. Washburn Recreational Area Tuesday evening. The Gwordheads won the game over Biology, 16-14.

Olajuwon to join Sampson at Houston

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — The Houston Rockets have their "Dream," and so does Nigerian Akeem Olajuwon.

Olajuwon, nicknamed "the Dream" during his outstanding career at the University of Houston, said being picked first by the Houston Rockets in the opening round of the National Basketball Association draft Tuesday "feels like a dream. I just want to be the best I can be, to play hard every time out."

The 7-foot Olajuwon left the soccer fields of Nigeria three years ago and took the Cougars to the NCAA Final Four three times. He is the fourth underclassman in the last six years to be selected No. 1.

Two Kentucky players who decided not to try out for the Olympics and eight American Olympic finalists shared the spotlight at the NBA draft.

After Olajuwon, Sam Bowie of Kentucky was taken by the Portland Trail Blazers with the second pick, and his "Twin Tower" teammate with the Wildcats, Melvin Turpin, was the sixth selection, taken by the Washington Bullets.

The rights to sign Turpin later were traded to Cleveland in a blockbuster three-team deal.

Bowie and Turpin were conspicuous by their decision not to try out for the U.S. team. All eight Olympic basketball team finalists who were eligible for the draft were taken in the first 18 picks.

The run of Olympic finalists started when the Chicago Bulls, picking third, took 1983-84 college Player of the Year Michael Jordan of North Carolina, and Dallas selected Tar Heel Sam Perkins as No. 4.

Other first-round selections who are among the final 16 at the Olympic Training Camp at Bloomington, Ind., were Alvin Robertson of Arkansas, No. 7 by San Antonio; Lancaster Gordon of Louisville, No. 8 by the Los Angeles Clippers; Leon Wood of Fullerton State, No. 10 by Philadelphia; Tim McCormick of Michigan, No. 12 by Cleveland; Jeff Turner of Vanderbilt, No. 17 by New Jersey, and Vern Fleming of Georgia, No. 18 by Indiana.

In the same deal that sent Turpin's draft rights to Cleveland, McCormick's rights were traded to Seattle, which also acquired veteran Ricky Sober from Washington. The Bullets acquired veterans Gus Williams from Seattle and Cliff Robinson from Cleveland.

Two other players who made the final 20 at the Olympic tryouts, but later were cut, also were taken in the first round. Charles Barkley of Auburn was the No. 5 pick by Philadelphia and John Stockton of Gonzaga was taken 16th by Utah.

Marty Blake, the NBA's director of scouting, said he was not surprised by the potential Olympians drafted early.

"They were outstanding players in the first place," Blake said. "It's a credit to their ability that they were picked so high, but it proves also that the judgment of (Olympic Coach) Bobby Knight coincides with the judgment of the top brains of basketball."

Kansas City defeats Oakland

By The Associated Press

OAKLAND — Jorge Orta drove in four runs, two on a fourth-inning home run that put the game out of reach, as the Kansas City Royals defeated the Oakland A's 6-2 Tuesday night to snap a five-game losing streak.

Right-hander Bud Black, 7-5, got the victory with relief help from Dan Quisenberry, who pitched the final 2½ innings to notch his league-leading 17th save.

Oakland starter Chris Codiroli, 4-3, lasted only two innings and took the loss.

The Royals broke loose from a recent failure to put runs on the board, jumping out to a 5-1 lead after four innings. Orta held the hot bat for Kansas City, going 3 for 5, including his fifth home run of the season in the fourth which upped the Royal margin.

Pat Sheridan, who went 3 for 5, also hit a homer, his fifth of the year, and scored three runs to help the Royals' cause. George Brett, after sitting out in Kansas City's loss to the A's Monday night, went 2 for 4, scoring two of the Royals runs.

The Royals rapped out a total of 16 hits against Oakland pitching, with Codiroli giving up eight hits and three runs in six innings to take the loss.

The A's and Royals will play the final game of their series tonight, with Mark Gubicza, 3-6, taking the mound for Kansas City facing Earl Krueger, 4-2.

Junior golf instruction provides fundamentals

By KEM ARST
Collegian Reporter

Learning the basic fundamentals at an early age, consistent practice and adult supervision are keys to excelling in any sport and these elements are the backbone of the junior golf program at Manhattan Country Club, according to golf pro Steve Graves.

Junior golf is a continuing program at Manhattan Country Club and the majority of the players return to the program each summer.

"Junior golf is a summer-long program combining clinics, group play and tournaments for kids under the age of 17 who are interested in learning the game correctly," Graves said.

The first two weeks of the program are mandatory, supervised practice sessions in which the youngsters continually practice fundamentals such as swing, stance, grip and posture. This forced repetition allows the youngster to develop the basic fundamentals needed for the rest of his golfing years, Graves said.

Phil Dodderidge, 14, is a junior golf faithful who has played for seven years.

"I started when I was 8 years old. We had clinics every day and I've played every summer since," Dodderidge said. "I plan to play golf in high school and college, and junior golf has been a main influence on my game. You see improvement each year and it also teaches you to control your temper on the course and respect the other players."

The age brackets for boys' junior golf are 12 and under, 13 to 15, and 16 to 17. Girls' brackets include 14 and under, 14 to 15, and 16 to 17. Enrollment usually starts at around 70 golfers and drops to 40 to 50 that stay with the program all summer, Graves said.

Every Thursday morning players participate in various drills on the course and also use the time to qualify for four of the invitational tournaments scheduled for this summer at Salina Elks, Salina Country Club, Abilene Country Club and Manhattan Country Club. Fourteen players go to each tournament.

"The main reward of junior golf is to qualify for these tournaments," Graves said. "It is very satisfying to see a youngster grow and develop with the game of golf. It is a self-rewarding sport but it can be very frustrating if they don't learn the game properly."

"As a pro, it is very satisfying to see youngsters that lost in tournaments before, come back the next year and because of their increased physical strength, beat out other players," he said. "It's so rewarding to spend an hour or so a day hearing the kids laugh about how well they played and how much fun they had with each other and knowing that I had a part in teaching them the basics that allowed them to execute those good shots on the course."

Graves said junior golf also involves the youths' parents. Among parental programs is one which involves the parents walking through the course with their children to develop etiquette and help them with problems.

"Our parents are invaluable to making sure that the kids not only can hit the balls down the driving range but that they get the rewards of learning proper play on the course," he said.

The junior golf year ends with a club championship tournament in which players compete for medals and trophies. There is also a parent-child tournament open to all junior golf participants.

"My main point about junior golf is that in high school and college the major sports are considered to be football, basketball and baseball, but in my estimation the major sports out of college are golf and tennis," Graves said. "These are the sports that are used socially, recreationally and in a lot of business associations so I feel that these two sports are the ones that youngsters need to know a few years down the road."

Graves said golf is a sport that requires dedication but one that can produce side benefits for the junior golfer.

"Golf is a lonely sport. I can remember spending endless hours as a kid out on the course by myself hitting ball after ball," he said. "The type of youngster that will excel in golf has got to be willing to spend some time by himself, working at the basics. Junior golf builds confidence and ability that will produce a good golfer down the road."

Banks face crackdown on loan profit reports

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Federal regulators are insisting American banks be more candid about their shaky international loans, and some analysts said Tuesday that could affect negotiations over the repayment of billions of dollars in debts by developing nations.

Other analysts, however, predict the crackdown on how banks report their profits would have little impact on the negotiations.

The total Third World debt was $810 billion at the first of the year and rising, including $77 billion owed to American banks. Many debtor nations are behind in their loan payments and are trying to work out new, stretched out repayment schedules.

In letters to the chief executives of the nation's big banks, the Federal Reserve and the comptroller of the currency stressed that the banks must reduce their profit when interest payments are more than 90 days overdue.

Some banks had been bending the reporting rule, trying to avoid big drops in earnings because of their portfolios of problem loans, particularly to Latin American borrowers.

As long as a loan is current, banks are allowed to count interest due as income, even before it is received, as long as there is a strong likelihood payment will be made.

Allen Sinai, chief economist with the Wall Street firm of Shearson Lehman-American Express Inc., said the move by the comptroller and the Fed cancel one advantage that borrowing countries had in negotiating for better repayment terms: the possibility of debtor nations holding up payments to pressure bankers worried about profits.

But Donald Waite, head of the banking unit of the consulting firm McKinsey & Co. Inc., said he did not think the change would alter "the fundamentals between the banks and the (borrowing) countries as much as people might think."

He said the banks will not walk away from the borrowing countries and may even lend them more, if it will ensure that the banks eventually get paid back.

The letter from the Fed and the comptroller reminded the banks they must declare a loan "non-accruing" if any interest payments are more than 90 days overdue.

British group fights for 'plain English'

By The Associated Press

LONDON — The next time an official writes a letter that says "notwithstanding anything contained herein before to the contrary," he had better watch out for Chrissie Maher.

Maher is co-director of the Plain English Campaign, a pressure group dedicated to stamping out the gobbledygook rampant in British government and big business.

Her latest battle is with the borough of Ealing, west London, which this month bludgeoned 150 of its citizens with the following:

"Take notice that, for the purpose of enabling the Council of the London Borough of Ealing to make Article Four Direction relating to property at the above address and to serve copies of Article Four Direction in accordance with Article Four of the Town and Country Planning General Development Order 1977, the Council pursuant to section 284 of the said Act hereby require you to state in writing to the Council within 21 days after the date on which this notice is served."

And so on through paragraphs (1) and (2), broken down into (a), (b) and (c) and climaxing with a choice between (a) or (b).

In addition, Ealing citizens were threatened with a 1,000-pound ($1,400) fine or two years in jail if they did not complete the form.

The council was trying to find out whether residents owned or rented their homes, but about 50 people — one-third of all recipients — had trouble reading it and complained to the council, which withdrew it.

Maher's group thrives on this sort of "legalistic rubbish," as she puts it. "Writers," she says, "sometimes get so entangled in their own jargon that they need an outsider to pull them free."

The Ealing authorities are unrepentant, says her partner, Martin Crutts. He said the borough's lawyer wrote to him saying he thought the above-quoted section of the form was "quite straightforward."

But the Ealing council says it is trying to write a simpler version.

Maher and Crutts began their war against officialese while working for a citizen's advice bureau. Finding that most of the problems brought to them involved incomprehensible official documents, they set up their Plain English Campaign in 1979.

It did so well that the two have gone professional. They say they have been approached by 150 government and municipal offices as well as businesses to translate their officialese into simple English.

For instance, a car rental company's contract says "in the event of breakdown, the owners will at their own expense collect the vehicle and effect repairs therein."

After Miss Maher's treatment, it becomes "if the vehicle breaks down, the owners will at their own expense collect it and repair it."

Crutts said in an interview that officials often suffered from "a kneejerk reaction to reach for the legalistic phrase." He said "many people think it is beneath their dignity to use a single word where several will do. They never consider who is reading their letters. It could be an old-age pensioner, or someone for whom English is a second language."

Crutts said his group charged about $2,800 to clarify a 30-page government document and arrange it in an easy-to-read format.

Favorite flights of officialese, he said, were "notwithstanding anything contained herein before to the contrary," which means "despite what was said in paragraph 2," and "false or defective in any material particular," meaning "if anything you have put down on this form is not true."

Maher, 46, has a special qualification for her skill. She grew up in poverty and left school illiterate. She learned to read and write at age 17.

FDA OKs heart implant

By The Associated Press

SALT LAKE CITY — The U.S. Food and Drug Administration has approved the second implantation of the Utah artificial heart, an agency official said Tuesday.

Dave Duarte, spokesman for the FDA in Rockville, Md., said he had few immediate details about the agency's approval of guidelines for the implant of the fist-sized air-driven plastic heart.

"All I can tell you is that the second heart implant has been approved by the FDA. I understand the people from Utah have picked up the papers," Duarte said.

Attempts to reach officials at Kolff Medical Inc., the company that markets the Jarvik-7 heart, were not immediately successful. Dr. William C. DeVries, the only surgeon authorized to implant the device, also could not be immediately reached for comment.

There was no word on a possible candidate for the implant, but University of Utah Medical Center officials have said there would be no shortage of those seeking the procedure.

Comedian Steve Landesberg cracks his familiar smile while entertaining about 200 people last night in a benefit performance at Manhattan High School for the FONE Crisis Center. Landesberg is best known for his role of Sgt. Arthur Dietrich on the TV series "Barney Miller."

Landesburg acts at FONE fund raiser

Giggles and cackles frequented the air as Steve Landesberg performed in the Manhattan High School Auditorium last night to benefit the FONE Walk-In Crisis Center.

Landesberg, best known for his role as Sgt. Arthur Dietrich, on the television comedy series "Barney Miller" entertained approximately 200 people with his comedy interpretations and ethnic mimics.

"How did you all leave your homes to come out? I mean with the Little Junior Miss Pageant on television? You know I just love those girls, they all want the very best of everything for everyone and every creature. Well, they are just great human beings, just like politicians," Landesberg said.

Yield predictions drop due to PIK, weather

By TIM CARPENTER
Collegian Reporter

The custom cutters are creeping across the southern border of Kansas. Soon their combines will be rolling north through the state as they harvest the 1984 winter wheat.

Moe Johnson, of the Kansas Crop and Livestock Reporting Service, expects the state to produce nearly 400 million bushels of winter wheat. A statewide average of 36 bushels an acre is expected from the 11.1 million acres of winter wheat still in the ground.

Johnson's estimate represents a potential reduction of 11 percent from last year's state yield. He attributes the decrease in the winter wheat harvest to an increased participation in the Payment-In-Kind (PIK) program and to crop damage due to poor weather.

George Herron, head of the Garden City Branch Experiment Station, said he believes the Garden City area will end up with a smaller crop than was anticipated earlier this year.

"In the local areas we have had excessive rain. In other areas there hasn't been enough. In other areas, we have had some hail damage, but only a small amount. The hail is a major problem for the few individuals, but as a whole it is only a small area affected," Herron said.

Around Garden City, this year's crop is one of the most variable in recent memory, Herron said.

"We have some areas that are poor and some areas that are good. Some of the poor areas were subjected to dry weather last fall and we experienced slow emergence," he said.

"Overall we suspect the crop will be down somewhat. The western one-third of the state will likely get around 25 bushels an acre," Herron said. "But the figures are deceiving because the land placed in PIK is grazed and plowed up. Farmers naturally take out the worst acreage and this inflates the figures."

Richard Johnson, of the Southeast Kansas Branch Experiment Station near Parsons, believes his region of the state will be left relatively unscathed by the wrath of Mother Nature.

"We are in a kind of isolated area, but we expect to have a pretty fair crop," Richard Johnson said. "I suspect we will have a slight reduction, however, for various reasons."

Richard Johnson offered two reasons for the predicted reduction in winter wheat harvested this year.

"For one, the date of planting. We had some terribly wet areas last fall and as a consequence, many farmers were late getting their crop planted," he said.

"Secondly, we had some excessive moisture this spring during the months of March through May. We had some wet spots in low areas that didn't produce as well. I would say the crop will be down a little bit."

However, rain has not been a problem for farmers in western Kansas.

"There certainly won't be a crop reduction in this area due to excessive rain," said Joe Martin, of the Fort Hays Branch Experiment Station near Hays. "It hasn't rained in this area in a long time. In fact, and this is purely speculation, the crop will be way down because of the way things are drying out."

"The average around here is usually 30 bushels an acre, but I suspect it will go lower. We won't know for sure until the farmers start harvesting in about 10 days," Martin said.

Although the winter wheat farmers in Kansas expect to harvest fewer bushels from their fields this summer, Herron said it has been worse in the past.

"This year's crop is not a bumper crop, but it is also a long ways from failure," Herron said.

House passes first immigration amnesty bill

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A sharply divided House adopted an immigration bill Wednesday that seeks to discourage foreigners from breaching U.S. borders but grants the nation's first mass amnesty, enabling illegal aliens who arrived before 1982 to remain.

To cut off the lure of jobs which draws millions of aliens into the country illegally every year, the bill — approved 216-211 — would make it a crime to hire illegal immigrants if they manage to enter the United States.

The Immigration and Naturalization Service estimated that 2.3 million of an estimated 6 million illegal aliens in the United States would take the opportunity to legalize their status under the amnesty provisions approved by the House.

A proposal by Rep. Bill McCollum, R-Fla., to remove the amnesty provisions was defeated, 233-195.

Opponents of amnesty said foreigners would take jobs away from Americans. Supporters said a failure to approve amnesty would lead to wholesale deportations.

After five years, the aliens could apply for citizenship. The Senate has passed a less generous amnesty plan, which the INS said would allow 1.6 million aliens to remain. The Reagan administration backs that proposal.

In addition to penalizing employers who hire illegal aliens, the House bill would create a huge "guest worker" program to import an estimated 300,000 foreigners to the West Coast to harvest perishable crops. That work is largely done by people of Mexico and Central America who slip across the borders every fall.

House passage sent the measure to a House-Senate conference committee charged with reconciling differences between the two chambers' versions.

The House's 11-member Hispanic bloc fought the bill during seven days of intense debate. The Hispanics in Congress said they feared enactment would lead to discrimination by employers against any job-seeker with a Latino name or accent.

The Chamber of Commerce of the United States also opposed the bill, objecting to the fines against employers who hire illegal aliens and to a requirement that the employers make certain everyone they hire are entitled to work in this country. Employers of four or fewer people are exempt from the bill.

The AFL-CIO initially supported the bill but turned into an opponent following adoption of the "guest worker" provision. The AFL-CIO said wages would be depressed.

Republican conservatives, in disagreement with President Reagan, led the battle against giving foreigners who live in the United States illegally a chance to become legal residents, entitled to work but not to collect welfare.

McCollum, whose state is trying to cope with a massive refugee influx, said granting amnesty to those who sneaked across the borders would be "a great slap in the face" of "millions who stood in line" to become naturalized citizens.

He said amnesty would induce millions more to enter the country illegally in the hope that they, too, would win legalization from some future Congress.

The House bill would offer legalization to aliens in the United States since 1982. The date in the Senate-passed bill is 1980. The Senate rejected the "guest worker" concept and adopted harsher penalties — including prison terms — for those who hire undocumented workers.

In the debate over amnesty, some members said the issue was whether America is a harsh or humane society. Others said the question was whether Congress wanted illegal aliens to take jobs from American citizens.

"Yes, we have to consider the undocumented workers," said Rep. Kent Hance, D-Texas, "but we have to consider the citizens of this country that are losing their jobs. This is a jobs bill. The entire country is going to be watching. I'm for protecting the jobs of American citizens first."

Amnesty supporters said it would be impossible to penalize employers for hiring illegal aliens without giving the aliens a chance to legalize their status and take jobs.

Democrats adopt draft of 1984 party platform

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A Democratic party panel on Wednesday adopted a 1984 platform draft that supporters of Walter F. Mondale and Sen. Gary Hart hailed as a compromise capable of healing party wounds.

The Rev. Jesse Jackson urged a "summit meeting" between the three rivals to discuss the document.

The 15-member Mondale-dominated platform drafting panel completed its work after Mondale and Hart forces closed ranks on foreign policy and defense issues.

The coming together of the Hart and Mondale forces all but assured that Democrats would be spared the kind of divisive floor fight over the platform that occurred between President Carter and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy at the 1980 Democratic convention.

Broad, general Democratic themes are stated in the platform proposal, which is short on specific recommendations and long on attacks on President Reagan and promises of a better life for all Americans under a Democratic administration.

Meanwhile, Jackson vowed to take some of his pet campaign themes to the floor of the Democratic National Convention after a string of defeats before the panel drafting the party's platform.

On Wednesday, with the two Jackson delegates casting the only affirmative votes, the panel rejected a Jackson proposal to support an "independent state for Palestinians."

Jackson told reporters he planned to take many of his rejected proposals, including the one on defense spending, all the way to the convention floor if necessary.

The drafting committee adopted nearly everything the Hart campaign offered during Wednesday's session, adding page after page of Hart-drafted language.

The platform draft incorporates a number of the "new idea" themes of the Hart campaign, while steering clear of endorsing specific programs or legislation. It calls for new efforts to revitalize the nation's aging heavy industries and endorses the removal of trade barriers to open up new markets abroad for U.S. goods, all central themes to the Hart campaign.

The proposed Democratic platform calls for an end to U.S. support for forces fighting the government in Nicaragua and for an eventual "demilitarized Central America," including the mutual withdrawal of all foreign forces and military advisers from the region.

Also on Wednesday, platform writers agreed to Hart-written language stating that the Democratic Party back a move "toward a policy of reduced reliance on nuclear weapons" while strengthening conventional forces in NATO.

Senate continues pressure on Reagan for arms control

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Senate tentatively approved 65-34 on Wednesday legislation demanding that President Reagan submit for ratification two languishing treaties to curb nuclear tests, and that he propose to Moscow a total ban of such explosions.

The action represented the fourth major step within days by the Senate to press the administration on arms control issues. It also has called for talks aimed at banning space weaponry and sea-launched cruise missiles, and asked for a general summit on nuclear weapons "without preconditions or assurances of success."

The vote Wednesday came on a "sense of the Congress" amendment, sponsored by Sens. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., and Charles McC. Mathias, R-Md., to a $291 billion defense spending bill.

It declares that "at the earliest possible date," the president should submit for ratification the 1974 Threshold Test Ban Treaty, outlawing underground blasts of more than 150 kilotons, and the companion 1976 Peaceful Nuclear Explosions Treaty, establishing the same curb on non-military detonations for mining or other purposes.

And it calls for "the immediate resumption of negotiations toward conclusion of a verifiable comprehensive test ban treaty," prohibiting any nuclear explosions.

The preliminary vote came on the unsuccessful attempt by Sen. John Tower, R-Texas, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, to table — kill — the amendment. "We're being asked to take an enormous risk," he said. "A test ban is useless unless it is accompanied by a verifiable reduction in nuclear arms."

But Sen. Charles Percy, R-Ill., said that Soviet leaders "simply fail to understand how we can allow three completed arms control treaties, signed by Presidents Nixon, Ford and Carter, to languish without any action." He referred to the threshold pact signed by Richard M. Nixon, the peaceful explosions treaty signed by Gerald R. Ford, and the SALT II strategic arms limitation treaty signed by Jimmy Carter.

"It's very difficult to convince the world that we're serious about arms control when we have those three treaties, and we don't ratify them," agreed Sen. Sam Nunn, D-Ga.

The Reagan administration decided in 1982 not to resume comprehensive test ban talks, saying it first wanted to renegotiate the two earlier treaties on ground their verification standards were inadequate.

Acker names dean of education college

David Byrne, dean of the College of Education at New Mexico State University-Las Cruces since 1980, will be the new dean of the K-State College of Education.

President Duane Acker, who made the announcement, said Byrne, 47, will be joining the faculty about Sept. 15.

Byrne is succeeding Jordan B. Utsey, dean for the past eight years, who announced last fall he wished to retire from administrative duties. Utsey will be on leave this coming year.

"We expect Byrne to be an articulate spokesman for education in Kansas and to contribute to improvements in the quality of education being sought by the state's educational and legislative leaders," Acker said. "Byrne will be assuming direction of a program which for the past two years has placed more new teachers in Kansas schools than any other institution."

Byrne is president of the New Mexico Association of Colleges of Teacher Education and a member of the Advisory Council of State Representatives of the American Association of Colleges of Teacher Education (AACTE). He currently is serving on an AACTE national task force on governmental relations.

In recent years Byrne has testified before both state and national legislative bodies on such topics as science and math education, quality of teaching and quality control for teacher certification.

He has directed studies supported by the National Endowment for the Humanities; the Social and Rehabilitation Services of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare; the Institute of Educational Research in Washington D.C.; and the Utah State Office of Public Instruction.

A 1959 graduate of Idaho State University, where he had a minor in English, Byrne taught English and journalism for six years in Idaho and Utah schools. He was a youth director in Salt Lake City for two years, before completing a doctor of philosophy degree at the University of Utah in 1971.

From 1971 until 1979 Byrne was on the University of Utah faculty, where he was promoted to associate dean of the Graduate School of Education before being named head of the Department of Educational Management and Development at New Mexico State University in 1979.

He and his wife, Mary Lou, have two children; a son, K.C., who is a sophomore at New Mexico State University, and a daughter, Kelly, who will be a high school junior.

Reagan effort includes national crime center

By The Associated Press

HARTFORD, Conn. — President Reagan told the nation's sheriffs Wednesday that his administration's "commitment to the war on crime has definitely helped to bring down the crime rate" despite the refusal of the House of Representatives to approve an anti-crime bill he called "our largest and most important initiative."

As he had said he would do, Reagan announced the establishment of a new National Center for the Analysis of Violent Crime, which he said would use modern technology to help local law enforcement agencies combat murderers who stalk and kill their victims one after another.

"This means the latest computerized technology for detective work is moving from the research phase to the operational phase," Reagan said in a speech prepared for the National Sheriffs Association.

White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said the new center would be located at the FBI Academy in Quantico, Va., and would cost $2.5 million in its first 16 months. After that, he said, the FBI would support it with about $1.5 million a year.

Reagan said reported crime dropped 4.3 percent in 1982, the first decline since 1977.

kinda like these college towns. I once asked a guy what he does for excitement in a town like this, beings I grew up in New York. I figured it was a pretty fair question."

"He answered, 'cow tipping.' That's when we go out to pastures and find all these cows standing asleep at night and dump 'em over.' That's when I realized I just love these college towns," Landesberg said.

"I was in Paris once. It was very romantic. Yea, sorta like it is here in Manhattan."

"But you know, it's nice to be out of the city for a little while. I think about being in L.A., especially during the next month while the Olympics are there, mob city."

"People just love to go see all that stuff and feel sorry for the little 10-year-old girl who cries to her mommy. 'I'm sooo sssssrrrry I wiped out, mmmmmmy, my skates just got stuck together — right at the toes.'"

Landesberg said he loves everything about comedy except all the traveling.

"It's like one continuous jet lag," he said.

Landesberg said he began his career as a comedian about 15 years ago, when he used to do it for nothing.

When asked what advice he would give a young comedian today, Landesberg said, he would advise any young comedians to practice doing "funny stuff" on their friends.

"Just do what comes naturally and record it, then play it back, and listen to see if you are funny. Analyze other comedians and see what is boring. That's what I did, I guess I was funny," he said.

Economy stabilizes with slowing growth

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The nation's economy, though slowing a bit from its breakneck expansion, is growing this spring at an unexpectedly strong 5.7 percent annual rate and doing it with very little inflation, the government reported Wednesday.

President Reagan called the report "remarkably good news." And private analysts, though still cautioning that too-strong growth could cause problems later on, agreed it was hard to find fault with the new figures.

The growth figure was the Commerce Department's "flash" estimate for inflation-adjusted gross national product in the still-unfinished April-June quarter. In addition, Commerce reported:

—Real GNP grew at a torrid 9.7 percent pace in the first quarter, matching the strongest quarter in six years, rather than at the 8.8 percent rate estimated earlier.

—A GNP-linked inflation measure is rising in the current quarter at a rate of only 2.8 percent, the slowest in 17 years, after rising at a rate of 3.9 percent in the January-March period.

Reagan, talking briefly with reporters at the White House, said the report showed "we have a solid recovery that is going forward without a renewal of inflation."

Many economists on Wall Street and elsewhere have said such strong growth will eventually choke off the recovery by inspiring heavy expansion borrowing and causing production bottlenecks, driving up interest rates and inflation. And, in fact, soon after the GNP figures were announced, negative reaction was shown in a drop in the stock market.

However, Allen Sinai, chief economist for Shearson Lehman-American Express Inc. in New York, said that in relation to such important concerns as jobs, income, production and the prices people pay, "If you look at the guts of the economy...the report is superb."

He said he still felt "the economy remains too strong for its own good over the long run," with already-high interest rates bound to rise. But he said he expected no signs of significant weakness before the middle of next year.

Treasury Secretary Donald Regan said statistics for the first half of this year "indicated anew that the Reagan economic program has provided tremendous incentives for a solid and durable increase in economic activity."

He said the new report "should also dispel any notion that the economy is overheating," a main worry in financial markets.

Regan said he now expects real GNP, the economy's total output of goods and services, to grow at a rate of about 6 percent from the fourth quarter of last year to the same period this year, up from the administration's official forecast of 5 percent.

Florida electrocutes convict for murder of store clerk

By The Associated Press

STARKE, Fla. — Carl Shriner, a drifter who confessed to killing a convenience store clerk but later maintained his innocence, went to his death in Florida's electric chair Wednesday after reading a statement proclaiming his faith in God.

Shriner, the boyish-looking son of an Ohio window-washer who had been in and out of reform schools and jails since he was 8, offered no struggle as he was led to the electric chair at Florida State Prison near Starke.

He was pronounced dead at 7:12 a.m., 13 hours after his final appeal was denied by the U.S. Supreme Court and five hours before his death warrant would have expired.

Reading from a piece of white paper while strapped in the electric chair, Shriner calmly delivered a brief last statement to 39 witnesses in the death chamber:

"Many of my friends have mentioned to me to look for the light, but I already saw the light when I accepted Christ as Lord many years ago. Only now I get to go stand in it and enjoy it with the Lord. Carl E. Shriner."

A black-hooded executioner, paid $150 by the state, sent the first surge of 2,000 volts of electricity into Shriner's body at 7:07 a.m.

Shriner was the 20th killer executed in the United States since the death penalty was reinstated in 1976 and the sixth to die in Florida, a number double that of any other state.

States offer diversity in aid to students

By JENNIFER HAGGARD
Collegian Reporter

Federal financial aid, campus work study and state programs are used by 60 percent of the K-State student population to pay for a college education.

In other states, which include Big Eight Conference schools, federal and state financial aid is also very popular. But some states offer more to their students.

For instance, Colorado offers the Colorado Student Grant. The grant is available on the basis of need and merit. Based on the number of non-resident students enrolled each semester the grant can also be awarded to some non-resident students.

Iowa also has some special programs for state-resident students only. The State of Iowa Scholarship, a state loan program, plus Iowa State University has a large grant program.

"The state guarantees against default for the state loans," said Larry Dietz, associate director of financial aid at ISU.

The students also have access to a long-term loan similar to the National Direct Student Loan (NDSL) and a short-term loan similar to the emergency loans at K-State, he said.

Oklahoma State University at Stillwater and the University of Oklahoma at Norman help their students out, along with the state legislature, through what is called the State Student Incentive Grant (SSIG) and the Oklahoma Tuition Aid Program.

Other universities across the nation are helping out their students with new programs. The University of Pennsylvania is offering a program that allows students to borrow the full amount of tuition for four years at 10 percent interest with payments spanning 10 years following graduation, said an article in the Chronicle of Higher Education.

"We don't have the funds (for a payment plan). The schools that do are heavily endowed," said Robert Evans, director of Student Financial Assistance at K-State.

"We are working on beefing up the scholarship program," Evans said. In the college work study program there are about 955 students working with only about $975,000 available, he added.

In the college work study program, the state pays 80 percent of the wages, with the employer paying the other 20 percent.

Some schools across the nation are making it easier for students who can not pay the full amount of a semester's tuition at registration.

"Students have until 'check-in time' which is the third or fourth week of school to pay their fees. But most pay within the first week of school," said Elton Davis, director of financial aid at OU.

The University of Colorado has the students pay a deposit before registration. The balance is then due nine days after the first day of school.

"The fees for full-time students (seven to 17 credit hours) are the same. If a student drops or adds hours above or below that within the first nine days of school he will receive a fee adjustment," said Pat Woods, director of financial aid at the University of Colorado at Boulder.

Students can also defer payment, meaning that one-half of their fees must be paid by the nine-day deadline. The balance is due a month later. The student must, however, sign a promissory note if they wish to defer payments.

At the University of Missouri at Columbia, students in medical fields can apply for a Health Professions Grant or the Nursing Loan Program. Both are federally matched programs, George Brooks, director of financial aid at MU, said.

Of the federal and state aid programs, college work study is very popular. At MU approximately 1200 students are enrolled in the program. At OSU the number is close to 800.

University schedules parking lot restriping

Parking lot striping, which began June 12, is scheduled to continue next week.

Lot D1E, west of West Stadium, will be closed today and possibly Friday for scheduled striping.

On Monday, lots A18, northeast of the Military Science building, A16, west of the International Student Center; and B12, in front of Call Hall, are scheduled for striping.

On Tuesday, planned striping includes lots B4, north of Call Hall; the parking area in front of Anderson Hall; and A27, west of Durland Hall.

University faculty, staff and students may park in any adjacent parking lots while the parking lot maintenance is being done.

Disc retains studio performance, provides distortion-free listening

By VIKKI WATSON

Forget the dusty, warped albums, cracked cassette holders and broken needles that keep your favorite Michael Jackson song from ringing true in your ears.

The answers to those problems can be solved with the recent appearance of the digital compact disc — the relatively new answer to noise and distortion-free music.

This new concept to Kansas music listeners comes via a 4-inch disc that is pressed like any other long-playing record only in a special material, said Dave Alexander, production director and disc jockey for WIBW-FM 97 radio station. The disc, which is laminated in plastic, takes a computer to decode and synthesize the sounds. Nothing touches the surface of the disc, insuring long-lasting and distortion-free play, Alexander said.

"It's digital, therefore, it doesn't lose anything from when it's recorded in the studio to when it's played," Alexander said. "You're not going to hear pops, cracks or distortions."

The disc was originally designed for classical music playing, but has now moved into all fields of music, said Alexander, who added that the disc will eventually be used in car stereo systems, as well as portable units.

"The disc was developed for classical music," he said, "but it's catching on so well that you can get almost any recording on disc."

The discs average about $15 as compared to the cost of an album or tape, which is approximately $8. There are several advantages to the disc and its playing system, which costs, on an average, $700, Alexander said.

One of these advantages is the long-lasting feature of the discs, which never wear out from over-play, he said. The disc is also more compact, making it particularly beneficial for radio stations.

"You really get more for the disc for the price," Alexander said. "It can hold up to 75 minutes of music, which is much longer than an album. You can play all songs in a row or you can program different cuts without having to go back on the disc."

"For a radio station it's an obvious answer. You spend a lot of money on replacements (replacement copies of albums). Now you only need one copy. They (discs) take up less space," he added.

"The disc doesn't have the static or pop that a record has," said Rhonda Barth, salesperson for Gherr's of Manhattan, which supplies the disc player in this area. "It won't scratch or wear out like an album."

The better quality of sound produced by the discs is obvious to the listener, Alexander said, but especially when the listener is capable of comparing the sounds with high-quality equipment. Being capable of distinguishing between discs and conventional long-playing albums and tapes usually takes time for those who first listen to the disc on radio.

"You can definitely tell the difference on a very expensive system but you can also tell on a clock radio," he said. "You might not be able to tell at first but if you listen to it for awhile it kind of raises your awareness."

"It is a lot better quality than a record," Barth said. "You can tell that it's better (but) I'm sure that hearing it on radio depends a lot on how good your equipment is."

"It's kind of an addictive thing. After you listen to it for a while, you don't want to listen to anything else," Alexander said.

Alexander and Barth agreed that because of the equipment cost and making the transition to disc-playing systems, Manhattan-area radio stations may take a little longer to make the move to disc-played music.

"I don't think some radio stations can afford it now," Alexander said. "(But) as it stands right now it will eliminate the standard LP record and cassette recorder."

'Local Hero' lacks starships, lasers, delivers with relaxed adult humor

Remember the kind of movies that are about people instead of gremlins, ghosts or vulcans? Or movies in which the special effects consist of a romantic moon hovering over a pair of lovers, rather than starships warping across the galaxy? "Local Hero," playing Thursday and Friday at the K-State Union, is such a movie.

It's a charming, low-key film with a leisurely plot, colorful characters and a poignant theme that makes for a nice break from the summer comic book moviefare.

The hero of "Local Hero" is a young oil executive named MacIntyre (Peter Riegert) who is sent by his eccentric boss, Mr. Happer (Burt Lancaster), to Scotland in order to purchase a quaint fishing village and its beach for an off-shore drilling venture.

MacIntyre has everything going for him: an $80,000 a year salary, a foreign sports car and a penthouse apartment in Houston. So it's with great reluctance that he goes to the sleepy town where meteor showers and Russian fishermen provide the weekend entertainment.

One might expect writer-director Bill Forsyth to have the townspeople completely satisfied with their pastoral life and spurn the millions of dollars offered for their houses and businesses, in order to make a point against the materialistic

Collegian Reviewer

American dream. Instead, the townspeople are eager to sell; in fact, their spokesman, Gordon (Denis Lawson) dances on his desk top when he realizes they're all going to be rich.

Forsyth makes his point against the "money-can-buy-happiness" ideal, nevertheless, by having MacIntyre gradually fall in love with the natural beauty of the ocean, the Scottish sky, the townspeople and Gordon's wife. Ironically, it is MacIntyre who regrets that the town and beach will be replaced by oil rigs and tankers and he finds himself reluctant to return to his city of distant relationships and smog-covered skies.

"Local Hero" has, like so many British comedies, a dry, droll, understated sense of humor. But it's more accessible than most British films because MacIntyre is American. The subplot involving Happer and his abusive analyst is also purely American in its absurdity. Happer ultimately comes to Scotland to help persuade the lone holdout on the deal, an old hermit who lives in a shack made out of driftwood, and to check first hand on the reports MacIntyre has sent back on the sky (Happer is an amateur astronomer).

Peter Riegert does an excellent job of making us see the subtle change his character undergoes. We feel the emptiness inside him when, back in his Houston apartment, he looks out over the city lights. There are other lonely people out there, but back in Scotland he has friends who are much closer.

Burt Lancaster plays a splendid batty president of the oil company. Roles such as this and the one he had in "Atlantic City" show he hasn't lost any of his acting abilities since the days when he was one of Hollywood's most-talented leading men.

"Local Hero" isn't for everyone; kids especially will find it slow-going and won't understand most of the adult humor. It doesn't have any lasers, but it'll only cost you $1.50 and you won't have to wait in line to see it. Remember, you can't live on a steady diet of cotton candy; every once in awhile you need a steak. "Local Hero" is a sirloin, well-done.

Statewide consumption increases; cocaine availability meets demand

By The Associated Press

WICHITA — Law enforcement authorities throughout the state say they are finding more and more Kansans using cocaine, and that cocaine is readily available in the black market for illegal drugs.

Earlier this month in Junction City, 15 people were rounded up on cocaine charges, and 12.5 ounces of cocaine were seized.

Last December in Labette County, six people were arrested on cocaine charges — one of them from Oswego, population 2,205.

And in a Wichita hotel room last August, two men from Miami sold 11 pounds of pure cocaine to federal agents.

Once sold discreetly in users' homes or other private places, authorities say cocaine now is sold regularly in public places in Kansas — bars, work places and the like.

The number of people arrested on cocaine possession charges has nearly doubled in Kansas since 1979. Small-time cocaine busts of an ounce or less have become commonplace.

"Since the first of the year we have been filing a lot of simple possession-of-cocaine charges from routine traffic stops, which says to me there is a lot more cocaine use out there than there used to be," said Sedgewick County District Attorney Clark Owens.

In Kansas City, Kan., police detective Rex Garner, head of the narcotics squad, said cocaine has become as available and as prevalent as marijuana.

"It's out there just about everywhere," Garner said. "There have been rumors that in many private clubs you can usually get it right over the bar."

In Labette County, where the largest city is Parsons, with 12,870 people, County Attorney Scott Gray said: "In our neck of the woods it used to be a rich man's drug, but we see a lot of it, not in large amounts, but we see much more of it now than we did four years ago."

At $2,100 an ounce, cocaine is five times more expensive than gold.

It usually is sold to the ultimate user by the gram, at $90 to $140 a gram, with the cost depending mainly on the cocaine's purity. Most users ingest it by inhaling it through the nostrils.

In 1979 in Kansas, 87 adults and four juveniles were arrested for possession of cocaine or opiates. In 1982, 181 adults and eight juveniles were arrested for possession of cocaine or opiates. Last year, 146 adults and nine juveniles were arrested on such charges.

The maximum federal penalty for sale of cocaine is 15 years in prison and a $25,000 fine. Possession of cocaine is a misdemeanor under federal law, punishable by one year in prison and a $5,000 fine.

Under Kansas law, possession of cocaine is the same crime as sale of cocaine — a felony, punishable by a minimum sentence of 3 to 5 years in prison and a maximum sentence of 10 to 20 years, plus fines of up to $15,000.

Recognizing illegal aliens offers step forward

Congress is currently trying to establish a workable system of dealing with illegal aliens.

An immigration control bill was passed Tuesday by the House of Representatives. Provisions in the bill would allow illegal aliens who have lived and worked in the United States since 1982 to become legal residents, eligible to apply for citizenship. Also included is a "guest worker" program under which foreign workers would be imported to harvest perishable crops on the West Coast.

Some Congressmen are against granting amnesty because it rewards lawbreakers. Others say aliens take jobs from their constituents.

These arguments are both right and wrong. Illegal aliens are willing to work for lower wages and under worse conditions than many citizens, making them a bargain for employers. On the other hand, few U.S. citizens want the jobs held by illegal aliens. These jobs are often seasonal and unskilled labor.

Immigration laws are being broken. But the reason why laws are being broken is also important.

Illegal aliens leave behind their homes and families. They come to a country with a different language and customs. They often encounter discrimination, both in and out of the workplace. Why do they continue trying to enter the United States? They have no choice.

Rep. Robert Garcia, D-N.Y., best summed up the situation: "You can't fault people just for trying to feed themselves. I know if I were hungry I would probably end up breaking the law, and if my children were hungry I would break the law even faster."

Desperate people will continue to cross U.S. borders seeking the necessities of life that most Americans take for granted. Illegal aliens will not be deterred by new laws. The social conditions forcing this immigration must be changed.

Congress is attacking the base problem with the "guest worker" program. These workers will not be forced to join the ranks of illegal aliens in the United States. If this program proves successful, perhaps similar ones could be developed — further alleviating the problem.

Recognizing illegal aliens as legal residents after they have lived and worked in the United States for several years is another step in the right direction.

There are an estimated 6.25 million illegal aliens in the United States. Current law enforcement personnel could not find, process and deport this many people even if a law could be developed to completely halt the flow of illegal aliens.

Since most illegal aliens are here to stay, they should participate in the cultural mainstream. They should hold jobs, pay taxes and make their contribution — just as past immigrants have done — to this nation of immigrants.

Phone customers profit in AT&T divestiture

The rates on long-distance telephone bills will be going down thanks to an almost unheard of request by American Telephone & Telegraph Co. to lower their rates. The Kansas Corporation Commission gave AT&T permission Tuesday to lower rates on long-distance call made within the state by an average of 8.5 percent, a $6 million decrease.

For a company of lower prices after a hike is a rare occurrence. Anyone who studies economics will agree to this statement. But what we may have witnessed this week may be the first positive effect of the AT&T divestiture.

So far, the break-up of AT&T has provided nothing but worries and headaches for phone customers. Customers have been confused about telephone service, have been threatened with higher rates and have, generally been dissatisfied with the divestiture. Many consumers were satisfied with their telephone service in the past and saw the new changes as a threat to reliable service.

But what was missing from telephone service in the past was a sense of competition. AT&T was the only company providing long-distance service to consumers and, although regulated by the government, was not pressured by other companies to improve service or lower rates.

Then smaller telephone services began to bid for a piece of the telephone long-distance business. But these smaller companies were at a disadvantage with AT&T — the more-established company had better access to existing telephone lines and was providing nearly all American service. With small telephone companies being forced to use a 10-digit access number to tap into AT&T, companies such as MCI and Sprint were too inconvenient to offer much of a threat.

The AT&T break-up has changed this situation. Smaller companies have been given a chance to compete with AT&T on an equal basis, which, in the long run, is beneficial to phone customers.

Monday's rate reduction might be the first sign that AT&T realizes it is not the only game in town any longer. Smaller companies have been given temporary permission to charge less for long-distance calls — hoping to gain a foothold in the lucrative phone market.

Consumers finally have the chance to shop for phone service as they would shop in most competitive markets, due to the AT&T divestiture. Phone customers now have a choice and in the long run this new competition should mean better service at a better price.

President created by pocketbook, personality

Becoming president of the United States isn't cheap. He who becomes leader of country pays for the office via his financial stockpile and the successful sale of himself. Forget a candidate's moral convictions or his soft-line stances on various issues. Two things make a president: pocketbook and personality.

Ever since the Nixon-Kennedy debates in early '60s, one factor changed the monetary outlook of becoming president: television.

This debate proved that millions of Americans were choosing a president, not necessarily on the issues, but by how he presented himself on the TV set. The dark-eyed Nixon looked like someone from a Boris Karloff movie while Kennedy's looks were just short of Peter Pan. The American people saw youth and vitality in Kennedy and it landed him the presidency.

But something was lost because of those debates. The importance of issues and how they affected the masses were overshadowed by the right type of makeup. Candidates adopted political consultants who carefully studied crowd reaction and views to tell if their office-seeker was being too virtuous on some issues and lacking conviction on others. But those studies weren't — and still aren't — done out of a concern for our nation's welfare but, instead, were used as different pieces of molding clay for the candidates to shape themselves into what they believe the people want to see.

The televisions in million of people's homes are the modes to an election victory, especially to the millions of apathetic Americans who wouldn't know an issue if it was blowing up in their front yard. A president doesn't have to be smart (that's been proven too many times) — he just has to look good in that large glass eye called a lens.

But, unfortunately, there is a catch. The bacon can be cured but it can't be cured cheaply. What I mean is that any candidate, with the proper help, can be made to look good but not every candidate can afford it. So it's not only those candidates who look good, it's those candidates who can afford to look good. That brings about the all-too-familiar political prostitution concerning political action groups.

Arts and Features Editor

An example is Ronald Reagan and big business. He received the backing of those with paunchy pocketbooks, which for him was the difficult part, and then proceeded to use the television camera like a madman with an automatic weapon in a crowded shopping mall. The majority of voting Americans fell in love with grandfatherly type candidate who patriotically teared his eyes when debating independent candidate John Anderson, whose fatal mistake was talking about inflation, unemployment and other trivial matters.

Cut and dried, a candidate cannot win the presidential election without television. Television costs money, a lot of it. A candidate is forced to make friends with people who hold the buckets of cash to pay for that all-important TV shot. The final killer is that getting the funds is like a high-interest loan. The fiddler must be paid. An example of the musician not going home without pay was the Dow Chemical plant gaining privilege to edit the Environmental Protection Agency's report on Dow's storage of toxic waste. I wonder who they supported in the 1980 presidential campaign?

So this relationship is going on now. The candidates try to convince people with loaded bank accounts that their policies are worth a signature on a check. The candidates then cash those checks in front of television cameras while we, the public, sit back and watch the production. Hart and Mondale appeased millions doing promo shots for Wendy's. And they looked good. Just, hopefully, to the right people — the kind that do not eat at Wendy's.

Jackson fans deserve consideration in price

(This open letter is written in response to the recent announcement of the Jacksons' upcoming concert appearance in Kansas City)

Dear Michael Jackson,

If you're planning to charge $30 a concert ticket, which are only available in sets of four, don't be surprised when some of your beloved fans tell you to "Beat It."

Mike, let's face a few facts. Your audience in the past has varied from a few age groups up and down the ladder, but lately it seems your fans are teen-agers and kids under 12. I'm sure parents all over Kansas were delighted to hear of your appearance in Kansas City. "At last," they must have thought, "a chance for my kids to see their idol." But I'll bet it came as a "Thriller" to those working parents when they found out they had to shell out $120 (for four tickets).

M.J., it isn't really as easy as "ABC" for parents to pay $120 as you might imagine — especially when their kid might need glasses or braces. To the kid, (those items) may not seem as important as your concert, but to the parent it (the concert) is an expense that deserves consideration.

Now I realize it's important to have a ticket sellout; there are bills to pay. With a sellout crowd (approximately 68,000) you're only going to gross $2,040,000 a night. And with an income of $6,120,000 at the end of three shows, why, you'll be lucky to afford a sandwich at a local burger shop.

Michael, please understand, I'm not knocking your success. I'm happy you made it to the top, you deserve it — you have a lot of talent. But don't you think you owe a little to your fans, perhaps in the form of cheaper tickets, purchased one at a time? After all, it was your fans who put you at the top.

Mike, I could probably go and see your concert but it would break my dad's heart for me to sell my mother. So when your first concert airs and Vincent Price possibly echoes in the background, I'll be having a cold stein with a few friends. At the end of the night and a few ZZ Top records later I'll have probably spent $10. You will probably make $2 million. But at any rate, I'll have a good time and be $110 richer.

Duval gets help with new album

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — Actor Robert Duval, who won an Oscar for his role as a country music singer, is making a debut album with a little help from such friends as Waylon Jennings and Willie Nelson.

Duval, 53, sang some of his own tunes in "Tender Mercies," But he said he won't perform any of his original pieces on the album, which will be cut in Nashville on Triad Records.

"This is a brand-new field for me," he said. "Maybe on my next album, I'll do some of my own songs."

The opening of a museum dedicated to Jennings' career brought Duval to Nashville, but more than his friends and singing have kept the actor in the South recently. He's researching and writing a film script about a preacher.

Jennings said his wife, Jessi Colter, will play Duval's wife in the film. Next spring is Duval's target for the start of production.

Marine writes eulogy for friend

WESTBORO, Mass. — A musician's tribute to a friend killed in the Oct. 23 bombing of Marine headquarters in Beirut has found its way to the White House.

John Lowbridge, 35, who says he wrote the 3.5-minute eulogy between club performances, received a letter Monday from President Reagan.

Lowbridge said he sang the song at a memorial service last year for Michael S. Haskell and gave a copy of the words and music to Haskell's wife, Christine. Mrs. Haskell gave the song to a Marine officer, who in turn forwarded it to the White House.

Lowbridge said he would like the families of the other Marines to receive copies of the song, but it would be too expensive for him to copy and send it.

Lowbridge said he and Haskell, 34, were neighbors for two years in the early 1970s in a tenement in Westboro. Haskell was a captain when he went to Beirut in May 1983.

'Oz' Dorothy shows at convention

HOLLAND, Mich. — For Romola Dunlap, there was no place like Holland.

The original Dorothy in the road show of the "Wizard of Oz" was the star attraction at the International Wizard of Oz Convention in this Michigan town over the weekend.

She was cast as the first Dorothy in 1908 at the age of eight by "Wizard of Oz" author L. Frank Baum, long before the movie came out in 1939.

Dunlap, who did appear in some movies, today teaches piano, organ and voice at the 12th Church of Christ Scientist in Chicago. She played the role once again last weekend at a private club near Holland.

Tuttle Creek State Park offers variety of services to public

By STEVE SWAFFORD
Staff Writer

Tuttle Creek State Park is the temporary home for many vacationing families. With the summer in full swing, Stanley Curtis, park manager, said more than 6,000 campers and one-day permit holders go through the park in one summer month.

"We have several two-day campers and (then) people who stay as long as they can. We get quite a few people who come to visit somebody at K-State, Fort Riley or people just traveling through that come up off 1-70 and stay overnight," Curtis said.

He said the park is also visited frequently by local patrons who come to Tuttle for the afternoon and relax on the beaches.

In the Tuttle Creek River Pond Area there are regulations governing the consumption of alcoholic beverages in certain sections of the park, Curtis said.

"Alcoholic beverages are prohibited on the beaches and outside of that, they (alcoholic beverages) are pretty much allowed except they can't be over 3.2 (percent alcohol)," he said.

For larger parties, Curtis said groups need to obtain a special events permit.

"Whenever there is any appreciable amount of alcohol and a group together, then they must have a special events permit. There's no charge, but we need responsible people — people who will assume the responsibility of the group to clean-up and monitor their behavior and such," he said.

The summer season is from April 15 to Oct. 15, but this sometimes depends on the weather, Curtis said. Around April 1 park personnel begin summer preparation by turning on the electricity in the buildings and checking the picnic areas for maintenance work needed after the winter weather. Water levels are also checked.

"Water has been high on the lake and, consequently, we've had a high outflow and it has flooded down here in the River Pond Area and it (the water level) kept our beach flooded till recently," Curtis said.

Tuttle Creek has a floodgate located on the south end of the reservoir. Curtis said the water level has to be 35 feet above conservation level in order to reach the water channel which flows into the overflow spillway. He said several people refer to it as the "dry spillway" because of the number of times it has been used for flood control.

The outlet control area (tubes) is the major, constant water control device for the reservoir, Curtis said the water level of the reservoir has dropped between 16 and 17 feet within the last month. He said occasionally both tubes are opened but he said he did not know exactly what determined the opening of both tubes.

"They have let out as much as 28,000 cubic feet per second and I believe they have gone a little above that. One year they were going to go up to about 40 (thousand cubic feet per second), but they got to about 28 (thousand cubic feet per second) and they decided not to," Curtis said.

Curtis said that too much water flowing downstream at one time would cause flooding in the low-lying areas of the park. He said at 28,000, it might even flood part of the state park's headquarters, some camping areas and shelter floors.

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers operates the outlet area where the tubes are located below the dam and the state controls the "Tuttle Puddle" area. Curtis said the Corps does not require a monetary permit for their area if people wanted to stay for a period of time, but the state requires a $2 one-day parking permit on the state side of Tuttle Creek.

The Spillway Park, Fancy Creek and Randolph areas are additional park facilities that are operated by the state with the Corps maintaining four areas around the reservoir.

Census bureau studies population

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — America's population may be declining but certainly will be vastly different a century from now, much older and with non-whites accounting for one-fourth of the total, the Census Bureau predicted Wednesday.

The bureau said in a report that the U.S. population is likely to stop growing in the next century and may even start to fall off.

The report includes three separate population projections, based on different assumptions about birth rates, death rates, immigration and other factors. The starting point is 1982, when the population totaled 232.1 million.

The middle projection anticipates that the population will rise to 304.8 million by the year 2030 and then growth will slow sharply, with the total in 2080 only 310.8 million people.

The lowest series of assumptions would see a rise to 257.4 million in 2030 and then a drop to 191.1 million in 2080. The high would result in growth to 369.7 million in 2030 and 331.1 million in 2080.

Merchants expect low summer profits

By THERESA R-LORETZ
Collegian Reporter

Count the number of cars at the intersection of Third Street and Blue-mont Avenue in Manhattan, and you know summer has arrived.

That is how Tom Whalen, director of operations for the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce, described one symptom of the students' exodus from Manhattan during the summer months.

But there are other symptoms, and these are readily apparent to Manhattan businesses. Money leaves with the students; money spent on rent, food, entertainment and other needs.

Students may notice the effect most readily in Aggieville. There's a lot more room to sit down at the drinking establishments and there is possibly a lot more room to park. But that also means there is a lot more room in the cash registers.

Mike Kuhn, owner of Kite's Bar and Grille, said the decline in business is expected, "just as the sun comes up tomorrow."

Ira C. Haynes, who co-owns Haynes Style Shop with his son, J.R., has seen the students come and go from Aggieville for 58 years.

"When the students leave here, within five hours they're gone," Haynes said. "One night (they're gone); you wake up the next morning and there are students everywhere when they come in the fall. Within a few hours, the town is drained, and within a few hours, they're (the students) back."

Haynes said he sees maybe a 20 percent drop in business at his style shop, which is not as drastic as some of the other businesses. Overall, Haynes said they do pretty well at the style shop, because both he and his son have developed a large following of local customers.

Kuhn estimated that roughly 75 percent of Kite's business depends on K-State students.

"When you lose 75 percent of your clientele, there's going to be a noticeable decrease in the amount of business we're doing," Kuhn said.

Estimates by the Chamber of Commerce on the amount a student spends in Manhattan are based upon student budget statistics published by the Office of Student Financial Assistance at K-State.

The student budgets are an estimated cost of what a student will spend throughout a nine-month academic year at K-State.

For the 1984-85 academic year, estimates show that a single, residential student will spend $2,016 for room and board; $312 for books and supplies; $1,010 for personal expenses (incidentals); $452 for transportation expenses (commuting and gas expense only); and $1,182 for tuition and fees at K-State.

Bob Evans, director of Student Financial Assistance, said residence hall costs are the benchmark for room and board costs. He said he realizes rent and utilities may be higher off-campus.

Incidental expenses are derived from a family and child development course on personal expenditure patterns. A group project in that course determines what students' spending patterns are by taking estimates and keeping diaries.

A random sample of class schedules is taken from files annually to determine an average cost of books and supplies for those schedules pulled.

"We use that in relation to the national benchmark figure that is produced by the National College Scholarship Service," Evans said.

"This is a very modest, but adequate, budget," Evans said, stressing the fact that a student may spend more or less than the student budgets, according to the individual student's lifestyle.

"That doesn't mean if you make a trip to Aggieville every night for 18 weeks a semester that you will end up spending more," Evans said.

The budgets are based on an average, and Evans said he has yet to meet an "average" student. Most would say they spend more.

Though the financial aid office uses these figures to determine financial aid eligibility, Manhattan businesses use them to gauge potential profits.

Kuhn roughly estimated that if a student spends $5,000 a year in Manhattan, 100 students would be worth $500,000 to the Manhattan community annually.

While Kuhn is frank about his business's dollar loss this summer, he noted that softball teams coming in "helps get you through the summer."

Summer school helps also. Kuhn said that business increased over the last few weeks in May once summer school began at K-State.

"Even though it's only 4,000 students, that is 4,000 more students who are back in Manhattan," Kuhn said. "And a lot of them do come to the Aggieville area because it is the center of activity."

The real compensation, however, comes in the fall when the students return, Kuhn said.

"We make money when the students are here," he said. "You look to the 12 months and then you average them out. You gotta look at it that way. You can't just look at the three months that we're not going to make money or show a profit."

Kuhn said he spoke, not only as the owner of Kite's, but for other Aggieville and Manhattan merchants as well. Summer magnifies the drop in the student population, and businesses in Aggieville, he said, as well as other Manhattan businesses, watch enrollment figures closely.

"The decline in student enrollment at K-State does have an effect on the businesses in Aggieville," Kuhn said. "Not only in Aggieville but in all of Manhattan."

"I speak not only of people that are in the drinking establishments, but the restaurants, grocery stores and retailers, they notice it. We're not the only business in town whose volume is proportional to the student enrollment," Kuhn said.

Another business which has noticed the absence of students is Godfather's Pizza. Manager Steve Shandy said that 50 percent of his customers have gone since the end of the regular school year.

Dianna Welliver, branch manager and assistant cashier at Kansas State Bank in Aggieville, takes special notice of the Aggieville businesses. Welliver is president of the Aggieville Merchants Association. She said the drop in business during the summer is noticeable at the bank simply by glancing out the window.

"We don't have the volume of walk-in traffic that we would normally (during the regular school year)," Welliver said. But she stressed that the bank doesn't really "lose" customers because they return in the fall and the bank encourages students to leave a balance in their accounts.

Welliver said she believed the decline of student population had an equal effect on all the retailers in Aggieville. But she said she also believed that Aggieville merchants pick up some local customers during the summer.

"The local people will come to Aggieville more when the students are gone," Welliver said.

She reasoned a lot of the local people just don't want to fight the crowds. Parking can sometimes be a problem, she added.

Haynes agreed that a lot of town people avoided Aggieville because of the student populous and parking problems. "When I first came here, there was a lot more town business than there is now." He said a lot of town business was "scared away" during the 1960s because of the large number of student protesters.

Because she is not in the retail business, Welliver hesitated to say that Aggieville had been hit harder than downtown. But she said she thought it was likely because many students without cars could walk to Aggieville, and, therefore, those businesses probably depended more on students.

Charles Browne, president of the Manhattan Downtown Merchants Association and owner of businesses both in Aggieville and downtown, said he believed the decline in business due to students leaving during the summer was felt all over. But he was not able to make a comparison between the two stores for the summer months, because his clothing store in Aggieville has only been in operation since November.

Whalen, who was also the former manager of Woolworths, echoed the words of Kuhn and Browne.

"Everybody is affected," Whalen said. "There is no way you can lose 10,000 people without it having an effect."

Whalen, who said he would rather see the students here all year, felt that certain types of businesses were hit harder than others, particularly those catering especially to students.

For now though, Kuhn, who is going through his first "lean months" as the sole owner of Kite's, kicks back in his chair and waits for the first of August.

Economic rise fails to reach prior levels

The basic economic outlook for Kansas favors continued recovery from the double recession which began in 1981, said Jarvin Emerson, professor of economics.

Emerson uses figures prior to 1981 as a basis for comparison. He explained the country was hit first with a recession in 1981 and again in 1982. It then went through a six-month period of recovery between recessions.

Emerson said that while things have improved "considerably" in Kansas, the state is still not back to where it was three years ago.

"Manufacturing employment has moved up considerably, and we are now beginning to see some of the other sectors improving as well," Emerson said. "The growth is not robust by national standards, but we are fairly close now to the national growth rate."

Low farm prices, which caused a drop in farm income, and up-and-down construction activity were two of the industries which held back the economy in Kansas, Emerson said. He added that the state has had some recovery in these areas, but "we still have a ways to go."

"Services — all non-manufacturing, non-retail and non-agricultural jobs — and, to some extent, retail trade, have not rebounded yet to pre-recession levels," Emerson said. Emerson, who often does economic forecasting for the state, compared Manhattan to other Kansas cities.

"Manhattan has fared much better than the state during the recession because the economy of Manhattan is not dependent on manufacturers, but is more an agricultural dependent economy. So, there isn't necessarily the problem of recovery. It got hurt some, but not anything like Wichita," Emerson said.

The outlook in Manhattan, Emerson said, is not dismal by any means. He pointed to the "surge" in construction activity around Manhattan, particularly on multi-family apartment buildings. He said that type of construction activity was probably above average for the state.

On the down side, Emerson said that there are not enough jobs in Manhattan for people who are looking for them. He said this may be due in part to the substantial supply of college students working part time, but he added that the work-shortage is typical throughout the state.

Emerson said the summer job situation has been better other years, but "it's better than it was last year."

DOE official proclaims nuclear test successful

By The Associated Press

LAS VEGAS — A nuclear test explosion of up to 150 kilotons went off Wednesday 1,250 feet below Yucca Flat, causing "no problems," a federal Department of Energy spokesman said.

The explosion, code-named Duoro, was the seventh such test this year at the Nevada Test Site at Yucca Flat and was considered successful, DOE spokesman Jim Boyer said.

He said no radioactivity escaped into the atmosphere in the 8:15 a.m. blast 76 miles southwest of Las Vegas.

"It went along real fine, no problems at all," Boyer said.

He said the explosion had a "yield range of 20 to 150 kilotons," which means it had the force of 20,000 to 150,000 tons of TNT.

It was the 623rd test announced at Yucca Flat since testing began there in 1951, he said, adding that the total number of U.S.-announced tests since signing the Limited Test Ban Treaty in August 1963 is now 418.

Last year, 15 underground nuclear test explosions were announced at the Nevada Test Site. The most recent previously announced test was code-named Caprock and was fired on May 31.

Careful sunbathing reduces cancer risk

By THERESA R-LORETZ
Collegian Reporter

The clouds are gone and the sun is beating a clear path to lawn chairs in back yards, beach towels on roof tops and blankets on street curbs. The sun will find its worshippers savoring golden rays as though warmth and sunshine could be hoarded.

But before sun seekers head for the sun patch, they would be wise to take a few precautions, not only to ensure that a painful sunburn is avoided, but to minimize the chance of developing skin cancer.

Some may discount the sun as cancer-causing agent. In this world of carcinogens, the sun may be looked upon as a healthy, natural provider of vitamin D, which it is. But Dr. Robert Durst, a dermatologist in Topeka, said the sun produces a weak form of radiation.

He said the sun's radiation works to alter the DNA, or "blueprint" of the cell. This may trigger excessive, uncontrolled growth of skin cells, Durst said. Cancer is caused when a single cell or group of cells are not regulated by normal forces of cellular growth and continue to multiply, possibly invading and destroying the body's tissues.

There are several classifications of skin cancer. Melanoma, a cancer often arising from a mole on the skin, has a close connection with the sun, Durst said. Though melanoma is less common than other forms of cancer, it's also one of the more deadly.

Dr. Robert Tout, director of Lafene Student Health Center, elaborated on two of the more common types of skin cancers: squamous cell carcinoma and basal cell carcinoma.

Tout said that both of these types of cancers grow slowly and may take the form of an insignificant lesion or a dry scaly area on the skin. Some people may not be concerned about the lesion for months or even years, Tout said.

Very rarely do the more common forms of cancer invade other tissues, he said. The malignancies can easily be removed on an outpatient basis. This is not the case with melanoma, which spreads rapidly to other tissues. Amputation may be required to remove the malignant melanoma, therefore early detection is important.

Tout said some, if not most, of the 92 malignancies reported at Lafene during 1982-83 were skin-related. Figures for the number of malignancies reported during 1983-84 have not yet been compiled.

"We did have a student die of malignant melanoma last year," Tout said.

Durst said one signal of possible melanoma is a mole on the skin that changes in appearance. It may become raised, darker in color, begin to itch, feel irritated or bleed. He added that a mole can become raised but not necessarily be cancerous. If change occurs rapidly, however, it is best to seek medical advice.

Symptoms of other possible skin cancers include a sore that doesn't heal, or an area on the skin, such as a mole, that becomes progressively larger. These areas can be skin-colored or discolored. Another sign of possible cancer is an increase in the number of blood vessels on top of the mole.

While Durst said he hasn't seen an increase or decrease in skin cancer cases recently, he did say the number of reported cases of melanoma are increasing. However, he said, this could possibly be attributed to the classification system for other types of skin cancer. Because many are so common, they often go unreported.

Just how long the skin needs to be exposed to the sun before damage is done is hard to define, Durst said. He added that sunburning causes more damage than suntanning and the amount of time it takes to get a sunburn varies from one person to the next. Other factors must also be taken into account, Durst said.

A fair-skinned person will burn faster than a person who is darker-complexioned.

Burning occurs much more quickly during the summer months than in the winter.

The more intense the sun, the more likely a person is to burn. During Daylight Savings Time, the sun's four strongest hours are between 11 a.m. and 3 p.m. However, this doesn't mean that sunburning won't occur at other times of the day.

The higher the altitude, the faster the burn. A sunbather in Denver is likely to burn faster than his counterpart in Manhattan.

Durst said the safest way to prevent sun-damaged skin is to avoid sunlight. But for those who find that solution a bit extreme, he offered some advice for minimizing the effects of the sun.

Avoiding the four strongest hours of sunlight and wearing protective clothing would help, Durst said. He also said the use of sun screen would reduce the risk of sunburning. He stressed that sun screen was not the same as sun block. A screen acts as a filter and, therefore, allows a person to tan. A sun block, such as zinc oxide, does not let the sun through.

Most sun screens have numbers printed on the labels which indicate the amount of the filtering agent. The higher the number, the more protection the sun screen offers. For example, the number 15 on the label means that it will take 15 minutes to get the same amount of the sun's ultraviolet rays as a person without the sun screen gets in one minute. Durst said a person initially going out to tan can use a sun screen numbered between four and eight and still get a fairly good tan.

With the developments of indoor-tanning salons, some people may skip the arduous heat in order to get tan.

Durst said he didn't think the light source made much difference concerning the dangers of radiation but added that since that type of tanning takes place under controlled conditions, a person using a tanning salon was not as likely to burn.

Russian papers claim hunger strike in U.S.

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — Two major Soviet newspapers Wednesday carried stories heralding imprisoned American Indian activist Leonard Peltier as a man of strong will who is near death because of a hunger strike to protest injustice and mistreatment.

The Soviet press lately has carried frequent reports on Peltier's hunger strike, saying he was imprisoned on trumped-up charges eight years ago stemming from the deaths of two FBI agents on the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation in South Dakota.

Peltier is currently incarcerated at the U.S. Medical Center for Federal Prisoners in Springfield, Mo. He was transferred there from the U.S. Penitentiary in Marion, Ill. after beginning the hunger strike.

"Peltier has been eating and doing fine," Paul Taylor, a spokesman at the Medical Center, said Wednesday. "He's doing absolutely fine...and has been eating regular, solid institutional food."

Taylor said he had told the same thing to a caller this week who sounded Russian.

The Communist Party newspaper Pravda said Wednesday that authorities had transferred Peltier and were trying to force-feed him because of the "unwelcome political consequences" if he dies.

Pravda described the Marion prison as a place of "ruthless beatings, killings and constant humiliation of prisoners by wardens."

"It was against that mistreatment that the Indian leader protested by going on a hunger strike," Pravda said.

The newspaper said Peltier gained the disfavor of ruling circles for calling on fellow Indians to struggle for basic human rights and to fight plundering of their lands.

Literaturnaya Gazeta, which is published by the Soviet Writers Union, said, "going by everything, this man of pure heart and unconquerable will is not to live long. He will soon become another victim of U.S. 'Civilization' — to its satisfaction."

Congressman may face fine, reprimand for rule violation

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The House ethics committee Wednesday recommended that the full House reprimand convicted Rep. George V. Hansen, who angrily disputed the panel's finding that he violated House rules by filing false financial disclosure forms.

Reprimand — which consists of passing a resolution criticizing a congressman's conduct — is the lightest form of House punishment.

The ethics panel closed its doors after holding a public disciplinary hearing during which special counsel Stanley Brand proposed a reprimand and a $10,000 fine, and Hansen, R-Idaho, asked for total exoneration.

The panel, announcing its judgment in mid-afternoon in a written statement, rejected Brand's recommendation that Hansen be fined. The statement did not list the panel's vote.

The punishment recommended by the panel now goes to the full House.

Hansen described the violation of which he was accused as a "technical charge...which I will continue to challenge."

The next highest penalty, censure, is similar to a reprimand, but the member must have the resolution read to him by the speaker while standing at the front of the chamber — an event that could be watched by millions of Americans who receive House broadcasts on their cable television systems. The committee also could have recommended expulsion.

Hansen, raising his voice and pounding his fist on a table, told the committee "you ought to pay me, not fine me" for spending $135,000 of his own money to finance his conservative legislative program.

He said his attempt to pay off his personal debts has led to public humiliation and commented, "They called my wife Tin Can Connie."

Hansen told the committee that after spending $350,000 in legal fees, a $10,000 fine would be "like a flea."

Hansen's main defense was that he sought the committee's advice on financial reporting requirements and was "steered by this committee into a certain course of action that has proved to be a disaster to me."

Contending he followed the committee's advice at all times, Hansen insisted he never saw a crucial June 19, 1978, draft memorandum addressed to him from the committee which said he must report the financial transactions of his wife.

Hansen did not report such transactions, including financial dealings with Texas billionaire Nelson Bunker Hunt — and his decision led to his conviction in U.S. District Court for violating the Ethics in Government Act.

Jerry Carpenter, instructor, teaches Derek Frost the proper way to swing a golf club.

Kris Kobiskie practices his throwing skills using softballs at Memorial Stadium.

Tammy Corbin, a student in the fitness school, and her team, react to knocking over pins while bowling with a volleyball in class Tuesday.

Fitness School

Fitness mania is definitely here to stay. But now the craze has a new generation of participants, some as young as 6 years old.

The Sports Fitness School, sponsored by the K-State Division of Continuing Education, began in 1973. The most recent session has taught children the importance of good physical fitness during the last three weeks.

"We tried to give kids activities they haven't had before," said Carol Rickard, fitness school director and senior in recreation. "Children are exposed to different types of sports and activities that usually aren't available in the elementary schools. We try to stress the fitness aspect of sports."

The children participate in 12 days of various sports and physical activities. Children are grouped into brackets according to age: 6- and 7-year-olds, 8- and 9-year-olds, and 10- through 12-year-olds. Each age group is limited to 30 participants.

Younger students, 6 through 9 years of age, participate in activities involving motor skills such as ball handling and throwing. Ten- through 12-year-olds concentrate on more difficult sports, such as golfing, bowling and archery. All the children participate in swimming, aerobics and track relays.

"The Sports Fitness School brings an awareness of fitness to the children," said Bob Gadwood, senior in physical education and instructor at the school. "As they get older, we hope they will become more aware of their own fitness, and know what to do with it."

A specific philosophy was designed by the Division of Continuing Education for the Sports Fitness School. The school was created to encourage vigorous physical activity and an achievement of physical fitness. Motor skills, creativity, precaution, expression, self-understanding and acceptance, and social development are also encouraged.

A new aspect of the Fitness School is the "Fit For Life" program. Children keep records of their biking, walking and swimming in measurements of time, instead of distance. This method of record keeping is less strenuous for children, Rickard said.

By the end of the session, an accumulated total of 60 hours or more entitle the child to a certificate. Certificates can also be obtained after 120 hours and after 180 hours. Children have until the middle of August to meet their goals, and must keep their own records of activities.

"The 'Fit For Life' program encourages kids to use their free time wisely," Rickard said. "Hopefully, the kids will rather ride a bike than sit around watching television."

Fitness tests are given to all students in the school. The tests include flexibility, the standard broad jump, the 50-yard dash, and a skin-fold test to show the amount of body fat the person has.

"This is a good time," said Bill Holthaus, senior in management and instructor at the fitness school, "especially watching the kids having a good time."

Holthaus said he used to be a pool manager and lifeguard for six years and missed working with children and being outdoors. He said the children he works with now are involved in all types of sports, not just swimming.

"It is good to compare kids who not only swim, but children who are involved in other sports, too," Holthaus said.

Students fill out an evaluation-type questionnaire during the last portion of the school. This gives the instructors feedback from the children who take the class, and will help with classes in the future.

Instructors, Rickard said, are hired to teach the children about physical fitness. She said many of the teachers have college degrees, or are preparing to begin student-teaching programs.

"This is a good experience for the kids and the instructor," Rickard said.

The last day of each school session is designated as Parents' Day. Parents are encouraged to participate with the children in various sports. An assembly is also held during the last period, at which each child receives a certificate of participation.

The Department of Physical Education, Dance and Leisure Studies provides all the necessary equipment for the Sports Fitness School. The various sporting activities take place at Ahearn Field House, Memorial Stadium, the gymnastics room at Ahearn and the Natatorium.

An additional incentive for parents to enroll their children in the school is a tax credit, equalling the cost of registration. The fee may be used as a child care or educational expense credit.

The first session ends today and the second session is scheduled for Monday through July 12.

Session 2 of the Sports Fitness School will be completely different from the first session, Rickard said. The American Red Cross sponsors swimming courses as part of the activities and children move from beginning stages up to the advanced swimmer stage. Other various programs involving new games, exercises and activities are also added. This allows children taking both sessions a variety of different sports and exercises to learn. Parents must complete and mail in a registration form, a health consent form and registration fee to the Division of Continuing Education.

The fitness school lasts from 8:30 through 11:30 a.m. each day.

Locker and towel services and two K-State Sports Fitness T-shirts are included in the registration fee.

Oakland romps to 8-1 win

By The Associated Press

OAKLAND, Calif. — Dave Kingman pulled his disappearing tricks again.

He made the first pitch thrown to him Wednesday vanish over the left-center-field fence for his third grand slam of the season and major league-leading 19th homer in the Oakland Athletics' 8-1 romp over the Kansas City Royals.

Then, he fled the ballpark without a word after popping up in the eighth inning.

Oakland Manager Jackie Moore wasn't in a celebratory mood, either, despite the team's second victory in three games against the Royals.

He announced that he was reversing his first important decision since taking over the club a month ago and sending pitcher Chris Codiroli to the A's Tacoma farm club in the Pacific Coast League.

Codiroli, who became a starter under Moore, was blasted in Tuesday night's loss and left with a 1-3 record and an 8.57 earned run average. Left-hander Curt Young, 6-4 at Tacoma with a 3.78 ERA, will join the A's on Friday and start his first game next week.

"This is what (Codiroli) needs and what the ballclub needs," Moore said. "We just want him to get his stuff together. We've got to shift the load to some of the other pitchers. We just can't compete with a three-man rotation."

The only reliable starters for the A's have been Ray Burris, 6-3, Steve McCatty, 4-5, and Bill Krueger, 5-2.

Krueger pitched out of several jams against the Royals on Wednesday, picking up the victory by scattering eight hits in 7½ innings before getting help from ace reliever Bill Caudill.

"I wasn't too cute," Krueger said. "When you have a four-run lead in the first inning, it's easier. That's a real blessing for a pitcher."

Kingman, who leads all active players with 14 grand slams, tied Joe DiMaggio for 30th on the career home run list at 361 with his towering blast off loser Mark Gubicza in the first inning.

Gubicza, 3-7, was in trouble from the start as Rickey Henderson led off with a single, Dwayne Murphy walked and Davey Lopes hit an infield single to load the bases.

Kingman's grand slam tied him with Gil Hodges for seventh place on the all-time list and left him two shy of the record for slams in a season held by Jim Gentile in the American League and Ernie Banks in the National.

The A's made it 6-1 in the third. Carney Lansford, who doubled in the first after Kingman's homer, led off the third with a single, took third on Mike Davis' double and scored when he slid under a high throw home on Garry Hancock's chopper to first. Jim Essian's sacrifice fly scored Davis.

The A's added two more runs in the sixth off Mike Jones on walks to Henderson and Murphy, a run-scoring double by Lopes and a sacrifice fly by Davis.

Caudill put down a two-out, bases-loaded threat in the eighth when he came in and struck out Don Slaught, then held the Royals hitless in the ninth with two more strikeouts.

Olympic spotlight dims for 2 stars

The Soviet-led boycott of the 1984 Los Angeles Summer Games hit all American Olympic athletes hard. After staying home in 1980 because of the boycott of the Moscow Games, the U.S. team was looking forward to showing off its talents to the world on their own turf.

Now that dream is gone — dashed by the specter of politics that have cast a shadow over the spirit of the Olympics.

Despite that disappointment, the show must go on for the American team. The '84 U.S. team trials have been going on all week in LA, and the team has shown they have the kind of talent to challenge the Soviet and East German teams, regardless of any boycott. Yet as in 1980, the athletes can only sit back and dream of how it would have been.

But of all the American performers, a special bit of sympathy must go out to two of this country's supreme athletes, Carl Lewis and Edwin Moses.

Lewis and Moses went into the Games as two of the world's brightest track stars who have dominated their events more than any others have in recent years. Moses, the ruler of the 400-meter hurdles, has won every race he has entered in seven years.

Meanwhile, Lewis has emerged as the greatest threat to duplicate Jesse Owens' four-gold-medal performance since Owens himself did it in 1936. Competing in the 100- and 200-meter dashes, the 400 meter relay and the long jump, Lewis has risen to the top in each event with a grace unmatched in any sport. His performances in the track events have electrified crowds all over the world and in the long jump, Lewis creeps closer to Bob Beamon's "unbeatable" world record 29 feet 2½ inch jump with every leap.

Moses and Lewis look to be shoe-ins to claim the gold medals in their respective events in lieu of the boycott. But the glitter of these honors will be tarnished by the absence of the top competitors.

Track fans should feel robbed of the chance to see two greats going against the top competition. Moses holds a world record in his event and has felt the sensation of claiming a gold medal before, during the 1976 Games in Montreal. Yet the fame he has deserved throughout his career threatens to escape him once again.

Lewis, although still young, has trained four years to achieve a greatness no athlete has attained in nearly 50 years in Olympic track and field competition — winning four gold medals. To reach back and try to reach that peak again in four more years would require a supreme effort.

The Games will go on in August as planned. Yet the fans and athletes have been robbed of the chance to watch two of the world's greatest athletes show their talents in competitions worthy of their stature, a chance that may never come again.

Lewis seeks 4th Olympic position

By The Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Carl Lewis, performing and dressing like someone out of this world, continues today his earthly pursuit of making the United States Olympic track and field team in four events.

Lewis hopes to equal the accomplishment of the late Jesse Owens, who won gold medals in the 1936 Games in the 100-meter and 200-meter dashes, the 400-meter relay and the long jump.

He already has earned three berths on the U.S. team. By winning the 100-meter dash in the U.S. Olympic Trials last Sunday, he made the team in that event as well as in the 400 relay. Tuesday night, he won the long jump.

His final tests come in today's semifinals and final of the 200, when the trials resume following a day off.

Lewis already has performed some superhuman efforts on the track, with a promise of more to come.

For example, in the 200, he owns the fastest time ever at sea level, 19.75 seconds, and in Tuesday's second-round heats in the trials, when he needed only to finish in the top four in his heat to advance to the semifinals, he blazed to a 19.84 victory, the fourth-fastest clocking ever.

"He planned to run the turn hard and stay relaxed in the straightaway," said Joe Douglas, head of the Santa Monica Track Club, the team for which Lewis competes. "He said he expected to run 20 flat. He was surprised that he ran that fast. He said it wasn't a difficult race for him."

Later, after coming out dressed in a black-and-bright-orange warmup suit that gave him a distinctly Spiderman look, Lewis showed he was human in the long jump.

First, he sailed a majestic 28-7, equalling his fourth-best effort ever — a distance that would stand up for his 35th consecutive victory in the event.

Then, he took one more jump, but misstepped on his approach and virtually ran through the pit. Since there was no foul, the jump was measured at 18-9½, by far the worst of any competitor in the field and perhaps the worst of his career since high school.

Now that Lewis has gotten the feel of the track and the long-jump runway during the trials in the Los Angeles Coliseum — also the site of the track and field competition for the Olympics — will he be going for records during the Games?

"That's a lot to ask him to do," said Tom Tellez, his coach, "to go through all those qualifying rounds and break records, too. He'll be running for one solid week."

First, Lewis is thinking about making the team in four events.

"That's three down," he said after winning the long jump Tuesday night.

In addition to the 200, there are three finals today — in the pole vault, the women's 400-meter intermediate hurdles and the men's 400-meter dash.

Also on the program are the first five events of the decathlon, qualifying in the men's discus, the first and second rounds of the women's 200, the first round of the women's 1,500, the first round of the men's 5,000, the semifinals of the women's 3,000 and the semifinals of the men's 3,000-meter steeplechase.

Duran retires from boxing

By The Associated Press

PANAMA CITY — Roberto Duran, whose "Hands of Stone" carried him to three world boxing championships, announced Wednesday he is retiring from the ring after being defeated last week by Tommy Hearns.

"I don't think about boxing anymore. I am thinking now about having fun, good clean fun," Duran told a news conference at the Panama City airport after a flight from Miami, Fla.

Hearns stopped Duran in the second round of their World Boxing Council super welterweight title bout Friday night in Las Vegas, Nev. In his 17 years as a professional in the ring, Duran — who is nicknamed "Manos de Piedra" or "Hands of Stone" — won 76 of 82 fights. He was successively lightweight, welterweight and junior middleweight champion.

Kansas Museum of History opens, presents record of past to public

By LORI WONG
Collegian Reporter

TOPEKA — A formal dedication ceremony in Topeka Sunday marked the grand opening of the $8 million Kansas Museum of History.

The hour-long ceremony on the plaza outside the building, was emceed by June Windscheffel, president of the Kansas State Historical Society. Approximately 1,000 people turned out to hear speakers Joseph Snell, executive director and secretary of the Kansas State Historical Society; Lt. Gov. Tom Docking; and guest speaker Gerald George, director of the American Association for State and Local History.

Sunday's formal dedication ceremony was preceded by activities which began on Friday with a barbecue and live music by the Scrapwood String Band and Cloggers and the B.J. and the Red River Special Band, both from Topeka.

Activities on Saturday included the music of seven bands; craft demonstrations such as quilting, spinning and wood-carving; and outdoor living history and agricultural demonstrations including blacksmithing, sheepshearing and horsepower demonstrations.

Speakers on Saturday included Gov. and Mrs. John Carlin and Gordon Jump, a native Topekan who is best known for his role as Arthur Carlson in the television series "WKRP in Cincinnati."

"Here we are dedicating the Kansas Museum of History. We're really just starting because there are such wonderful future plans for it. We're the only recent new museum to open," Windscheffel said as she opened the formal dedication ceremony.

John Zwierzyne, curator of technology, said that the success of the dedication activities was due to the intense planning, which began in January, and the weather.

"The weather has been great, especially today. The only bad thing was the rain we got earlier in the weekend," Zwierzyne said.

"We had planted some oats in the back behind the building for use in a demonstration, but it was too wet for the horses to get out there yesterday. It wasn't too bad. We just spread some hay on the ground and that kept everything from getting too muddy," Zwierzyne said.

"Today's event will go down as a significant event in Kansas history," Docking said. "It represents the culmination of literally years of time and effort on the behalf of hundreds of people. It serves, perhaps in the greatest sense, as an educational opportunity for the people of Kansas."

The 90,000-square-foot museum is operation.

The security division of the museum includes systems which monitor the possibility of theft, fire, other disasters and the possibility of damage to the artifacts caused by temperature and humidity changes. Along with these monitoring systems, Capitol Area Security officers are stationed at the museum 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

The staff in the exhibits division designs, develops, installs and maintains the exhibits at the museum. Designers, a photographer, technicians and carpenters make up this division.

The conservation division is responsible for examining and treating, if necessary, all artifacts for the museum. There are three labs used by the conservation division: the decorative arts lab, a textile lab and a wooden objects lab.

Each artifact in the museum is identified by an accession number. The registration division is responsible for keeping all artifact records, including locations, photographs and accession records which give the museum legal title to any donations.

The curatorial and research division is made up of research historians and three curators. The research historians are responsible for researching and writing scripts used in exhibits. They also respond to any requests for Kansas history information. The curators care for, store and research the artifacts.

The public research division of the museum was developed to help those interested in researching their own property, pieces in the museum's collection or other museum-related topics. With advance notice, publications and microfilm on material culture can be made available.

The division of education offers guided tours, outreach programs, workshops, film series and other activities. This division acts as the situated on an 81-acre piece of land which runs adjacent to a branch of the Oregon Trail near Smith's Crossing on the Kansas River. A sculptured white marble buffalo in a reflecting pool stands guard at the right of the museum entrance. The sculpture, named "The Great White Buffalo" was made by Italian artist Lumen Martin Winter.

The museum contains three main sections: special exhibits, the main gallery and the collection storage area. Besides these sections, there are eight smaller sections of the museum for reception, security, the exhibits division, the conservation center, the registration division, the curatorial and research divisions, the public research area and the division of education.

NASA prepares Discovery for first mission

By The Associated Press

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — Launch preparations proceeded flawlessly Sunday as NASA studied the skies and readied the shuttle Discovery for its first flight — a seven-day mission that will test a paper-thin solar sail and produce a secret drug for eventual use by humans.

Liftoff at Kennedy Space Center was scheduled for today at 9:43 a.m. CDT.

"The crew is ready, the cargo is ready and the only concern is with the weather," said Jesse Moore, acting director of the shuttle program.

Air Force Capt. Art Thomas, the shuttle weather officer, said that if a rainstorm developed later Sunday, the moisture could create unacceptable fog and cloud conditions this morning. But he said "we're very optimistic."

Before going out of a planned 8-hour hold period Sunday, inspectors found some cracks in the eggshell-like coating on the shuttle's vertical stabilizers. Pad workers repaired them by brushing on new coating. The countdown resumed on time.

Discovery's crew went to bed early, expecting a 5:30 a.m. (CDT) wake-up call.

In late afternoon Sunday, forecasters said there was only one chance in five that weather would prevent a launch.

A nagging worry was storm activity 150 miles offshore where Discovery's booster rockets parachute into the sea after liftoff. NASA not only dislikes launching or landing in rain, it doesn't want to lose the reusable boosters.

Discovery is the third ship in America's space shuttle fleet. Columbia is being modernized on the shuttle's California assembly line, and Challenger is being readied for its next flight in October.

The new shuttle has a flexible, insulating blanket that replaces 6,000 of its predecessors' 30,000 heat-resistant tiles. The blanket — less expensive and easier to attach than the tiles — shaves 5,000 pounds of flight weight.

A crew of six will be aboard for Discovery's 112 orbits. Among them are Judy Resnik, the second American woman to fly on an American spacecraft, and Steve Hawley, husband of the first, Sally Ride.

For the first time in 23 years of manned space flight, NASA is carrying along a commercial passenger. Charles Walker, a 35-year-old engineer for the McDonnell Douglas Corp., will operate equipment he designed to manufacture pure drugs in microgravity. His firm paid $80,000 for his mission training, but the flight is free.

Resnik, 35, holds a doctorate in electrical engineering. She is primarily responsible on the flight for checking out the ship's new robot crane and for extending and reeling in a 102-foot high solar array.

The array, which will resemble a sail or a wing when unfurled, is made of material the thickness of photographic film. This version is a prototype; on a space station, an array this size — but with more solar panels attached — could convert energy from the sun into enough electricity for three homes.

Collapsed, it is only seven inches thick.

All that McDonnell Douglas will say about its drug process is that the product is a hormone extracted from protein which will be tested later this summer on animals. The purity is achieved by electrophoresis, a

Fort Riley staff to sift evidence of soldier's claim to sweepstake

By BOB KAPITAN
Collegian Reporter

Today Fort Riley officials will try to determine if Staff Sgt. Rochester Townsend can produce evidence which will support his claim that he is one of three winners in the American Family Publishers Multi-Million Dollar Sweepstakes.

Townsend was scheduled to take part in a press conference 11:30 a.m. Friday at Fort Riley. At 12:15 p.m., a staff member from the Fort Riley Public Affairs Office announced that Townsend had called and said he had decided not to appear on advice from his attorney.

During a telephone interview with a Collegian reporter on Friday, a spokesman for American Family Publishers, who identified himself only as Mr. Wright, denied that Townsend was one of three announced on the "Tonight Show," June 15.

"He wasn't a winner of our contest...that much I can tell you," said Wright, a consumer service representative for the Chicago-based publishing house.

The spokesman said he could not reveal the winners' names over the phone, but the names are available upon written request.

"We haven't been able to sort it out," Maj. Troy Griffin said during a telephone interview Sunday. "We really don't know what the story is."

Griffin, public affairs officer at Fort Riley, said Townsend was unable to produce the evidence which was originally shown to Spec. 4 Phil Prater who wrote an article about Townsend's sweepstakes win claim that appeared in The Ft. Riley Post Friday. Prater said he was unable to get a copy of the registered letter Townsend had shown him during the interview.

Griffin said Townsend was told to bring his evidence on Monday in order to begin sorting things out.

Questions were raised during Friday's press conference about the legality of the procedures Townsend said he followed to win the sweepstakes.

Prater's article said Townsend had been "playing the sweepstakes drawings for the past seven years" and quoted Townsend as saying, "I would pick the wrong numbers or lacked the correct sequence — but I kept sending the forms in...I picked seven out of nine numbers correct for $1 million."

According to Prater's article, "after winning the big bucks, the sweepstakes sent him (Townsend) another certificate to pick a winning combination of the two remaining numbers."

Awarding of a cash prize on the basis of a selection of random numbers when an entry fee or purchase is required constitutes a lottery which is illegal under Kansas law. However, military personnel are not necessarily residents of the state in which they are stationed, Griffin said.

Iraqi planes attack 4 naval targets, tighten blockade on Iranian ports

By The Associated Press

Iraq said its jetfighters raided four big targets south of Iran's Kharg Island oil terminal Sunday, breaking a two-week hiatus in naval attacks in the Persian Gulf.

The Iraqi planes performed "courageous raids on four big naval targets" and "returned safely to base after scoring direct and effective hits," according to a war communique read over the state radio in Baghdad. It didn't specify the nationality or the type of targets.

But a Greek Merchant Marine Ministry spokesman in Athens said an Iraqi missile had struck the Greek-registered supertanker Alexander the Great on Sunday, as the ship headed for Dubai.

The spokesman, who declined to be identified, said he did not know the extent of the damage to the vessel, which was loaded with oil.

Iraq's daily war communique made no mention of the attack, saying only that 43 Iraqi troops were killed Saturday, mainly in the northern front in Iraqi Kurdistan.

Meanwhile, Iraqi gunners shelled Iranian positions across their 733-mile common border, killing an "enemy soldier," according to the Iraqi communique, which reports on daily combat action in the 45-month-old war.

The air attack, the communique said, was in "fulfillment of Iraq's determination to tighten the total blockade imposed on Kharg island and other Iranian ports in the gulf."

The attack brings to 40 the number of Iranian, Arab and foreign ships crippled by the four-month Iraqi sea blockade imposed on Iranian ports, according to figures released by the Iraqis.

Iraq has attacked dozens of ships in its efforts to shut off the oil revenue Iran is using to finance its effort in the war between the two nations. Iran has been accused of striking several ships near Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, apparently in retaliation for the Iraqi raids. Iran has denied the accusations.

Sunday's communique said that Iraq "will continue the strikes (against ships trying to approach Iranian ports) as long as the rulers of Tehran (the Iranian capital) insist on aggression."

The Iraqis crippled the Turkish tanker Buyuk Hun near Kharg on June 3, and the Iranians retaliated with an attack June 10 on the Kuwaiti tanker Kazima, east of the Strait of Hormuz.

U.N. Secretary-General Javier Perez de Cuellar recently mediated a moratorium on civilian shelling between the two belligerents, but the two sides' daily communiqués indicate continued fighting along the border.

In Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, military chiefs of six Arabic gulf nations wound up secret deliberations on a combined defense strategy against spillovers from the Iraq-Iran war.

The results of the meeting were not disclosed. But the military chiefs of the Saudi Arabian-led Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC), a regional defense alliance, apparently devised plans to establish a combined high command and joint forces for the defense of the region's waterways and hinterlands, Arab diplomatic sources said.

The GCC members are Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, the United Arab Emirates, Bahrain, Qatar and Oman.

Campus leash laws limit pets, owners

By KEM ARST
Collegian Reporter

Pet owners, leaving their animals outside campus buildings while attending class, should reconsider before making campus a regular sitting ground for their pets. There has been a campus leash law for quite some time and it's enforced all year round.

"The current leash law clearly states that all animals on campus must be on a leash," said Art Stone, director of K-State Police. "They are not allowed in any campus building, and cannot be tied to trees, posts or left unattended. This law is in accordance with University rules and regulations."

Stone said the problem with tying dogs to posts is that most posts are located by sidewalks and if a person is frightened of an animal, regardless of how harmless the animal might be, the individual's fear can cause problems.

The Animal Control Center, which is operated by the campus police, receive reports or complaints about stray animals on campus or animals left unattended by their owners, and according to Elizabeth Edwards, an animal control officer, animals are then taken directly to the small animal ward at the Veterinary Medicine Complex.

Alberta Parker, supervisor of the small animal wards, said after an animal is brought to them they have a limited number of options.

"If an animal comes in with tags we try to contact the owner as soon as possible," Parker said. "If the animal doesn't have tags but looks like it has been well cared for, every attempt is made to find the owner."

"The standard process for all animals picked up, is they are held for three days. After this time they are eligible for adoption. The adoption fee is $15 and this covers shots and necessary papers," she said.

Stray animals are kept in separate wards and are fed the same food given to the animals whose owners bring their pets in for vet services, Parker said. She also said they are placed in an exercise run every day.

When owners claim their pets, they must pay a boarding charge based on the weight of the animal. The fee is $7 a day for an animal weighing up to 40 pounds and $9 a day for those over 40 pounds, Parker said.

Stone said that fee is usually the extent of the matter but in extreme cases other measures are taken.

"Traffic and control does not fine the individual," Stone said. "The only action we can take toward repeating offenders is administrative action, but this has only happened on rare occasions.

Dr. J.R. Coffman, head of surgery and medicine at the Veterinary Complex, said picking up stray animals on campus is a community service.

"This service takes up a fair amount of our time and resources, but it is a necessary public service, not only to the University, but to the community as a whole," Coffman said.

"When every step has been taken and we cannot find a home (for the animal), the animal goes through a euthanasia process where it is intravenously injected with a combination of drugs which cause a painless, instantaneous death," Coffman said.

Parker said that having to put an animal to sleep is unfortunate and everything is done to avoid that process.

"We have the facilities to hold around 20 animals at full capacity and depending on space and time available to care for the animals, we will hold them as long as we can, but in some cases we do have to terminate the animals," Parker said.

"We work with the Manhattan Animal Shelter and the adoption hotline. Adoption is open to everyone. Our main goal is to find homes for the animals," she said.

Missouri River equals former flood record

By The Associated Press

WAVERLY, Mo. — Cresting Missouri River waters equalled the 33-year-old flood stage record at Waverly in northwest Missouri Sunday as the river surged nearly 100 miles, exerting pressure on levees and threatening to flood anew, authorities said.

The river was cresting from Waverly to Boonville, a distance of 96 miles, said Army Corps of Engineers spokesman Bob McBee in Kansas City.

"It means there's a lot of water out there and those levees are getting a lot of pushing," McBee said.

Waverly's flood stage record was set in 1951, when the flood stage of 20 feet hit 28.9 feet, the mark the river matched Sunday morning, McBee said.

Meanwhile, barge traffic has been halted for two weeks on the Missouri River and its tributaries. Corps officials say it will be at least another week before navigation can be safely resumed.

The cresting waters Sunday came from the same two weeks of rain and flooding that caused tens of millions of dollars worth of damage along both sides of the Missouri River, the dividing line of Kansas and Missouri.

McBee said the flooding occurred because farm levees failed when there was no way to control river runoff.

The Corps had 121,000 sandbags in place, in addition to local efforts, from Rulo, Neb., to not quite as far as Waverly, McBee said.

In Levasy, about 37 miles west of Waverly, the more than half of the area's 280 residents who left will not be able to return to their homes for a few more days, said Jackson County Deputy Sheriff Harry Hunt. Flooding hit there Friday.

Fourteen homes were reported in several feet of water, and several roads were flooded.

Hunt said officers were patrolling in three boats, preventing any problem of looting. "It's too small a town. We can see anybody coming in," Hunt said.

Residents needed boats to reach their waterlogged homes. Some said water stood at 14 feet near the levee break.

Steve Birkes rowed past his barely visible picket fence and past his submerged 1959 MG. He tethered his boat to the back porch, then went inside to survey the damage.

"It doesn't do me a lot of good to worry about it, does it?" Birkes said. "The floors needed refinishing anyway."

In Grand Pass, just east of Waverly, a privately owned levee broke along a 50 to 100 foot stretch, sending 50 residents fleeing from their homes Saturday.

Nearly the entire community gathered at Route T in Saline County to watch the water pore through the breach of the levee protecting 10,000 acres of farmland. Water was 30 inches deep in some areas.

In Platte County, about 360 families from Tracy, Bean Lake and Weston still could not return home, said Doreen Draper, director of communications for the Platte County Sheriff's Department.

The Platte River at Tracy had dropped two feet since Thursday, but the Missouri River was still rising slowly at Bean Lake, she said.

Col. Jerry Uhlmann, a Missouri National Guard spokesman, said 77,000 acres of land remained under water in Holt County north of Kansas City. He said 23 guardsmen were assisting residents and a helicopter was being used to feed 750 hogs, 50 head of cattle and 50 sheep.

Mondale seeks possible running mate

By The Associated Press

NORTH OAKS, Minn. — This community's "quiet, country living on the city's edge," as a condominium brochure calls it, appeared threatened when Walter F. Mondale returned home, proclaiming himself the winner of the Democratic presidential nomination.

But residents say their serenity has been disturbed only slightly since their famous neighbor began interviewing possible running mates and greeting other political dignitaries at his secluded home in this private, affluent St. Paul suburb.

There has been a steady stream of traffic as Mondale, his aides, Secret Service agents and local law enforcement officials travel to and from the $200,000 house on Pleasant Lake.

Each time Mondale and his wife, Joan, greet a new guest, reporters and photographers are bused in a caravan to the edge of the former vice president's property. From there, only the family's garage is visible.

The increased traffic, neighbors say, has been the only disruption in the otherwise pastoral existence of the community of about 3,000 people. But they aren't complaining about the periodic traffic jams on Thrush Lane or anything else.

"There's been no problem whatsoever," said neighbor Kenneth Awe.

"His stay has not disrupted the village one bit," said Robert Winship, a City Council member.

The Mondales' wood and brick home on Thrush Lane sits in a low-lying area surrounded by trees.

Built on two levels, it has four bedrooms.

Before buying it 16 months ago, the Mondales had a home in the nation's capital. They used the home of Joan Mondale's parents in Afton as their Minnesota voting address.

North Oaks has long had a reputation for protecting its residents' privacy. At one time, residents and visitors had to pass a gatehouse checkpoint at the tree-studded development's main entrance.

While the gatehouse no longer is used, signs inform non-residents that the rustic, 5,000-acre community is private property. Interlopers who refuse to leave when asked may be arrested for trespassing.

Community residents seem to be as protective of Mondale's privacy as they are of their own.

"I don't think the people of North Oaks are making a big point to peek and see what's going on" at the Mondale residence, said Winship.

The apparent lack of curiosity about the political goings-on on Thrush Lane is not caused by a lack of interest in politics, however. In 1980, 87.5 percent of North Oaks' eligible voters cast ballots. The Carter-Mondale ticket drew 338 votes; Reagan-Bush, 1,249.

Ramsey County Sheriff Charles Zacharias, whose officers are providing 24-hour backup for the Secret Service, said late last week that sightseers had not poured into the exclusive residential area.

"The locals know interlopers," he said. "Sure, there have been a few sightseers, but they've been asked to leave."

Zacharias said people who enter the development uninvited are not trespassers under state law unless they are asked to leave and refuse to do so. "There have been no arrests," he said.

Development at North Oaks began in 1948, on land purchased in 1883 by James J. Hill, founder of the Great Northern Railroad. It had been used as an experimental farm or preserved in its natural state.

The development, planned by Hare and Hare landscape architects of Kansas City, Mo., now includes about 600 single-family homes, a golf course, tennis courts, a country club and large open areas. A private association of homeowners owns the streets and open areas, and thus can restrict access to the community.

Zacharias said North Oaks' winding streets also dissuade sightseers from trying to locate the Mondale home.

If North Oaks residents have a complaint about their city's sudden thrust into the limelight, it is that they feel they are being portrayed as snobs.

"I always heard these stories about North Oaks" before moving there, said resident Jean LeVander

King, daughter of former Republican Gov. Harold LeVander and aide to former Republican Gov. Al Quie. "But it's not like what I heard. We're laid back, the feeling is not to keep up with the Joneses. North Oaks doesn't really deserve the reputation it's gotten for being a retreat or something."

Barbara Christensen, whose husband, Jim, is developing the first condominiums within North Oaks' boundaries, said the area "reminds me of a small town."

"People feel more secure because they know only people who live here, or who are invited, should be here," she said. "We wouldn't want a Plains, Ga., with traffic going through all the time. That would be discouraged."

Increasing nuclear club poses danger

The specter of nuclear war has taken a step forward with the revelation that Pakistan has the capability of producing nuclear weapons. Thursday, Sen. Alan Cranston, D-Calif., raised the question of Pakistan's nuclear capacity during a congressional hearing for approval of a nuclear cooperation agreement between the United States and China.

It has long been suspected that China and Pakistan have held a nuclear connection, and using information from Defense Department documents, Cranston has significant information to support his claim.

With this news it appears China has invited another country into the ever-growing global nuclear club. As the membership of this club continues to grow, the nuclear situation becomes more volatile as more countries hold the capability to start the unthinkable war.

Pakistan's new capability brings another possible scenario to the nuclear picture. Instead of World War III initiated by a conflict between superpowers, the possibility now exists that a nuclear encounter could be executed by smaller, less powerful nations.

It is a generally accepted fact that, with the help of the United States, Israel has the capacity to produce nuclear weapons and several other Middle East nations may also have nuclear weapons ability. In a region as unstable as the Middle East, nuclear weapons entering this picture poses a dangerous situation.

Pakistan's capability also is potentially volatile as India and Pakistan continue their ongoing dispute. The neighboring nations have remained in a hostile posture for some time and now this dispute appears to have been elevated. As India also is a member of the nuclear weapons club, the possibility of nuclear war in Asia has grown considerably.

When speaking of arms control talks, consideration should be given to the other members of the nuclear club. While the United States and the Soviet Union are, by far, the most powerful members of this club and are the most visible countries in conflict with each other, smaller countries such as India and Pakistan also need close watch.

The United States is considering diplomatic inquiry into Pakistan's capabilities. If America gets positive confirmation of Pakistan's ability, U.S. officials should do everything in their power to limit that country's power. Nuclear weapons proliferation has already overstepped the boundaries of sanity. To include smaller countries in this picture would only add to the madness.

Drinking age issue continues to haunt Kansans

BURLINGTON — It's a monster which won't quit rearing its ugly head.

Raising the drinking age has been haunting Kansans for several years. The latest attempt was narrowly defeated in the Kansas Legislature this spring. The House of Representatives passed the proposal, but the proposal died without being brought to a vote in the Senate.

Lobbying efforts by students, especially the Associated Students of Kansas, kept the state's drinking age for 3.2 beer at 18, many legislators noted.

Statistics by both sides of the drinking age controversy proved little, if anything. For every study or proposal cited by one side, the other side came up with contradictory studies or proposals.

Now the federal government, in its infinite dumbness, has decided to enter the fray.

There are 29 states which don't have 21 as their minimum legal drinking age. Congress has decided that these states have had enough time to raise the drinking age on their own.

Under pressure from Mothers Against Drunk Drivers (MADD), the U.S. House of Representatives voted to cut off federal highway funds to states which don't have a minimum drinking age of 21. The Senate is expected to vote on this bill this week.

Notice how the proposal was brought up after the spring semester, after many college students go home and student organizations such as ASK lose members.

The proposal, if it becomes law, will serve as another monumental injustice to states. The federal government will be blackmailing states to "conform or else" mentality. Millions of dollars in highway money would be withheld from states which refuse to join the "21 club." Since states need the money, paid from taxes withheld from you and me, they will probably conform, giving up another right the federal government should leave alone.

Does this sound familiar? It should. This is the same way the federal government forced the states to accept the 55 mph speed limit.

President Reagan has given Americans the "Curley Shuffle" on the proposal. In May, Reagan said it was up to the states to determine the age for drinking. Now, as election time approaches, he has stated he is in favor of the proposal.

Secretary of Transportation Elizabeth Dole has also supported the measure. Dole is the wife of Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan., chairman of the Senate Finance Committee.

In lobbying for the proposal, MADD has cited a report which said 5,000 teenagers were killed by drunken drivers last year. Emotional appeals, such as "What if it was your child who was killed by a drunken driver?" are also used by the group.

I'm not knocking MADD. It has served an important purpose in making laws tougher on driving under the influence (DUI) and has provided valuable educational services to schools and community organizations. I just don't like the way MADD is going about its mission.

Yes, teen-agers are often guilty of abusing alcohol. And, no doubt, there are many tragic stories of teen-agers killed by drunken drivers. It would be ignorant of anyone to deny that the deaths of 5,000 teen-agers isn't significant.

Yet I must question the premise.

Were these 5,000 teen-agers killed by teen-agers who were driving while intoxicated? The figures don't say. Will raising the drinking age do any good when most people learn their drinking habits at home? Probably not. Is it worth undermining the rights of states on such an important issue? I think not.

This is the third column I've written this year on this subject. The subject is important to me. To quiet the skeptics, I'm 22. Raising the drinking age to 21 won't affect me. In fact, I don't drink. It's a personal choice, made after several hundreds of hours of thought and observations.

I don't object to others drinking. I've seen some responsible drinking by 18-year-olds. I've also seen irresponsible drinking by some people more than 21 years old. Raising the drinking age to 21 won't help these people.

I've also encountered my share of drunken drivers. The dateline on this column is Burlington, because I just encountered a drunken driver on Friday night, June 15. He was about 30 years old. He came up from behind me. I didn't know he was drunk until he passed me and couldn't get his truck back in the lane. He was traveling faster than the speed limit and swerving all over the road.

I used my CB to call for help. A truck driver at a truck stop called the Highway Patrol. I don't know if he was arrested, but I didn't see him on the road again.

The key to solving the problem is education. Educating the public — especially students — about alcohol, the problems it causes and the laws regarding alcohol will solve more problems than anything.

Student organizations are actively promoting the prevention of alcohol abuse. Students Against Driving Drunk (SADD) is a group which is active in high schools. SADD promotes contracts between students and parents which allow a student to "play E.T." — phone home — when they are too intoxicated to drive. The parents agree to pick up the student and take him home, without questioning or hassling the student.

The parents and student agree to discuss the situation at a later time, when all involved can sit down and talk about the incident with clear heads.

SADD has also promoted education about alcohol and its effects, DUI laws and alcoholism.

On college campuses, a group known as Boost Alcohol Consciousness Concerning the Health of University Students (BACCHUS) is working to promote education about the effects of alcohol and creative non-alcoholic beverages. K-State has a chapter of BACCHUS. Ask Brett Lambert, ASK campus director, or anyone in the Student Governing Association office, for details.

I've noticed many students are now partying in groups. One person is designated, or volunteers, to remain sober, so the group will have a safe ride home. The idea is worthwhile and should continue to be encouraged and practiced.

Enforcing current DUI laws will also help solve the problem. As soon as everyone realizes DUI spells jail term, fine and loss of license, there won't be a problem.

Kansas' DUI law also provides for alcohol education, which is also important in solving the problem.

MADD should be congratulated for bringing the problem to the nation's attention. It should also realize that letting the federal government mandate drinking won't work. It didn't work with Prohibition. It won't work now.

Quality of high school classes needs study

Editor,

As I read Lynn Talpers' report on credit requirements at Manhattan High School (Wednesday's Collegian) several questions and comments came to mind. First, the quote from Superintendent of Schools James Benjamin, wherein he states, "When I get calls from universities asking for increased high school requirements, I tell them to increase college requirements." If he is implying that university entrance requirements be increased, he must not realize that at most universities, entrance requirements are not based on the particular courses which a student is required to take in high school, but on ACT or SAT scores and receipt of a diploma or GED. The requirements which a student must meet in order to enter a particular curriculum are based upon the courses taken in high school, and far too often students do not have the classes they need. Even though the courses may have been available, the students didn't realize that they would be required in college, because they were not required in high school. Students must spend extra time (and money) taking these courses in college, when they could have taken them in high school. So it appears to me that high school, not college, requirements should be stiffened.

I also question Benjamin's statement that the average high school student spends 37,000 hours in the classroom. Ah, let's see...four years of high school times 180 days per year times six hours per day...by my trusty TI that comes out to 4,320 hours! Pity Benjamin's students, who will finally graduate from high school at age 48 after 34 years of diligent studying.

On a more serious note, it seems odd that in today's technically oriented world, students are graduating from high school with only 360 of their 4,320 hours — 8 percent — consisting of science credits and an equal amount in mathematics. Meanwhile, 1,440 hours, a full one-third of the hours available, may be used for elective classes. Granted, electives are nice, but far too many students misuse them, taking classes to avoid homework or to bring up GPAs. This often results in students graduating with great GPAs but insufficient educations.

The Board of Education has taken a step in the right direction, but it's time we started looking at the quality and distribution of classes required in high school, not just the number of credit hours.

Jardine drivers bring danger

Editor,

The Jardine roads on the K-State campus are becoming dangerous due to the drivers who are often driving over 40 mph on these roads. These drivers are not bothered by how deadly (deathly) their vehicles can suddenly prove to be, especially for the numerous children playing outside during these summer months. The drivers should realize that these are not interstate highways.

The situation is quite serious particularly because cars are parked on both sides of the roads and the children suddenly pop out on the roads from behind the cars. The only way to avoid accidents is to drive at the reasonable speed of 15 to 20 mph. Since the method of appealing to the residents/drivers to abide by the rules does not work, it is best to provide the speed-breakers at close intervals on all the Jardine roads so that people are forced to drive slowly. The expenses incurred may be worth all that even if one accident could be avoided. I urge the authorities to seriously think over this and not to delay their judgment past this summer.

It may be said that this problem is not unique to Jardine Terrace roads and I fully agree. But the number of children playing out there is far more numerous at Jardine Terrace than anywhere in Manhattan.

Frequent patrolling by traffic police officers to restrain drivers may not necessarily help solve this problem since accidents don't necessarily happen when the police are around.

I am not the only parent concerned about this problem. I am sure others share the same feelings. I strongly feel that the only solution to this problem is speed breaks (bumps) on the Jardine roads. Once again I urge the concerned authorities to consider this matter seriously.

Royalty pays visit to Maryland

ST. MARY'S CITY, Md. — A celebration of Maryland's 350th anniversary received the royal treatment as the Duke and Duchess of Kent joined in the festivities at the 17th century state capital.

"Lord Baltimore said it is easier to taste than to leave the fruits of Maryland," said the Duke of Kent. "My wife and I have indeed tasted the fruits of Maryland in the last three days."

The 48-year-old duke, a cousin of Queen Elizabeth and 15th in line for the British throne, presented Gov. Harry Hughes with a copy of Maryland's 1632 charter.

Gatlin contracts type A hepatitis

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — Country music singer Larry Gatlin has a mild case of hepatitis which will curtail his activities for two to three weeks.

Gatlin, 36, said in an interview Saturday from his bed at Southern Hills Hospital that he expects to be discharged Monday or Tuesday. He entered the hospital Wednesday and was forced to cancel a White House appearance Thursday with his two brothers.

The Odessa, Texas, native has viral type A hepatitis, the milder of the two types of the liver disease, he said.

Gatlin got the disease from eating some shellfish, said hospital spokeswoman Amy Harshman. He was in stable condition.

One-time Playboy official marries

ALBURY, England — Victor Lownes, onetime head of the U.S. Playboy casino group in Britain, has married his 34-year-old girlfriend, Marilyn Cole.

"After living in sin for 12 years, it's nice to do the proper thing," Lownes, 36, said as the couple left the village church near their mansion north of London where "bunnies" — female employees — once trained for the casinos.

Lownes was fired as Playboy chief in April 1981 amid police inquiries into allegations the casinos illegally gave gamblers credit.

Women plan historic canoe trip

KALAMAZOO, Mich. — Two Kalamazoo women plan to paddle canoes into the headwaters of the Missouri River on July 4 and duplicate part of the historic exploration of Meriwether Lewis and William Clark.

If they are successful, Mary Schmidt, 26, and Beverly Feldpausch Gordon, 31, said they will be the first solo women's canoe team to make part of the return trip from the Pacific Ocean to St. Louis the two explorers made 182 years ago.

Bob Pulford, Manhattan, prepares to return an opponent's lob shot during the mixed doubles finals match in the Manhattan Closed Tennis Tournament at City Park Sunday afternoon. Pulford teamed with Mary Brownback to win the mixed doubles division, beating Jan Gembol and Brad Shores, 6-2, 6-3.

Local tourney attracts 50 players

Fifty participants in the Manhattan Closed Tennis Tournament battled it out Sunday to see who's best in Manhattan tennis.

The final match of the day, in the men's singles division, was narrowed down to two K-State alumni, Dexter Bohn and David Hoover. After two sets, Hoover came out the victor, 6-4, 6-3.

Hoover, who uses a serve called the "American Twist," said Bohn had trouble returning his serve.

"Bohn's a good player," Hoover said. "He just had trouble with my serve."

Bohn made his way to the finals after defeating Tim Jankovich, a former K-State basketball player, in the semifinals in a 4-6, 7-5, 6-3 match.

Bohn, who played on the K-State tennis team in the fall of 1982, won the Aggie Station Tennis Tournament last week. Hoover was also on the K-State tennis team from 1967 to 1971.

Hoover teamed up with Tom Ball in the men's doubles competition and won, 6-4, 6-4, over David McCullough and Darrin Wallace.

Mary Spooner, currently five months pregnant, was the winner of the women's class 35 singles, 6-0, 6-0, over Jo Richards.

Spooner also competed in the women's doubles with team member Lynn Feltner and came in second behind Jan Gembol and Pat Hostetler who won, 6-4, 3-6, 6-4.

In the boys' 18 and under division Daren Baugher won, 7-5, 6-1, over Ned Seaton.

Sunday's tournament was sponsored by the Manhattan Parks and Recreation department.

K-Stater gains Games spot; Lytle bests personal record

In 1972, Jerome Howe competed in the Munich Olympics in the steeplechase — the last K-State track performer to make the United States Olympic squad.

Now it's Doug Lytle's turn.

Lytle, a K-State senior, placed second in the U.S. Olympic Trials pole vault competition in Los Angeles Thursday to earn a spot on the American squad, turning in a personal-best leap of 18-8 1/2, in the process.

Lytle finished behind former world-record holder Mike Tully, who became only the third American to jump over 19 feet, clearing the bar at 19-7 1/2, to win the competition. Earl Bell was the third American to earn a berth on the pole vaulting team, clearing a height of 18-4 1/2.

For Lytle, making the Olympic team was the latest in a series of triumphs in his pole vaulting career. Lytle, a redshirt performer in 1984 for the K-State track team, is a four-time all-American performer and holds the K-State school pole vault record, clearing 18-0 at the Texas Invitational in 1983. In addition, Lytle won the 1983 NCAA Indoor Championships, clearing a height of 17-9 1/2.

In earning a spot on the U.S. team, Lytle overcame some of the country's top pole vaulters. The competition started out with vaulter Bell, formerly of Arkansas State, clearing a height of 18-4 on his first try. Brad Pursley of Abilene Christian, Dave Kenworthy of USC and Joe Dial of Oklahoma State cleared the height on their second tries while Tully and Lytle were successful on their third attempts.

Moving the bar to 18-8 1/2, Lytle made his first attempt to take the lead while Bell and Tully cleared the height on their third tries to move to the next round.

The bar was then changed to an American-record height of 19- 1/2, with Tully clearing on the first try. Lytle missed his first two attempts, then attempted a world-record leap of 19-3 1/2. He missed at that height but still finished ahead of Bell to gain the second spot on the U.S. team.

With that effort, Lytle, a Merriam resident, becomes the fifth K-State track performer to compete in the Olympics. He joins Howe, Conrad Nightingale, who competed in 1968, Thane Baker who was a 1956 Olympian, and Ray Watson, who competed in the 1920, 1924 and 1928 Games.

McEnroe set to defend title

By The Associated Press

WIMBLEDON, England — John McEnroe, attempting to become the first American since Don Budge in 1938 to successfully defend his men's singles title, kicks off the 1984 Wimbledon tennis championships Monday when he faces Paul McNamee of Australia.

The talented and tempestuous left-hander from New York is a heavy favorite to reach the final on the grass courts here for the fifth consecutive year and grab his third crown.

The defending women's champion, Martina Navratilova, is even more heavily favored to capture her third consecutive Wimbledon and her fifth straight Grand Slam singles title. She is not expected to see her first action until Tuesday.

Both McEnroe and Navratilova are battling not only their opponents at the All-England Lawn Tennis Club, but also the London newspapers.

The tabloid Sunday Mirror headlined its story on McEnroe: "Throw him out," a sentiment that nearly every London newspaper expressed in Sunday's editions.

Navratilova has been the subject of newspaper stories and pictures concerning her relationship with Judy Nelson, a mother of two from Fort Worth, Texas. On Saturday, after winning the singles at Eastbourne, England, Navratilova angrily left the interview room when questioned about Nelson, the wife of a veterinary surgeon.

McEnroe, who has suffered just one loss this year — in the final of the French Open to Ivan Lendl of Czechoslovakia — easily captured the Queen's Club title a week ago. Top-seeded in the 128-man field, McEnroe will face the winner of another first-round match between Emilio Sanchez of Spain and American Rodney Harmon if he beats McNamee.

No. 2 seed Lendl also will see action Monday, taking on American Dick Stockton.

Iorg's RBI leads Royals to 3-2 win

By The Associated Press

ANAHEIM, Calif. — Pinch hitter Dane Iorg lifted a sacrifice fly in the ninth inning to give the Kansas City Royals a 3-2 victory over the California Angels Sunday.

Jorge Orta led off with a grounder to short and first baseman Ron Jackson dropped Dick Schofield's throw for an error. Orta was thrown out at second on an attempted sacrifice bunt by Butch Davis, who went to third on Steve Balboni's single. Angels starter Ron Romanick, 8-7, gave way to Doug Corbett, whose first pitch was driven to deep right by Iorg, bringing home Davis.

Bud Black, 8-5, held the Angels to four hits for eight innings, with Dan Quisenberry pitching the ninth to pick up his 19th save.

Balboni's solo homer in the fourth gave the Royals a 1-0 lead. They made it 2-0 in the fifth when Willie Wilson's infield grounder scored Buddy Biancalana.

Black held the Angels hitless until a leadoff fifth-inning single by Brian Downing. Reggie Jackson's grounder forced Downing at second but a single by Bobby Grich and Ron Jackson's double scored Jackson.

California made it 2-2 in the seventh as Downing led off with a triple and scored as Grich grounded to shortstop.

Courthouse plaza construction continues

By LYNN TALPERS
Collegian Reporter

After four years of planning, the Riley County Courthouse Plaza is now under construction.

The project is composed of three stages. Phase I includes the Riley County Office Building, the outdoor plaza and a parking lot. Phase II is the renovation of the Riley County Courthouse and the landscaping of the plaza. Phase III is the renovation of the courthouse annex.

"This is one of the few courthouses in Kansas not on a courthouse square," said G. Eric Shoultz, assistant county engineer. According to Shoultz, this is the main reason for the plaza construction.

"The plaza will give the feeling of a square from the same (architectural) period as the buildings," he said.

The Riley County Courthouse was dedicated in 1906. The old-fashioned effect will be achieved using metal park benches and globe lighting, Shoultz said.

"The plaza will be a multi-purpose area that could be used for events (such as the Downtown Fun Festival) rather than the courthouse steps," Shoultz said. "There will be places for outdoor theater and bands.

"We hope it will work in conjunction with Arts in the Park and Band Day," Shoultz said. "This will be one of the few areas in town, besides campus, that will give the appearance of an architecturally unified cluster of buildings."

All the buildings on the plaza are to be faced with limestone, similar to the courthouse.

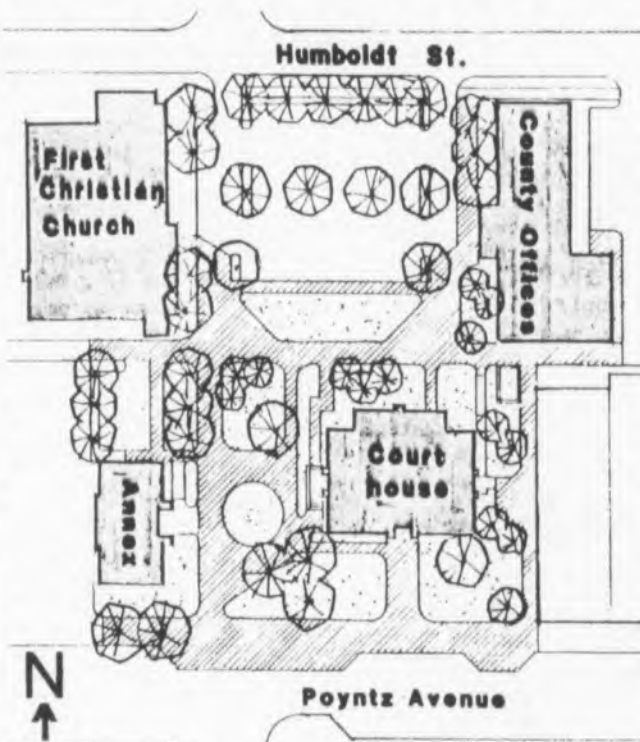

Included in Phase I is the Riley County Office Building, 110 Courthouse Plaza, which was opened to the public on April 16. Courthouse Plaza is the new name for Fifth Street between Poyntz Avenue and Humboldt Street.

The building houses the offices of the county commissioners, the county clerk, treasurer and appraiser on the first floor. On the second floor are the offices of the register of deeds, the county public works and the county extension services.

"The third floor is a future growth area (unoccupied) of 5,000 square feet," according to Poyntz of Interest, the Downtown Redevelopment Information Bulletin.

Installation of the Courthouse Plaza doesn't present any problems for the First Christian Church which faces the plaza.

"They like the project. It solves their parking problem," Shoultz said.

The new lot facing Humboldt Street is to be used by both the courthouse and the church.

Fifth Street is closed south of Humboldt Street with access to the parking lot only. The traffic changes made June 5 are to be permanent, Shoultz said.

"The alley will stay open for delivery and circulation," he said.

Leavenworth and Humboldt streets are now two-way streets from Third Street west. Fourth Street is now a two-way street north of Poyntz Avenue.

Shoultz said Phase II renovation is scheduled to begin in six weeks, and due for completion in approximately one year.

"We will start advertising for bids on Phase II, if not in today's paper, then in tomorrow's," Shoultz said Thursday.

The courthouses were in the old courthouse building until June 15 and then were relocated to the annex, according to the downtown redevelopment information bulletin.

The first and second floors of the courthouse are currently administrative offices and the third floor houses judicial rooms.

"After the renovation, it (the courthouse) will be entirely judicial," Shoultz said.

The renovated courthouse will contain court services (probation offices), a law library and prisoner housing on the street level.

The second floor will house clerk of the court, a small claims court, a courtroom with jury area and judicial support facilities. These facilities include judges' chambers, room for a secretary and a jury room, Shoultz said.

The third floor of the courthouse will contain two courtrooms and support facilities.

"We will be re-using all the antiques from the original courtrooms," Shoultz said.

The courthouse attic will be used for additional office space in the future, Shoultz said.

The landscaping of the plaza will be completed in conjunction with the courthouse renovation.

After the courthouse renovation is complete, the courts will be moved back from the annex building. The annex is the old Carnegie Library. Phase III includes annex remodeling.

The district judges, clerks of court and judicial services are currently housed in the annex. After renovation, the renovated annex will contain the county attorney's office and the county corrections facilities.

County corrections is "similar to probation but with tighter supervision," Shoultz said.

"The total complex will be handicapped accessible," Shoultz said, "and since we planned this before the law required it, we're ahead of the game for once."

Law requires city to aid business relocation

By KRISTI NELSON
Collegian Reporter

Businesses, faced with moving costs after being displaced by the planned downtown mall, will receive financial assistance from the city.

Gary Stith, downtown redevelopment coordinator, said the city is required by federal law to give these businesses relocation and moving assistance. The mall site includes everything east of Third Street to Tuttle Creek Boulevard, south to Pierre Street and north to Leavenworth Street.

"We have provided all the businesses with information and pamphlets about relocation. We also brought in a professional relocation consultant to talk to these people," Stith said.

The city is also required by law to give the businesses a 90-day notice before evacuation.

"I anticipate a much longer time frame for relocation notices. Some locations will have to be moved before others. The areas where the actual mall is to be built will have to be cleared first. Those businesses located where future parking lots will be constructed will have a longer notice before moving," Stith said.

Because of the necessary relocation, the city is promoting certain areas for businesses to settle.

"We hope to develop the area south of the mall on the 300 block of Colorado," Stith said. "Most of these businesses will relocate in Manhattan, but very few are mall-type tenants."

The city also plans to give assistance for businesses to locate in available spaces in the Village Plaza, The Loop, the Food 4 Less area and in Aggieville.

"The city will also help businesses locate in the Industrial Park," Stith said.

Besides the assistance provided by the city to find new locations for uprooted businesses, the city may provide some help in public financing.

"Individual revenue bonds may be available and small businesses can take advantage of loans from the Big Lakes Regional Development Co. (a Manhattan loan firm)," Stith said.

Mike Hauser, Manhattan Chamber of Commerce director, said about 1½ years ago, the chamber started holding sessions for business people being affected by the mall.

"We had relocation consultants tell what happened in other communities and professionals explained the appraisal process. Our goal is not to sell the program but to answer questions," Hauser said.

The businesses will be paid a certain amount of compensation for their cost of moving, based on federal regulations. This amount is based on the business's past two years of generated revenue, Stith said.

The city will pay for the basic moving costs, including advertising, new printing of stationery, letterheads and cards, plus the cost of new signs. Compensation will not be provided for an increase in rent or time that the business is not open, Stith said.

The land and buildings will have two separate appraisals and the city will determine the value of the property. The owner can debate this decision in court, but meanwhile, the city will take possession of the land, Hauser said.

"I feel very favorable toward the mall project," Hauser said. "Manhattan can support a shopping center. We have lost retail sales dollars to Topeka and Salina because of the lack of a mall. Using the supply-and-demand economics, we know if demand exceeds supply, people will go elsewhere. Regardless of where the mall is located, we need the mall."

Hauser speculated that downtown merchants would be hurt if the mall was not built in the downtown area.

"If the mall was built in an outlying area of Manhattan, the results would be devastating to the downtown merchants. Building the mall at the major entrance of town will improve the city's image and keep shoppers downtown," Hauser said.

Don Carrel, owner of Kitchens Plus, 208 N. Third St., is concerned that moving will mean closing for a month, losing sales, possibly paying rent in two locations, telephone, extra advertising, remodeling costs, interest payments plus the loss of customers who may not be able to find the new location.

"I've heard the rent in the new mall will be anywhere from $15 to $22 per square foot per year. That may sound cheap, but I currently rent 4,000 square feet at $4.80 a square foot," Carrel said. "Figuring the mall rent for this size of space at the high end of the approximated rent cost, figures to $88,000 a year or $7,300 a month."

"Malls usually have a square foot charge plus a percentage of gross sales, making it very expensive to establish a store in the mall," Carrel said.

"I would have to relocate twice. Once during construction and again to the new mall. The second move would be without the financial assistance of the city. Relocating twice would mean the loss of business sales with down time (when doors are closed) and customers trying to locate us," Carrel said.

Carrel hopes to relocate in the west side of Manhattan.

"I don't want to be downtown (in the mall area) during the construction or downtown, but out of the mall. I don't think the old downtown will thrive with the nice climate-controlled mall two blocks away. If I don't find anything suitable in Manhattan, I may have to move to a city that is large enough to support the business," Carrel said.

Carrel believes the malls are a thing of the past.

"I've heard that malls in Kansas City are 40 percent empty. Malls were the thing 15 years ago, but now many towns are renovating their older sections of town. I'm not against improving downtown, but I think we could do it without bulldozing and starting over," Carrel said. "The building owners are losing money already, because people are afraid to rent in the (downtown mall) area, due to the project. Owners do not want to invest in new store fronts or improvements. The longer it takes, the more the area begins to turn into a slum," Carrel said.

However, the city's intent is to help businesses survive the move and turn this into an opportunity to move into better buildings, consolidate or even expand, Stith said.

"The relocation activity will probably begin late in 1984 with construction late in 1985 lasting about 20 months. Some businesses will have difficulties with the project but the city will try to minimize those difficulties," Stith said.

Computer malfunction delays shuttle's liftoff launch reset for today

By The Associated Press

CAPE CANAVERAL — America's new space shuttle, Discovery, its debut frustrated minutes before Monday's launch time, was lashed by an afternoon thunderstorm as NASA technicians swapped computers in preparation for a second countdown overnight.

Liftoff was reset for 8:43 a.m. EDT today, weather and repair work permitting.

Air Force forecasters said conditions would be marginal, with showers possible in the skies above Kennedy Space Center. At midafternoon Monday, storms hit the Cape just as workers were replacing the faulty computer that halted the countdown to liftoff.

Officials were worried about hail damage, or the possibility that Monday's precipitation could become today's ground fog. But the storm, which dropped .64 inches of rain on the launch pad in less than a half hour, contained no hail and NASA said there was no damage.

Each day's delay costs NASA about $1.5 million, an agency spokesman estimated.

The shuttle's crew of six, including the second woman named to an American spaceflight and the first commercial astronaut, had endured three hours lying on their backs Monday morning in Discovery's cabin. Disappointment was etched on their faces as they climbed out.

The countdown clock stood at nine minutes to go when launch control spokesman Mark Hess announced: "We will scrub for the day." A backup computer consisting of two pieces two feet long and 10 inches square, had failed to engage when ordered to run parallel with the primary system.

"When we attempted to turn on the machine we had a hardware failure, some electronic component failing," said Carroll Dawson, deputy manager of shuttle avionics. The computer, which cost $1.2 million, went bad sometime between Saturday, when it was last tested, and 32 minutes before liftoff, when launch control had its first indication of a problem, he said.

The machine, using technology of the early 1970s, was relatively new, Dawson said, adding: "We expect computers to fail once every 5,000 (operating) hours; this one failed after 750 hours."

If the shuttle had been aloft, it would not have been called back because of the malfunction, Dawson said, but "you would not under any circumstances launch with a suspect backup computer."

The delay was a replay of April 1981 when a similar problem caused a two-day postponement in the first space shuttle flight — Columbia's.

U.S. banks raise prime rate to 13 percent

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — With demand rising for business loans, most major U.S. banks raised their prime lending rate a half-percentage point Monday to 13 percent, the highest level since October 1982.

It was the fourth increase this year, and many analysts on Wall Street said it would not be the last. They said the continuing economic recovery, along with heavy borrowing by the government, would continue to push interest rates up.

Analysts said the increase in the prime rate was needed to restore the customary profit margin between what banks are paying to attract funds and what those funds earn as loans.

But President Reagan said investors were keeping interest rates up because of unfounded fears that inflation will be rekindled.

"Interest rates are still higher than you and I would like ... I think that to get them down they just have to finally realize that we're serious about keeping inflation under control," Reagan said in an address to farm writers and broadcasters in Washington.

The administration has consistently rejected the notion that high interest rates reflect massive federal borrowing to cover record budget deficits.

The Commerce Department reported Wednesday that a measure of inflation tied to the gross national product is rising at an annual rate of 2.8 percent in the current quarter. That is down from 3.9 percent in the first three months and is the lowest rate in 17 years.

The increase in the prime rate was expected to prompt an outcry in Latin America, where a half-point rise rate adds millions of dollars to the burden of heavily indebted developing nations. Their loan rates are pegged to the prime rate, moving up or down as it does.

In Washington, experts at the World Bank estimated Monday that the debt of Third World nations, already well over $800 billion, will rise by $1.25 billion a year because of the rise in the U.S. prime rate.

The move to a 13 percent prime was led by First National Bank of Chicago, the nation's eighth-largest bank. Most of the nation's major banks quickly followed suit.

The prime rate is the base on which banks compute interest charges on short-term corporate loans. Big companies often can borrow at below the prime, while small businesses and those involved in more risky ventures typically must pay more.

Consumer loans and home mortgage rates are not tied directly to the prime rate but changes in the prime often reflect interest rate trends that affect other borrowing charges as well.

Monday's jump in the prime rate was the first since May 8, when the banking industry adopted a 12.5 percent prime. The prime rate started climbing in March, when it increased to 11.5 percent from 11 percent, and was raised to 12 percent in April.

The government also reported Monday that the federal budget deficit, which some say is a major contributor to higher rates, continued to climb.

In its deficit report released in Washington, the Treasury said it spent a record $33.9 billion more than it took in last month, heading the deficit for all fiscal 1984 toward a record-setting pace.

It said the deficit for the first eight months of this fiscal year — which ends Sept. 30 — totaled $140.2 billion, a rate that would lead to a yearly deficit of more than $210 billion, compared with last year's record $195.4 billion, the report said.

However, the Reagan administration is still estimating a $177.8 billion shortfall for the fiscal year. And the deficit figures vary greatly from month to month, so that lower figure could still be accomplished.

In April, for example, heavy individual income tax payments had brought the Treasury a surplus of $11.5 billion.

The deficit for the first eight months of fiscal 1983 was $161.8 billion.

The dollar hit new highs in international currency trading, dragging the British pound and Canadian dollar to new lows. Dealers attributed the rally to rising interest rates and prospects for new tax breaks for foreign investors in dollar-denominated securities.

The dollar reached a seven-year high against the Swiss franc, a nine-month high against the Japanese yen, and its highest levels since January against the West German mark, the French franc, Italian lira and the Dutch guilder.

Manhattan pilot, plane disappear after Thursday flight to Colorado

By GARY NELSON
Collegian Reporter

A Manhattan resident and the plane he was flying disappeared Friday from the Colorado Springs Municipal Airport.

Don Arneson, area supervisor at the Colorado Springs Airport tower, said the pilot, Jim Moore, 40, was last reported by airport tower officials taking off at 10:45 a.m., Friday from the airport.

"The aircraft went off of the airport's radar at 10:52 a.m.," Arneson said. The radar is able to track aircraft within a 10-mile radius.

The plane, white with brown trim, was said to have left the airport headed west. "He could have turned after we lost him on the radar though," Arneson said.

Arneson wasn't sure if there were any passengers with Moore when he took off. "Even with binoculars it would have been hard to see if Jim had any passengers with him," Arneson said. "He was on a runway that was about a mile from our tower."

Moore was hired to fly the Cessna 414 twin-engine, owned by Woodbern Inc. of Manhattan, to take passengers to Colorado for a golfing trip Thursday.

When four passengers arrived at the airport Friday to meet Moore and take the plane back to Manhattan, they found themselves without a ride.

Phil Woodward, president of Woodbern Inc. and one of the passengers, said the incident had been reported to the FBI, Federal Aviation Administration and the Air Rescue Coordination Center.

Other passengers from the Manhattan area were Joe Mills, Burnie Butler and K-State football coach Jim Dickey.

"The plane was gone when we arrived at the airport," Butler said.

The four stayed in Colorado Springs until Saturday hoping something would show up before they took another flight back to Manhattan.

Arneson said the Air Route Traffic Control Center (ARTCC) is capable of tracing aircraft much better with its radar, at longer distances, than the Colorado Springs Airport.

"In a situation like this, I don't want to speculate on anything that the Colorado Springs Air tower may have," Jack Gossett, ARTCC area manager, said. "I simply don't have any factual information at this time."

At the FAA office in Seattle, Cathy Burks, acting assistant in public affairs, said she had no information at this time on the incident but would be investigating the matter.

In Denver, FBI agent Keith Underwood said, "We're treating it as a stolen aircraft case right now. It's a very curious case."

Maj. Ted Semenik, search and rescue duty coordinator of the Air Rescue Coordination Center at Scott Air Force Base in Belleville, Ill., said that no rescue mission is underway at this time. Semenik said that the FBI and FAA were currently in charge of the investigation.

Soldier distorts sweepstakes claim

Monday afternoon, a spokesman from American Family Publishers confirmed that Staff Sgt. Rochester Townsend of Fort Riley did not win their Multi-Million Dollar Sweepstakes.

"He (Townsend) just ordered magazines. That's all he did," said Amos Wright, a customer service representative for company. "He returned the sweepstakes entry, but he's not on the winner's list."

Wright said he would send a list of the winner's names to the Collegian.

When contacted by a Collegian reporter Monday afternoon, Townsend said, "If you've got $3,000 in your pocket, I'll talk to you. If you don't have no money I can't talk to you."

"If you want a story, you pay me and I'll give you a story on whether I won or not," he said. "Whether I won or not, I don't think is none of your business. If you want to publicize it, you give me $3,500 and I'll publicize it."

Townsend had claimed Friday he had won the sweepstakes. Fort Riley officials scheduled a press conference at 11:30 a.m. to announce Townsend's winnings. However, Townsend did not appear, upon the advice of his attorney.

"We scheduled the press conference during his lunch time, so it didn't conflict with any of his duties, but he chose not to show," said Harvey Perritt, Fort Riley media relations officer. "If he wants to handle the press one on one, then that is his business. These guys have their own time. He doesn't have to accept our help."

Fort Riley Public Affairs Office spokesman said the office has washed its hands of the affair.

"Our office was just trying to act as a mediator for Staff Sgt. Townsend. We were just trying to help him out," said Capt. Doug Bidle, assistant public affairs officer. "We offered, but he said 'No thanks,' so we have stepped out of the picture."

Carlin discusses wheat sale plan; China affirms purchase contracts

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Gov. John Carlin said today he has personally received assurance from the vice premier of the People's Republic of China that the Chinese will fulfill their commitment to purchase U.S. wheat.

The assurance came during a meeting Saturday with Yao Yilin in the Great Hall of the People in Peking, Carlin said during a telephone interview from Tokyo with The Associated Press.

Carlin was in Tokyo today for a week of meetings with Japanese government and business leaders after completing the China leg of his Asian trip Sunday night. The governor and his party return to Kansas Saturday night.

"We've tried to learn what we could about the wheat sales," Carlin said of his talks with Chinese leaders during his travels last week inside China.

"When we met Saturday with Yao Yilin, he made it very clear they intend to fulfill their full commitment."

Kansas wheat farmers were alarmed about three weeks ago when the Chinese announced they planned to reduce their purchases of U.S. wheat by about 300 million metric tons. Any reduction in sales by the U.S. means a greater surplus of grain in this country, and continued depression of the price farmers get for their wheat.

However, Carlin said when China announced it was reducing its purchases it meant it was slowing them, but not cancelling them.

"They explained they are reducing their purchases but they are not backing away from their commitments," the governor said.

"The problem is they have no storage over there, and they have had a good crop. It may mean a delay in their taking delivery of our wheat, but they are not withdrawing from the commitment."

"We've got to understand and appreciate their storage problem. They just can't store the quantities of wheat like we can."

"They intend to live up to their commitment. They need every bit they can get."

Carlin said the most tangible result of his trip to China was the seven agreements of understanding signed Friday in Zheng Zhou, the capital of Henan Province, Kansas' "sister state" with China.

They solidify Henan's commitment to have an exhibit at the Kansas State Fair in Hutchinson in September, as well as call for the sale of agricultural equipment to China and the establishment of working relationships between three Kansas companies and the province.

The governor said the agreements push Kansas further down the road toward significant business relations with the Chinese.

"China is so much different than five years ago" when he first visited the mainland, Carlin said.

"There is such a change in the attitude of their government, that there is no reason to believe that it won't just snowball now. It's a great opportunity for those companies who want to do business."

He said an agreement signed by Kansas Power and Light Co. to help the Chinese study their energy potential "could have dramatic tangible results 10 years from now."

Carlin said this trip was vital for expanding Kansas' business interests because "they do want to get acquainted, but they want to take it one step at a time." His return visit was one of the steps so important to the Chinese to reassure them Kansas is sincere.

"The work done in 1979 and this trip moves us several steps down the road for our businessmen who want to take advantage of the opportunity," he said.

The emergence of China into fuller participation with the community of nations has been dramatic in the last five years, Carlin said.

"China has really changed," he said. "It is much more westernized. In Peking five years ago, there was absolutely no color — period. It was a drab city."

"Today, there is a totally different picture. There is all kinds of color. There is just a different mood and atmosphere altogether."

Carlin said President Reagan's visit to China last spring has helped promote the liberalization.

"The word down in the trenches was pretty positive toward the president and the fact he'd undertaken the trip," the governor said.

There was no talk of the conflict over Taiwan and the People's Republic's anger that the Reagan administration has decided to sell more planes to Taiwan, Carlin said.

"There is some significance in that," he added. "If it was really bothering them, everyone would have been talking about it. It didn't come up."

Jackson's "peacekeeping" undermines policies

The dirtier side of politics will, on occasion, rear its head in the midst of an election year. Jesse Jackson's recent "peacekeeping" mission to Central America is an example of political maneuvering at its very worst.

Jackson has used his ploy as a world leader before. Despite winning no election or failing to be appointed to any government position, Jackson has taken it upon himself to become America's foreign relations troubleshooter.

Jackson first jumped into the middle of the Democratic nomination race with his mission to free American flier Robert Goodman. Although Jackson was able to secure the release of Goodman after Syria and the United States had reached an impasse, many felt Jackson's action was merely part of a move by Syria's King Hussein to make the Reagan administration look inept in foreign affairs.

It seems Jackson may have once again stumbled into an international political play between nations. Jackson has earned a solid reputation as a man capable of working with domestic problems, for example through his work as chairman of the Operation PUSH program. But Jackson does not have the qualifications to carry on negotiations of an international nature.

Jackson's mission, seemingly supporting the rebel point of view, goes directly against the grain of the Central American policies of the Reagan administration. Although Reagan's policies in the region have been less than successful in solving El Salvador's problems, U.S. leaders should try to remain consistent in dealing with foreign relations.

Jackson has fallen short in gaining the Democratic nomination in 1984. It seems pointless for him to try to continue his political moves during this election year, unless he is seeking to move into contention for the Democratic vice presidential nomination.

Until Jackson wins an election placing him in some sort of power to represent the interests of this country, he should refrain from his missions to attempt to solve world problems, and in the process, gain political leverage.

There are countless political groups in the United States with varying opinions on almost every issue. The purpose of democracy is to put a central figure in charge of the affairs of the nation. It seems Jackson has missed out on this important lesson and is intent on representing his own interests in dealing with foreign powers.

Jackson should realize, regardless of his political aspirations, his "peacekeeping" missions do more harm than good for this country. It is important that the world realize that the United States is represented by one voice in its affairs. But by his missions to Central America and the Middle East, Jackson seems to be saying government is acceptable only when it operates on his terms.

Cigarettes kill in spite of manufacturers' claim

"Within seconds after a smoker inhales cigarette smoke, his blood pressure starts rising by 10 to 20 points, his heart rate increases by 225 beats per minute, his skin temperature drops 5 or 6 degrees and even his eyesight is adversely affected," says Dr. Benjamin Byrd, president of the American Cancer Society.

And by the time he finishes that cigarette, a habitual smoker will have shortened his life by an average of 5 1/2 minutes. All in all, a man of 25 who smokes two packs day will live eight years less than a nonsmoker.

Among an average group of 1,000 smokers, one will be murdered, six will lose their lives on the nation's highways, while 250 will die before their time because of their use of tobacco.

Just over 55 million adults smoked 634 billion cigarettes last year, from which approximately one-eighth of the U.S. population will die prematurely, according to Emerson Foote, of the ACS. Nearly 430,000 Americans will be snuffed out (so to speak) due to the adverse effects of cigarette smoking, as reported in the Surgeon General's 1982 report on smoking. To put this all in perspective, more Americans will die from cigarettes this year than died in all of World War II.

One of the most insidious results of tobacco use is cancer, particularly lung cancer. In fact, of all the potential carcinogens, tobacco is the least disputed, with 95 percent of all scientists indicating a definite connection between cigarettes and lung cancer. The death toll is staggering — with nine of every 10 lung cancers and 30 percent of all other cancers attributable to these little white coffin nails. This adds up to 80,000 preventable cancer deaths a year.

The good news is that you might be one of 54.5 million who don't get cancer. The bad news is that, if you don't, you'll probably die of a heart disease instead. As Dr. G.C. McMillian, director of the National Heart, Lung and Blood Institute, concluded after examining the medical evidence that, "given the strength, independence and coherence of its association, it can be concluded for the purposes of preventive medicine that smoking is causally related to CHD (Coronary Heart Disease)." The bottom line is that smokers are four times as likely to have heart attacks than nonsmokers.

Women, who according to one cigarette advertisement have "...come a long way, Baby," have paid the price for their emerging equality. Not only have their rates of lung cancer and CHD soared along with their increased cigarette usage, but more and more medical research has indicated that those who smoke during pregnancy are doing even more damage.

Congressional testimony from Dr. Lawrence Longo revealed that "...the risk of spontaneous abortion is 30 percent to 70 percent higher among women who smoke than nonsmokers." The use of tobacco also increases the possibility for infant crib death by 52 percent.

Tragically, 13,720 deaths could have been prevented by the elimination of smoking during pregnancy — a national disgrace.

The economic consequences of cigarette smoking are staggering, totaling nearly $30 billion annually. This is a significant drain on the U.S. economy in terms of lost productivity, unnecessary health care expenses, and lost income — not to mention simple human suffering.

Despite this overwhelming case against cigarette use, the cigarette industry (led by the R.J. Reynolds Co.) has been attempting to deny that tobacco is harmful. Such claims are not only misleading, they are criminal.

The first industry myth is that there are alternate causes to cigarette-related diseases. While such a claim has surface validity, the medical consensus has found that cigarette smoking combines with other major risks factors to multiply the risk of lung cancer, heart disease and other health problems. Senator Gary Hart punctured the industry's balloon when he remarked that, "The few studies not showing the cigarette-disease relationship have serious defects."

In the last 30 years, 30,000 studies and papers have examined the harms of smoking. These studies all translated into 30,000 good reasons to stop smoking. Nobel Prize-winning scientist Dr. Renato Dulbecco summarized the majority of the data when he said, "Doubts have been raised from time to time but they have no scientific validity."

Perhaps the best indicator of the inaccuracy of such statements is the fact that insurance companies give sizable discounts to those who do not smoke. No insurance company I've ever heard of would ever reduce a premium unless it was sure that the activity in question is likely to make somebody a widow, widower or an orphan.

Cigarettes have been studied epidemiologically, chemically, pharmacologically, biologically, in animals and, through autopsy, in man, and the verdict is clear and undisputable — they kill. Put that in your pipe and smoke it R.J. Reynolds.

Letters

Group deserves ticket price

Editor,

Re: The letter to Michael Jackson Although I agree that $30 dollar tickets are expensive, it makes no sense to blame Michael Jackson for it. What needs to be remembered is that concert promoters are hired under contract to negotiate ticket prices. The performer has a limited say in the matter.

Another fact to remember is that once an entertainer or any other person makes it to the top of his field, he becomes worth more money. I'm sure after we, as students, have worked hard to achieve a degree and someday become successful in our chosen fields, we will want the money we are worth, regardless.

Furthermore, to say all superstars have big egos and that they do not care about their fans is unfair. Many stars, including Michael Jackson, frequently visit sick fans in the hospital and are also active participants for charity programs.

Very soon tickets to the Michael Jackson concert will be sent out to fans. All three shows will no doubt be sell-outs. At least there are some of us in the world who are not jealous of Michael Jackson or his white glove.

Hickey's K-State ties end with camps

By VIKKI WATSON
Staff Writer

It isn't unusual to find Lynn Hickey running down a court this summer, refereeing an organized game of basketball, surveying all the moves, shots, and rebounds of the hundreds of players she'll oversee in her Wildcat basketball camp.

It's important because the talent that Hickey sees may someday belong to a future Lady 'Cat at K-State — or more importantly for her now, a future Aggie at Texas A&M University.

Hickey, who formally announced her acceptance of the positions of head women's basketball coach and assistant athletic director for women's athletics at Texas A&M June 14, is in a transition phase at the moment — playing K-State coach during the day at her basketball camps and playing Texas A&M head coach and assistant athletic director in her mind during the remaining time.

It's been a five-year success story for Hickey at K-State, leading the Lady 'Cats to a 125-39 overall record and two AIAW and three NCAA post-season tournament appearances. She's also added two consecutive Big Eight Conference championships and a Big Eight Post-Season Tournament title to her list of accomplishments the past three seasons.

But even the storybook success of last season's team — sharing the Big Eight Championship with the University of Missouri, winning the Big Eight tournament, posting a 25-6 record and finishing the season ranked No. 7 in the nation — wasn't without its share of problems.

Creating part of those problems, and what would create the ensuing controversy surrounding Hickey's decision to leave K-State, was the departure of sometimes-starting guard Sheronda Jenkins, starting center Tina Dixon and leading scorer Angie Bonner from the Lady 'Cat squad earlier this spring. The loss of Jenkins, Dixon and Bonner, who was selected to the second-team all-Big Eight and Kodak all-District squads, had nothing to do with her choice to leave K-State, Hickey said.

"I didn't want people to think just because some good kids had left that Lynn Hickey was cutting country," she said. "That (the loss of the players) was not really a factor. That had happened and I had accepted that they were not coming back. I had signed five kids and I was really looking forward to the challenge of getting the kids back together and having a fun year."

"Even though we won big, this was a very, very tough, emotional year. Next year would not be like that. This coming year was going to be much more enjoyable overall than this past year. We were under a lot of stress. I don't think anyone can realize the amount of emotional stress that we were under at times," Hickey said.

So what about K-State's chances at success for next season? Very good for this still young, but talented squad, Hickey predicted.

"I think they'll be very good," Hickey said. "They're going to surprise people. Everybody is assuming that because they lost a couple of players that K-State is over. That's a bunch of baloney. They have very good skill. I have signed five really fine players, and have 11 kids on scholarship that want to play."

Combine the talent returning for the Lady 'Cats this season with the idea of heading a Texas A&M squad that hasn't had a winning season in four years and one comes up with a very soul-searching decision for Hickey, who cited the untapped financial backing available at Texas A&M and the excellent baseball coaching opportunities for husband, Bill, just too much to overlook. Bill leaves K-State after his first season as head baseball coach.

"I thought it was a good decision from the beginning because of the chance to be an athletic administrator and because it is a big money school that has been completely untapped," said Lynn, who was first contacted about the Texas A&M opening in early April. "They haven't even started to reach their potential in women's basketball."

"And the thought that we were getting further south and closer to good baseball weather was in my mind the whole time. The things we were waiting on were the opportunities that Bill would have."

Stepping into the new position of assistant athletic director of Texas A&M's women's programs will provide Hickey with the added responsibility of maintaining nine women's sports, as well as heading the women's basketball program. It's a duty that, admittedly, Lynn knows little about at the present.

"I'm basically responsible for maintaining those sports and the basketball program," she said. "At the same time, there is a boss above me and so it's not like I'm completely running the program. You pretty well run your own program."

Running her own program is exactly what Lynn will do, trying to turn around a Texas A&M squad that finished the 1983-84 season with a 13-15 record and which as of yet has recruited no one for the upcoming year. Texas A&M also averages only a few hundred spectators at its women's games, which is comparable to K-State's contests when Lynn first took over the program.

"Texas A&M made it pretty clear that the one thing they want me to concentrate on is the basketball program," she said. "They have not done any major recruiting on a dog-eat-dog basis so the big key is that we're going to have to really get out and recruit. I've never seen them play but I know they have 11 kids that are supposed to return."

"They have seven seniors so they'll be a veteran club which is good and bad. It's really tough for seniors to go through their last year with a new coach. You're starting from almost scratch but you're going to a good school that has tradition and tremendous former student support."

The possibility of Hickey adding another 20-plus game-winning season to her career may not be as likely as if she were coaching at K-State, but the chances of turning a mediocre squad into a contender looks promising, she said.

"I think they (Texas A&M players) are really excited that there's a change in the program," Lynn said. "A lot of times, just with a little different atmosphere, the same players can look completely different. I doubt there's going to be a big change next year in the winning record but if we could just have a winning season that's something they haven't done in four years. That's the initial goal."

"The good thing is that there are seven seniors this year so the next season we will be able to start completely rebuilding and bringing in the players we would like to have. We're probably looking to four years down the road to being able to establishing ourselves and to being competitive in the southwest conference," she said.

Becoming competitive is Lynn's goal next season at Texas A&M but staying competitive is the goal of Dick Towers, K-State athletic director, who is searching for the perfect replacement for Lynn.

"Our women's basketball program is one of the finest in the nation and I'm going to keep it that way by hiring the best person available," Towers said.

Sophomore guard Susan Green, who found out about Lynn's decision while working a basketball camp in Salina, has developed a "wait and see" attitude about the upcoming season.

She said Lynn's decision to leave came as no real surprise. "There had been rumors that she might leave," Green said. "We got a letter from the athletic department telling us they'd get the best coach possible. I'm sure they'll make a good decision."

So it's goodbye K-State and hello Texas A&M for Lynn Hickey. But first, K-State Head Coach Lynn Hickey has Wildcat basketball camps with which to contend.

Royals top A's, 16-0; rookie hurls shutout

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Mark Gubicza fired a three-hitter, George Brett and hot-hitting Steve Balboni unloaded three-run homers, and the Kansas City Royals routed the Oakland A's 16-0 Monday night.

Gubicza, 4-7, was handed an 8-0 lead in the first inning. He retired the first 10 batters and did not surrender a hit until Bruce Bochte singled in the fifth. Gubicza struck out five and walked four.

Oakland's Bill Krueger, 5-3, did not retire a batter and was charged with eight runs and six of the Royals' 17 hits. Reliever Gordon Heim Mueller gave up the next eight runs, then was relieved in the seventh by right-fielder Garry Hancock.

Hancock retired all four batters he faced.

Willie Wilson went 3-for-3, scored three runs and drove in a run and Hal McRae and Don Slaught each hit two doubles and a single.

Leadoff singles by Wilson and Butch Davis preceded Brett's homer in the first. McRae then singled and took second on Dwayne Murphy's fielding error. Balboni was safe on shortstop Tony Phillips' throwing error and Leon Roberts then walked to load the bases for Slaught, who hit a two-run single to make it 5-0.

Greg Pryor followed with an RBI single, then Heim Mueller came in to give up a sacrifice fly to Wilson and an RBI single to Davis.

Board gives aid in tenant-landlord problems

By KRISTIE FABER
Collegian Reporter

When a student encounters tenant-landlord problems, the K-State Consumer Relations Board may be able to offer assistance.

"At least 60 percent of all cases handled by the Consumer Relations Board are landlord-tenant problems," said Jeanne Faurot, board director for the summer. "The Consumer Relations Board is a social service (program), funded through student activities fees that are allocated by the Student Government Association (SGA). We deal with consumer-related problems."

The board is made up of one paid director and volunteers who are taking a class called Consumer Relations Practicum. The students enrolled in the lab are required to work as volunteers in the Student Government Services (SGS) office on the Consumer Relations Board, Faurot said.

The board relies heavily on the Landlord-Tenant Law when dealing with students who are having problems with a landlord.

Copies of the "Tenant's Handbook of Rights and Responsibilities" are available in the SGA office for $1. The book contains an explanation of the Landlord-Tenant Law, along with helpful hints on how to prevent landlord-tenant problems. It also explains what to do if a problem arises, Faurot said.

Two of the most common problems that occur are when a roommate moves out and when a landlord abuses access, Faurot said.

"I strongly recommend a roommate rental agreement," Tina Glover, off-campus housing officer, said.

The roommate rental agreement binds the roommates together, placing responsibility for rental payments and apartment upkeep on each tenant.

According to Kansas law, if a roommate moves out, the remaining roommate(s) are held responsible without this agreement, Glover said. Copies of the agreement are available in the off-campus housing office in the Pittman Building.

Most rental contracts state that before a landlord can enter an occupied apartment he must give "reasonable" notice and can only enter at a "reasonable" hour.

If possible, a tenant should try to get a lease with an agreement as to how much time and what times are considered "reasonable," Glover said.

"Usually 24 hours is agreeable," Glover said.

When a landlord won't make repairs and is legally obligated to do so, the tenant may sue for damages. If the landlord is given a written notice of the repair(s) that need to be made, he then has 14 days to try and make the repair(s), as stated in the "Tenant's Handbook."

Another common problem is that of the security deposit. The landlord has 30 days from the date of termination to return the security deposit and a statement of any deductions. If this is not returned, the tenant can sue for the amount that was to be received plus 1 1/2 of the amount in question.

"When someone comes to us (the Consumer Relations Board) for counsel on a landlord-tenant problem, the first thing we advise them to do is talk to the landlord in person. If this does not solve the problem, then we tell the tenant to write the landlord a letter and make sure to keep a copy," Faurot said.

"If the tenant is unable to solve the problem we will then call or write the landlord and act as mediator between the two parties," Faurot said. "We have to be removed from the people we're dealing with and remember that our purpose is to mediate."

If the tenant and landlord are unable to solve their differences, the board will then refer the tenant to the student attorney for advice.

"Taking the case to small claims court is sometimes advised if the amount in question is less than $500," Faurot said.

The off-campus housing office will review leases for students, Glover said. The office also supplies vacancy listings, a roommate matching service, and once a year puts out a complex listing.

The board also works with students who are required by the parietal rule to live on-campus.

"The parietal rule states that all single freshmen, under the age of 21, are required to live in either a residence hall or a greek chapter house if space is available. Exceptions must be approved by the director of housing," Glover said.

Some freshmen misunderstand or are not aware of the parietal rule and so live off-campus. If the University becomes aware of the off-campus freshman, the student must break his lease with the landlord and move into the residence hall or withdraw from the University, Glover said.

"If the student breaks the lease with the landlord he can then be held responsible for the rent for the duration of the lease unless another renter is found," Glover said.

Federal official dismisses state prison report as 'misleading'

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — An assistant U.S. attorney general has disagreed sharply with a state committee's report on overcrowding in Kansas prisons, accusing the panel of misleading the public and taking a Pollyanna approach in defining serious criminals.

Lois Haight Herrington, a Justice Department official in Washington, said a study of Kansas' inmate population statistics led her to a conclusion opposite that of the Advisory Committee on Prison Overcrowding.

However, the chairwoman of that committee, Kathleen Sebelius of Topeka, said Thursday Herrington appeared to have overreacted to the state committee's report, adding, "She must not have read it very carefully."

The Sebelius committee, created by state Corrections Department Secretary Michael Barbara, studied the state's inmate population problem and sentencing laws earlier this year.

It concluded Kansas imprisons too many nonviolent inmates, contributing to overcrowding.

The 1984 Legislature rolled back a 1982 law which increased the length of sentences and made inmates serve the entire minimum sentences for property crimes before becoming eligible for parole. The change has allowed the early release from prison of some inmates convicted of certain Class D and E felonies.

The change was made after the advisory committee issued its report, which said in part:

"Contrary to public perception, Kansas prisons are not filled with serious violent offenders. Forty-five percent of inmates are convicted of nonviolent Class D and E offenses. Even more surprising is that 35 percent of inmates have no prior felony record, not even felony probation. An additional 24 percent have one prior felony conviction."

"Together, nearly two-thirds of the Kansas prison population has one or no prior felony convictions. The statistics speak for themselves: Kansas uses the harshest and most expensive sanction it has available to punish large numbers of first-time relatively minor felons."

It was that conclusion with which Herrington took issue.

"...Implications that all Class D and E offenses are nonviolent or nonserious are wrong," she wrote in a response to Dr. Walter Menninger of Topeka, a member of the state advisory committee who sent its report to the Justice Department.

Menninger and Herrington both are members of the National Institute of Corrections' advisory board.

"Further," Herrington wrote, "the majority of those incarcerated for 'less serious' offenses have prior convictions and prior incarcerations, which clearly indicates recidivist criminal behavior."

"While the statement...from the advisory committee report suggests that Kansas punishes a large number of nonserious, nonrecidivist offenders with prison terms, we come to the opposite conclusion. The data indicate that approximately 8 percent of Kansas inmates fit this description."

"It is our strong feeling that the (advisory committee's conclusion) gives subjective opinion and misleading interpretation the appearance of fact, which badly flaws the resulting conclusions and ultimate recommendations."

She said out of some 1,400 Class D and E felony Kansas inmates studied, 120 were convicted of assault, battery, robbery and involuntary manslaughter, and about 570 more were convicted of burglary.

"By any standard, these crimes should be called violent and-or serious," Herrington wrote. "Calling burglary 'nonviolent' or calling a convicted burglar a 'relatively minor felon' are simply unfair descriptions of serious and often very dangerous criminal behavior."

However, Sebelius noted her committee never recommended that inmates convicted of crimes against people — the so-called violent crimes — have their sentences reduced or be prematurely released from prison.

"Our committee...removed anything that had anything to do with crimes against people," she said. "The overwhelming majority of these inmates are property offenders."

Small business seminar teaches techniques to improve employee leadership methods

K-State's Small Business Development Center and the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce will sponsor a seminar titled "Good Leadership or Good Management — What Do Employees in a Small Business Want?" at 6 p.m. Wednesday in the Union Big Eight Room.

This is the fifth seminar sponsored by the center. The seminar is designed as a refresher course in past and new management techniques.

"It is difficult for smaller businesses to see how to apply the ideas and concepts of management developed in larger organizations," said Richard E. Vaden, professor of management and instructor at the seminar.

The seminar will deal with the difference between management and leadership, where motivation theory fails small businesses, styles of leadership and how to select a style for a business.

"It (the course) is designed for managers and owners of small business operations," Vaden said. "Any manager, military (personnel), private or public, could benefit."

Joseph Barton-Dobenin, professor of management and center director, defined a small business as one which is "locally and independently owned and managed."

"Students, if interested in running their own business in the future, should attend this seminar," Barton-Dobenin said.

After the seminar, participants will be asked to fill out a survey reflecting the actual national composite of the inmates presently held in state prisons across the country.

"Our basic concern is not with the statistics and facts used to derive conclusions and recommendations in the report, but we are troubled by interpretations of the data describing criminal histories. These interpretations lead directly to the misleading and unfair, in our view, conclusion that Kansas incarcerates too many nonviolent, nonserious offenders."

She said prison overcrowding is a serious problem needs addressing, but added:

"...We must be certain that we do not overlook our responsibility to see that offenders whose crimes are of serious or violent nature are incarcerated, and that we take all steps to avoid misleading the public or government officials about the nature of this problem."

Congress compromises Medicare

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — House Democrats went into a conference with Senate negotiators to fashion a "down payment" on the federal deficit hoping to stave off any measures that would force the elderly to pay more for health care.

But after weeks of stalemate, they settled for nearly $8 billion in Medicare spending cuts over the next three years — including a premium increase for most recipients — in exchange for loosened welfare regulations, new Medicaid coverage for some poor women and children and an abandonment of tax breaks proposed by the Senate.

"I don't think we are going to give away the family farm," House Majority Leader Jim Wright, D-Texas, said after the agreement was reached last week.

If such key House conferees as Reps. Dan Rostenkowski, D-Ill., chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and Henry A. Waxman, D-Calif., chairman of a health subcommittee, were satisfied, Wright said, "I would suppose we have a reasonable compromise."

The conferees also may have bought a bit of time before Congress must overhaul the huge health program, which is projected to run out of money in the early 1990s and accrue deficits of up to $300 billion by 1995.

With health care costs rising at more than 15 percent a year and the federal government paying about 30 percent of the nation's total medical bill, Congress knows it has to do a major Medicare overhaul eventually. But it is about as eager to do that as it was to tackle the Social Security financing crisis in 1982.

So, with obvious reluctance, House negotiators went along with many of the Medicare cuts sought by the Republican-led Senate as the dominant part of an $11 billion package of social-program reductions intended to help cut the flow of budgetary red ink through 1987.

The reaction from one of the nation's largest organizations of the elderly was favorable.

"We feel the conferees have shown good faith in trying to avoid costshifting to beneficiaries, who have been receiving a number of benefit cuts and are doing their share in deficit reduction. We believe it's not too much to ask the medical community to do their share," said Vita Ostrander, president of the 16-million-member American Association of Retired Persons.

Under the agreement by the conferees — which still must be approved by the full House and Senate — the elderly are expected to pay higher premiums for Medicare coverage of their doctors' bills, an optional plan in which most recipients enroll.

Pulitzer-winning play depicts tragedies in lives of 3 sisters

Pulitzer Prize-winning play, "Crimes Of The Heart," will be performed by the K-State Repertory Theatre at 8 tonight in the Purple Masque Theatre at East Stadium.

Lew Shelton, associate professor of speech and founder of SRT, will direct Beth Henley's play about a "bad day" in the lives of the three Magrath sisters of Mississippi.

One of the sisters, Babe, has shot her VIP husband because she didn't like his looks. Another sister, Meg, is a failed singer who went insane last Christmas and is still telling lies about her singing career. The third sister, Lenny, is having her 30th birthday, but her sisters didn't remember, and to add to that her horse has died.

The play, which won the Pulitzer before its Broadway debut, deals with the love and caring the sisters provide for each other, despite these tragedies.

Other performances will be Friday and July 4, 7, 12, 17, 20, 25 and 28. All shows will be in the Purple Masque Theatre at East Stadium. Tickets are $4 for the general public and $3 for students and senior citizens.

Mondale, Hart meet, plan to work together

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Walter F. Mondale and Gary Hart met over bacon and eggs Tuesday and then, shoulder-to-shoulder in the sunshine, declared they will work together to defeat Ronald Reagan. Hart seemed resigned to not being his party's presidential nominee.

"The things that divide us are modest compared to the things that divide the two of us from President Reagan," Mondale, the apparent winner in their long battle for delegates, told reporters.

Both said they did not discuss a Mondale-Hart ticket and Hart said he was continuing his candidacy. But he no longer said — as he had so often for months gone by — that he expects to be the nominee.

While Mondale and Hart talked party politics, the third candidate, the Rev. Jesse Jackson, was in Havana for a meeting with President Fidel Castro to seek release of more than 20 political prisoners.

The hour-long tete-a-tete between Hart and Mondale in the posh East Side townhouse of wealthy Mondale supporter Arthur Krim was reminiscent of the famous "Compact of Fifth Avenue" reached in a pre-convention meeting in 1960 between then-Vice President Richard M. Nixon and Nelson Rockefeller in Rockefeller's Fifth Avenue apartment.

That session, however, lasted eight hours and resulted in Nixon's embracing Rockefeller's internationalist views on some of the issues of the day, to the dismay of conservatives.

Hart and Mondale apparently did not discuss issues; the meeting's purpose appeared to be to erase the residue of hard feelings from their primary battles and the often personal rhetoric used. Mondale had questioned the Colorado senator's character, compassion, experience and commitment to finding jobs for the unemployed and Hart accused Mondale of proposing "the failed policies of the past."

But in their joint news conference Tuesday Hart said the personal conflicts between the two of them had been "over-reported."

And even during their battle, "neither of us accused the other of witchcraft," Hart said, recalling that four years ago George Bush had ridiculed Reagan's economic ideas as "voodoo economics," but still was able to run as his vice presidential candidate.

Said Hart of Mondale: "He and I have been friends, are friends and will continue to be friends."

Said Mondale: "If the Republicans think they are contending with a divided party, they can forget it."

Said Hart: "I am continuing my own candidacy to give the party a positive alternative. That is not a detriment to Mr. Mondale's candidacy."

The peace meeting was arranged over the weekend by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts. Mondale walked briskly — all but ignored by New Yorkers driving down Park Avenue to work — and arrived first.

Drinking age bill proponents add incentives

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Senate sponsor of a proposed national drinking age said Tuesday "it's time to use the stick" to force states to ban sale of alcoholic beverages to people under age 21, but a colleague said it "takes a lot of gall and a lot of brass" to tell states what to do on the issue.

Sen. Frank R. Lautenberg, D-N.J., opening debate on a measure that would penalize states for failing to enact a minimum age of 21, said his bill would save more than 1,000 young lives a year.

Lautenberg's bill would withhold a portion of highway money to states that fail to enact the minimum age within two years after passage — the same approach approved by the House earlier this month.

Another provision would give states additional highway safety money if they enact mandatory penalties for drunken driving convictions.

Sen. Gordon J. Humphrey, R-N.H., offered a substitute that would provide the incentive of additional highway safety money to states enacting laws to combat drunken driving. But the substitute drops penalties against the states.

Humphrey, saying the issue is "coercion or incentives," told the Senate that a Congress that has "done an abysmal job" of managing national affairs shouldn't be taking over traditional state issues.

He said the government should stop attacking "the sovereignty of the states" and added that the uniform age would have little effect on overall highway fatalities. He contended 84 percent of highway-related traffic fatalities are caused by those older than 21.

But Lautenberg said there is a disproportionate number of fatalities among young people who drive across "blood borders" to buy liquor in neighboring states with lower drinking ages.

Noting that only four of 23 states that recently considered the minimum 21 age enacted such a law, he said, "It's time to use the stick — sparingly, but effectively."

The legislation will go back to the House, which recently passed a similar bill but must decide whether to accept a Senate-added incentive program for states enacting automatic penalties for convicted drunken drivers.

The chief sponsor of the House bill, Rep. James J. Howard, D-N.J., said, "The chances are very good that we will have a 21-year-old minimum drinking age pass the House again before the July 4 break," which begins Friday.

But Howard said he would have to study the Senate language to see whether the House favors any changes.

Before approving the bill, the Senate voted 62-35 to defeat a rival measure that would have rejected the penalty approach. Instead, states would have been given more money for highway safety projects if they enacted measures to combat drunken driving.

Lautenberg opened the debate by saying "it's time to use the stick" to force states to ban sale of alcoholic beverages to people under age 21. But a colleague said it "takes a lot of gall and a lot of brass" to tell states what to do on the issue.

Lautenberg's bill would withhold a portion of highway construction money to states that fail to enact the minimum age by Oct. 1, 1986 — the same approach approved by the House earlier this month.

The incentive provision would give states additional highway safety money if they enact mandatory penalties for drunken driving convictions.

Shortly after Lautenberg's measure was introduced, Sen. Gordon J. Humphrey, R-N.H., offered the substitute that would provide the incentive of additional highway safety money to states enacting laws to combat drunken driving. But the substitute dropped penalties against the states.

Faulty fuel valve halts shuttle's launch

By The Associated Press

CAPE CANAVERAL — Flight computers, monitoring the space shuttle countdown with millisecond precision, choked off Discovery's engines Tuesday four pulse beats before liftoff. A sensor indicated a faulty fuel valve, triggering the dangerous launch pad abort.

It meant back-to-back scrubs for the hard-luck shuttle and set back the schedule for its first launch indefinitely.

For a time, launch control considered emergency measures to get the crew of six out in a hurry, and commander Henry Hartsfield said later, "We were prepared to bail out if necessary." It wasn't.

"The crew was not in any danger," said shuttle operations director Thomas Utsman. "We had developed the procedure to prevent the situation from getting out of hand." The five men and one woman left the cabin 45 minutes after the shutdown.

A computer malfunction forced Discovery's first 24-hour launch delay; the IBM system that was Monday's goat was Tuesday's hero, detecting the valve alarm and triggering the engine shutdown.

"One point I would like to make," Hartsfield commented. "The system did exactly what it is designed to do and I am very pleased that it did. If there are engine problems, you want to know about them on the ground and not in the air." In that sense, he said, "This is a real confidence builder."

It was not known whether there actually was a valve malfunction. The shuttle computers look for any single alarm and then react. Only one of the two valve sensors showed trouble. NASA officials were to meet Wednesday to assess the damage and the delay.

Only once before, in 42 manned launches, had a liftoff been stopped when there was "fire in the tail." In December 1965, the two-man Gemini 6 craft was setting off on a rendezvous mission. Its launch was aborted one second before liftoff and forced a three-day delay.

Discovery's flight crew had lain on their backs for hours awaiting the Tuesday liftoff that never came. On schedule, precisely at 8:43 a.m. EDT, two engines fired, then stopped.

Launch control spokesman Mark Hess had announced "we have ignition" as bursts of steam spewed from the base of the shuttle. Three seconds later he announced "we have an abort."

Shuttle engines fire seven seconds before liftoff, enabling the ship to reach full thrust before steel hold down pins are blown to release the shuttle.

Special relationship ties Taiwan, U.S.

By MELISSA BRUNE
Staff Writer

A "special relationship" between the United States and Taiwanese governments keeps the foreign policy between the two countries from changing, despite martial law, said the Rev. Roger Rumpf during his talk about human rights last night in the Union.

The United Church of Christ minister named three reasons for this position on the part of the United States. The biggest reason, he said, is because approximately 25 percent of U.S. congressmen get "special treatment" by the Taiwanese government when they visit that country, also known as Formosa.

Rumpf said congressmen who visit Taiwan are treated to "wine, women and song."

He said the other two reasons were because of U.S. military bases in Taiwan and because American corporations operate freely there.

Rumpf spoke on behalf of the Formosan Association for Human Rights Inc., and the Southeast Asia

Resource Center to urge listeners to write their congressmen to demand an end to martial law in Taiwan. Amnesty International — a worldwide voluntary human rights movement — sponsored the talk, but a member of that organization said it takes no political stand on the issue.

Taiwan has been under martial law for 35 years — since 1949 when Chiang Kai-shek fled to the island with his troops and 2 million mainland Chinese.

Rumpf spoke to about 60 people about Taiwan as an example of a country under martial law.

"Under martial law there is no right for laborers to strike or protest," Rumpf said, explaining why American corporations flourish in Taiwan.

This year, the United States made $800 million in military sales to Taiwan, Rumpf said. He also said the United States allowed $2.3 billion in duty-free imports from Taiwan into this country, which he said illustrates U.S. military and economic support of the Taiwanese government.

Rumpf was in Taiwan in November and December of 1983 to observe the election process. He said Taiwan is controlled by a "corrupt" one-party system, which is difficult for opposition party members to permeate.

"The elections in Taiwan are really token elections," he said, "because the controlling party always wins."

The Kuomintang, or KMT, is the governing body of Taiwan — a country of 18 million people with an area about the size of New Jersey. Rumpf said the island is about 80 percent Taiwanese and 15 percent mainland Chinese.

Rumpf spoke of opposition campaigns, in which members of opposition parties tried to win seats in the 13 percent of the government which comes up for election. The other 87 percent of government seats are held by lifelong members of the KMT. He said only 11 percent of the 13 percent of elected members of the government are opposition party members.

Opposition party members are not a united front, he said, but many campaigned for the right of self-determination in Taiwan. At political rallies for the KMT only about 50 people show up, Rumpf said. At rallies for the opposition party 10,000 people could attend, he added.

"The opposition parties were campaigning on a platform of human rights and self-determination, which the government candidates were not," Rumpf said.

He said many people campaign for opposition parties because of the issue of self-determination, which the government does not allow. Many opposition party candidates have been imprisoned for talking about self-determination, he said, adding that one candidate went to jail for seven years for this offense.

Rumpf said the United States must change its foreign policy toward a country such as Taiwan.

"I think we have to begin somewhere. This country (United States) needs to put human rights back into U.S. foreign policy."

Firm goes before city to discuss rate study

By NATALIE HAZELTON
Collegian Reporter

Representatives from Black and Veatch went before the Manhattan City Commission during a work session Tuesday to discuss a comprehensive water and sewer rate study. The study will include ways to finance and plan a water treatment plant for tentative use beginning in the summer of 1987.

City Manager M. Don Harmon said the study was needed for three reasons. A recent audit shows bond revenues are slightly behind debt requirements, the water treatment plant requires revamping in its rate structure, and there is a need to review the extension of water and sewer services.

The price range for the study worried some commissioners. A 1978 study cost the city $28,000. The current study may range from $40,000 to $45,000 despite the reduction of required man days to complete the study from 154 to 108.

Ron Hardin of the management service department at Black and Veatch cited a number of reasons for the rising cost of the study. He said the 1978 study was a basic rate study and did not include the cost of financing a major capital improvement.

Software will be used as part of the study. The hiring of computer programmers will initially cost the city more, although the software will save the city money on future studies, Hardin said.

Commissioner Rick Mann asked if the 1978 study could be built on in order to save money. Hardin said Black and Veatch could reduce costs about 10 percent with a maximum study cost predicted at $40,000.

Jim Patterson, also of Black and Veatch, said that Manhattan had a record of planning ahead, and that planning a new water treatment plant would be a good idea.

"The old plant is in bad shape. The equipment could be used for another 20 years, but the city needs more capacity," Patterson said. Other things, such as design and standards all need change, he added.

"The plant is ready for retirement; you can't change or expand it," he said.

According to Patterson, it would take nine months to one year to design a new facility.

He pointed out the need for quick planning in order to prevent running the current water treatment plant at overload capacity. While running at overload is possible, it is not good for the facility, he added.

Harmon said K-State's status would have to be one of those policies to be reviewed. K-State is currently charged in-town water and sewer rates even though it is not within the city of Manhattan.

"Whether the University will remain treated as an intercity customer is a policy decision," he said.

Mayor Dave Fiser said that he wanted Manhattan to have continued good water supply, pay off bonds and keep the price of water down.

"People don't complain unless they turn their handle and no water comes out. Let's get on with this," Commissioner Gene Klinger said.

Student-designed project makes its way to fields of Kansas

Staff/Chris Stewart

Kent Funk, graduate in agricultural engineering, is spending his summer refining the E-Z Bale, a control system for even hay feeding into a baler. The award-winning system was designed by K-State agricultural engineering students.

By SUSAN MACKEY
Collegian Reporter

K-State agricultural engineering students are greasing up their award-winning project, "E-Z Bale," and getting it ready for the hay fields of Kansas this summer.

"E-Z Bale," the name given to the project by the students, was designed last fall by a team of students in an agricultural machinery design course.

"Basically the E-Z Bale system is a control system which results in even feeding of hay, across the width of a large round baler," said Mark Schrock, assistant professor of agricultural engineering and faculty adviser for the project.

Current large round balers range from 3 to 8 feet in width. Schrock said E-Z Bale ensures that the bale will have the same diameter and density across the width of the baler.

Windrows are long, narrow rows of raked hay or vegetation that has been mowed down and left to dry in a field and then baled and used for feed.

E-Z Bale has a lot of benefits for farmers, as it saves on attention and fatigue factors that result during the baling operation, Schrock said. It is operated by a micro-processor.

"Under current conditions farmers must weave back and forth across the windrow to feed the hay into the baler and at nighttime this is very hard to manage," Schrock said.

E-Z Bale has a control system which detects the diameter of the bale by sensing belt tension on the rear of the machine where the belts actually form the bale, Schrock said.

"A loose belt indicates not enough hay in a specific area and more should be added," Schrock said. "Depending on sensor readings, the computer will move the deflector so hay is directed to the appropriate part of the bale."

"This allows the operator to drive straight down the middle of a windrow. The automated system will take care of the hay position across the baler," he said.

The project has its approval from Stanley Clark, professor of agricultural engineering and another faculty adviser for the project.

"It's ready to go," Clark said. "Students are ready to use E-Z Bale in fields in Marion County and Ellis."

E-Z bale will be demonstrated twice this summer.

"The first demonstration will be at the farm of Clyde Lang, agricultural engineering graduate and member of the team who built the project, at Ellis," said Kent Funk, team member and agricultural engineering graduate.

"We plan on Marion County being a public exposure day. The Hesston Corporation will be there and we hope many farmers will attend. We are making a field day of it," Funk said.

"We believe the baler (E-Z Bale) will eliminate some of the burdens of operating a baler and provide a more consistent, uniform bale," Funk said.

The Hesston Corporation donated a baler and some of the parts needed for the project and the Department of Agricultural Engineering had minor investments in parts, he said.

"We have no patent on the project, just a design; however, we are checking on a patent with the Hesston Corporation," Clark said.

The project won first place in an annual design contest at St. Joseph, Mo., March 9.

The contest, which is held in conjunction with the Mid-Central Section meeting of the American Society of Agricultural Engineers (ASAE), marked the seventh first place finish in the last eight years by a K-State team in the ASAE annual competition.

Universities in Kansas, Nebraska, Missouri and Iowa participated.

The project qualifies for consideration in the national ASAE competition to be held in New Orleans in December. First and second place winners in each of the 10 ASAE regions nationwide will be invited to compete.

"I believe we have an excellent chance to be a finalist in the competition," Clark said.

Members of the agricultural engineering team that designed E-Z Bale were seniors Bryan Andra, Conway Springs; Kent Funk, Hillsboro; Clyde Lang, Ellis; and Phil Todd, Maple Hill.

Education professor dies

James J. Albracht, 61, died Thursday at his home. Death was attributed to natural causes.

Albracht was an associate professor of adult and occupational education at K-State and had been a member of the faculty since 1966.

Born in Lindsay, Neb., on April 21, 1923, Albracht grew up on a farm. A 4-H scholarship got him started in college at the University of Nebraska where he graduated with a bachelor's degree in 1948 and a master's degree in 1954. He received a doctoral degree from Michigan State University in 1966.

Memberships include Alpha Tau Alpha fraternity, of which he was past national president; Gamma Sigma Delta agriculture honorary; Phi Delta Kappa, education honorary; and many other professional and civic organizations.

He is survived by his wife, Mary Lou, of the home; four sons: Thomas of Yukon, Okla.; Stephen and Robert, both of Arlington, Va.; and David of Lawton, Okla.; two brothers: Francis of Meadow Grove, Neb., and Ralph E. of Battle Creek, Neb.; two sisters: Zita Jaixen of Madison, Neb., and Juliann Bolsinger of Northbrook, Ill.

Funeral services were at 10 a.m. Monday at Seven Dolores Catholic Church and burial was at Sunrise Cemetery.

Memorials may be made to the James J. Albracht Memorial Scholarship Fund in care of the KSU Foundation.

Evidence turns up in lost pilot search

By GARY NELSON
Collegian Reporter

A new clue has been uncovered at an Evanston, Wyo., airport, in the search for a missing plane and its Manhattan pilot.

The Cessna 414 twin-engine plane, with the call numbers 100PH, was last seen on radar at 10:52 a.m. Friday by tower officials at the Colorado Springs Municipal Airport.

The pilot, Jim Moore of Manhattan, was to bring back four passengers to Manhattan that day. However, when the passengers arrived at the airport Friday morning, the plane was gone.

Tuesday, it was reported to the FBI that the plane was seen later

Friday afternoon when it landed for refueling at the Evanston, Wyo., airport.

Moore purchased $377 worth of fuel — about 190 gallons — using a MasterCard, then took off again, Phil Woodward, president of Woodward Inc. of Manhattan, and part owner of the aircraft, said.

"We won't know anything more until tomorrow (Wednesday) about the charge card," Woodward said.

Manhattan instructor pilot Dave Stoner, a Capitol Air Lines employee, estimated that on the amount of fuel purchased and the type of plane involved, the flight from Evanston to wherever would be limited to a range of about 800 to 1,000 miles, or approximately four hours of flight time.

Jeff LaSelle, an employee of Evanston Aviation at the Evanston Municipal Airport, said that the plane landed at the Evanston airport around 2 p.m. Friday, refueled, and then took off again, approximately 20 minutes after touchdown.

"He (the pilot) asked how far it was to Jackson Hole (Wyo.)," LaSelle said. "I told him that it was about 170 miles."

LaSelle said the plane was not carrying any passengers.

He added that the pilot did not hesitate in signing his name to the charge card ticket and that it clearly read "Jim Moore."

Jackson Hole Aviation employee Robert Feagin said that Moore or the plane have not shown up at the Jackson Hole Municipal airport.

"We've been looking for him, but nothing has turned up here yet," he said.

Feagin said that they (Jackson Hole Aviation) picked up an Emergency Locator Transponder (ELT) signal Friday but it turned out to be nothing.

Dave Stoner said the ELT is activated if an aircraft crashes, during a rough landing, or during device testing. The pilot has the option to test the ELT daily at a time specified by Federal Aviation Administration regulations.

"The only way to turn it (ELT) off is to get out and open the cowl (detachable metal covering for the engine)," Stoner said.

"We checked it (ELT signal) out but couldn't find anything," Feagin said.

He added that Jackson Hole Aviation was cooperating with the FBI to do its part in finding Moore.

FAA official Cathy Burks of the office of public affairs said in a phone conversation Tuesday, that the FBI has deemed the case an open investigation case.

FBI officials said an open investigation involves investigation in more than one state.

Murray carries show in 'Ghostbusters'

If you liked Bill Murray in "Meatballs" and "Stripes," you'll love him in "Ghostbusters." Here's why:
You know how Paul Newman always plays himself in all his movies? Whether he's Paul Newman as a cop, a cowboy or a convict, it's always those blue eyes and that confident swagger that charms us into going along for the ride. It's the same with such movie stars as Katherine Hepburn, James Stewart, John Wayne, Barbara Streisand and many others.

LINCOLN KONKLE
Collegian Reviewer

Review

Now I wouldn't include Bill Murray in that club of great screen personalities, but undeniably it's his personality that comes through with every character he plays. In "Ghostbusters," director Ivan Reitman (who directed Murray's other two-star vehicles, mentioned above) allows Murray to play himself with virtually no acting required (acting in the sense of creating another personality, a whole life apart from the world outside the movie).

Dr. Peter Venkman, the leader of the ghostbusters, has no distinguishing characteristics apart from his name and alleged education; it's all Bill Murray up there. That's why "Ghostbusters" is an enjoyable movie.

It's not surprising that "Ghostbusters" comes off like an over-budgeted skit from "Saturday Night Live" since Dan Ackroyd, who also plays one of Murray's partners in parapsychology, co-wrote the screenplay with Harold Ramis (the final member of the ghostbusting trio). The story is about three university-based researchers of supernatural and psychic phenomenon who have their grant yanked out from under them and then go into the spirits-removal business in New York City.

As with most of Murray's films, his occupation in "Ghostbusters" is merely a base of operations for chasing women. The one he finds this time (Sigourney Weaver) just happens to live in an apartment building that is the gateway for some big-time ghosts, demons and what-not to enter the world and destroy it. When the pot-pourri of ghouls finally make it, you can be sure they'll be no match for Bill Murray and company.

"Ghostbusters" is really a combination of two different movie types: a romantic comedy and a horror show. I found the transition between these contrasting tones a bit abrupt. One minute we're laughing at Murray's wisecracks, and the next we're terrified by demon arms punching up through the chair Sigourney Weaver is sitting in and dragging her into the kitchen, perhaps for a midnight snack. I liked the blending of genres in "Gremlins," but it left me feeling uneasy in "Ghostbusters."

That criticism aside, there are several good belly laughs in "Ghostbusters" and many chuckles. Dan Ackroyd and Harold Ramis are largely wasted in their straight men roles, but Bill Murray is able to carry the show. Let's face it; he's one of the funniest comedians in movies of the '80s.

"Ghostbusters" may be a little too scary in its scary parts for young children, but teen-agers on up will find this supernatural silliness more fun than break dancing. "Ghostbusters" is currently playing at the Westloop Theatres.

Rain, controls slow mosquito assaults

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — New Yorkers may slap themselves more than usual this summer, but world's fair visitors probably won't. Some Indiana residents have found reason to put off yardwork, but St. Paul and Minneapolis residents should have no such excuse.

The annual mosquito assault on the lazy days of summer is off to a spotty start across the nation this year, thanks to varying amounts of rainfall and preventive attacks by local swat teams.

"Some parts of the country have a lot of rain. That means there's going to be a lot of mosquitoes in that area, especially in the areas where we don't have any established control agencies," said Gilbert Chaillet, president of the American Mosquito Control Association.

Rainfall provides the standing water mosquito eggs need to hatch. A tin can, an old tire or a cow's hoof-print is all they need, even if they've spent the winter in hibernation.

Mosquito control teams have been spraying from the air and on the ground, and even throwing out hormone to keep the mosquito infestation down. The city-county health department of Kansas City, Kan., has been urging residents to get rid of standing water.

New York City crews recently started spreading a bacterium in uninhabited marsh and wetlands to kill larvae. "Because of the heavy rain and heat we are going to have a very severe mosquito season," said Randy Dupree, the city's assistant commissioner of health for pest control.

In Fort Wayne, Ind., the mosquito population is running "extremely high," said Michael Beard, operations supervisor of the mosquito control division of the Fort Wayne-Alan County Board of Health.

Cool weather in early May kept mosquitoes hidden but still breeding, Beard said. "You have maybe several hatches that held back and did not go out and seek blood meals until it warmed up a bit, and then we had a very large hatch."

After two weeks of rains and flooding in Kansas City, Mo., public health sanitarian Alan Thomas expects a bad season. "We have one heck of a problem and it probably will get worse the rest of the summer, as long as we have moisture," he said.

Kansas City has no eradication program as outlying areas do, and Thomas said that drives the pests into the city. All he can do is advise people about prevention and treatment of bites, he said.

Heavy May rains in Massachusetts "kicked up numbers of nuisance mosquitoes already," said George Grady, director of the state Department of Health Laboratory Institute in Jamaica Plain. But those rains may have made mosquitoes peak too early in their breeding to be much threat in July and August, when encephalitis becomes a concern, he said.

On the other hand, the mosquito control program in New Orleans celebrated its 20th birthday Friday with its fewest opponents ever — just in time for the world's fair.

"We're running way below normal," said George Carmichael, director of mosquito control. "It will be very unlikely we can have a very severe buildup during the summer, starting this late."

Lack of rainfall has kept the population down there, as it has in Orange County, Calif., Houston and Phoenix, officials in those areas said.

In the St. Paul-Minneapolis area, Bob Showgren thanks a growth-regulating hormone in briquette-like chunks that mosquito controllers scattered through prime breeding acreage this spring. The briquettes release the hormone throughout the summer, and only one application is needed, he said.

'True West' opens tonight in Purple Masque Theatre

The K-State Summer Repertory Theatre will present Sam Sheppard's, "True West," at 8 tonight in the Purple Masque Theatre.

The play deals with two rival screenwriting brothers, Lee and Austin, who are constantly at each other's throats in an effort to stomp the other one. The brothers are such opposites that they appear unrelated, and their jealousy and rivalry bring out their violence.

Doug Hoseney, graduate in theater and director of the play, said "True West" closed after its opening night in New York.

"It opened in New York and closed right down," Hoseney said. "Some thought it was miscast and Sam Sheppard thought it was misdirected. He disowned it (the play) after that. It opened off-Broadway about six months later and it's doing real well."

All shows begin at 8 p.m. in the Purple Masque Theatre in East Stadium. "True West" will also be performed Saturday and July 5, 10, 13, 18, 21 and 26.

Tickets for the shows will be $3 for students and senior citizens and $4 for the general public.

Runaway deficit causes interest rate increase

The prime rate has increased again — the fourth time this year.

The prime rate — the interest banks charge on short-term corporate loans — is now 13 percent. Some big companies can borrow money at a lower interest rate, but the rate is usually higher for personal loans.

President Reagan blames the increases on investors who fear a return to high inflation. He continues to reject the idea that these increases reflect massive federal borrowing to cover the rising budget deficit.

This is a naive view of the nation's economic system. The federal government deals with the deficit by borrowing. In order to borrow money, it must compete with business and other borrowers. This competition has made less money available, in proportion to demand, and has increased interest rates.

Interest rates will continue to climb until the Reagan administration makes a serious attempt to check the runaway federal deficit. Despite promises made during his 1980 campaign, the deficit has only increased during Reagan's term. The U.S. Treasury announced Wednesday that it spent a record $33.9 billion more than it took in last month and predicts a $210 billion deficit in 1984.

Reagan has made much of the current economic recovery in his re-election bid. However, the recovery will be threatened if interest rates continue to climb.

Perhaps election year considerations will encourage the administration to check federal spending. If not, the American people should send Reagan the message to lower the deficit in the most effective way — at the polls.

Jackson's pride interferes with campaign goals

WASHINGTON — Louis XIV, the Sun King and a god-awful brat, saw no distinction between himself and the state. "L'etat c'est moi," is the way he put it and by wretched excess of all kinds, he went on to prove it. Jesse Jackson would use no such language but it is clear that he beats Louis XIV hands down. He is his campaign.

Jackson says that one of the remaining issues for him is what he calls either his "pride" or his "self-respect." That's understandable, but it's hardly something that either can be incorporated into a party platform or has anything to do with the issues that initially propelled him into the race. Nevertheless, Jackson is conducting himself as if his pride and personal pique are really what counts.

When George McGovern, the Democratic Party's resident family therapist, said that a Walter Mondale-Gary Hart ticket might restore party unity, Jackson exploded.

ed. He called McGovern "unprincipled" — a man who would put pragmatism above conscience. He apparently forgot that earlier in the year he and McGovern had made a joint appearance at a Des Moines church and exchanged compliments bordering on endorsements.

Then Jackson unloaded on Mondale. He belittled the presumptive nominee, ridiculing him with the ghost of Hubert H. Humphrey.

"That was the last significant politician out of St. Paul-Minneapolis, Minn.," Jackson said. It was a mean crack. Humphrey was Mondale's mentor and what Jackson was saying — and saying bluntly — was that Mondale was not worthy of him. He invoked the father to put down the son.

Increasingly, these sorts of statements have become characteristic of the Jackson campaign. There is a tone of petulance and hurt to what is being uttered.

This is a tough, tough period for Jackson. He must be tired. He must be disappointed. His vaunted Rainbow Coalition has mostly lacked the requisite colors. Not until he got to California did whites vote for him in any number. Tired and disappointed politicians, even the pros, often get cranky. In 1972, for instance, even McGovern, weary and facing certain defeat, used the vernacular to tell a heckler to kiss his posterior.

But Jackson has not "lost." He never set out to win the nomination or to ex post facto change the delegate-selection rules. Rules, shmules. His mandate, the one he himself declared, was to energize the black vote and to alter the political agenda — to raise issues like South Africa above a whisper. He was stunningly successful in the first and less successful in the second, but half a triumph is hardly a defeat. And as far as Jackson is concerned, the campaign is hardly over. He remains a powerful spokesman — a political E.F. Hutton. When he talks, people listen.

But not when he talks garbage. And calling Mondale and McGovern names is garbage. If anything, Jackson can learn from Humphrey. Defeat and disappointment turned him bitter, and his standing suffered. Jackson's refusal to distinguish between his campaign and himself is sure to do the same to him. In the end, he may have his self-respect — but no one else's.

States need systems for juvenile rehabilitation

Last week a Kansas City, Kan., jury decided the case of a man who had been accused of beating to death with a baseball bat two women in that city. The murders occurred during a burglary which netted the man and his accomplice less than $100. The jury found the man guilty and sentenced him to two consecutive life sentences.

I, along with my family and other people familiar with the case, applauded the jury's decision. My sister, her husband and their 2-year-old daughter live only three houses away from the scene of the murder and the incident threatened our peace of mind and our family's safety. Such a sentence demonstrated to the community that such a brutal and useless crime will not be tolerated by the people of the area.

The man sentenced to two life terms was only 18 years old. It is tremendously unsettling to think that someone so young could have so much hate and evil built up inside to take two human lives for a small amount of cash.

One begins to wonder about his background, his family life, the values, if any, taught at home. A young man took two defenseless women's lives. Somewhere, somehow, something went wrong with this man's life.

What is even more frightening is the future of his 15-year-old accomplice. Will he, or should he, be put in a juvenile detention center? Or should he be placed with other murderers, no matter what their age and experience? Should the jury believe that the youth was a victim of circumstance and set him free, or that he was a willing participant of a brutal murder and incarcerate him with others of similar crimes?

And what is even more important, if the courts decide he is guilty, is he able to be rehabilitated — the alleged purpose of our prisons — or has he, by his crimes at the early age of 15, irrevocably determined his way of life?

This is just one decision in one case in hundreds that juvenile court officials face everyday. To some observers, many juvenile court cases are tried in methods that are logically backwards.

Some juveniles are sent to jail before they tried, and then released and sent to juvenile detention centers after the court decides their guilt.

According to a Newsweek report, it seems the courts find it more important to prevent the juveniles from committing other offenses while they try to determine whether or not a crime has been committed in the first place, than they do rehabilitating them as soon as they are arrested. Then if the court decides if a crime has been committed, it opts for rehabilitation.

"Society has a legitimate interest in protecting a juvenile from the consequences of his criminal activity," said U.S. Supreme Court Justice William H. Rehnquist.

As this demonstrates, many believe the state has the role of surrogate parents to the juvenile criminals in our society. Instead, why doesn't the state play surrogate parent to the parents of our juveniles.

While some parents of juveniles are not to blame for the children's activities, the ultimate responsibility of the juvenile is the parents. Parental intervention and pledging to help a son or daughter back on the road of law-abiding citizenship has swayed the decision in favor of the juvenile on more than a few occasions.

If the states can help the parents, the home environment and the sense of self-worth that parents can give to their child, then the decisions of the court might not be between incarceration with hardened criminals or a slap on the hand, but between redirection and ultimate rehabilitation.

Supervision lessens Jardine street dangers

In response to Bijay Argawalla's concern about negligent drivers speeding through the Jardine Terrace complex (Monday's Collegian), I would like this opportunity to tell the rest of the story.

Young children playing out of doors is not an uncommon sight at Jardine Terrace. Their tricycles, wagons and Smurfmobiles far outnumber the counterparts of their parents. Far more numerous than the cries of the birds overhead are their own cries of laughter, pain, frustration and joy. In short, the children are everywhere and everywhere apparent (even in the streets).

I do concur with Mr. Argawalla on one point; drivers speeding through Jardine Terrace do present a very real danger to the unsupervised children darting out from between parked cars and playing along the curb and in the gutter. But I must take exception to his shortsighted solution to the problem.

As a resident of Jardine Terrace with a 3-year-old daughter of my own, I can readily identify with the concerns of the other parents in this complex, concerns of safety for their children. But I am appalled on an almost daily basis of the apparent lack of responsibility many parents in this complex display regarding the safety and well-being of their children.

Why is it not too surprising to see children out roaming the grounds of Jardine Terrace unaccompanied by even one adult? On one occasion my wife escorted a young girl home. She had wandered off, unbeknownst to her mother, and was having trouble finding her way back home. Why is it that toddlers barely able to walk are seen shuffling among the parked cars and ambling up and down the street and in the gutter? Why is it a common occurrence to see older brothers and sisters drag their siblings off to a playground rendezvous, and then run off in pursuit of other activities and leave them stranded? Where is the supervision? Wherein lies the real danger?

To these parents residing here at Jardine Terrace who cry the loudest about negligent drivers speeding on the roads through the complex, I say take responsibility for the care and safety of your children. Don't allow them to play unsupervised. Don't allow them to play in the streets. Know where and what they are doing at all times.

Installing speed breaks at short intervals on the roads through Jardine Terrace may force some drivers to slow down. But what will it take for some Jardine Terrace parents to speed to the rescue of their children? A lack of parental responsibility is an invitation to danger.

Man nearly slices hand for queen

LONDON — Vegetable slicer salesman Robin Ives got nervous and narrowly avoided slicing his fingers into attractive spiral shapes Tuesday demonstrating his gadget for Queen Elizabeth II.

"I have done this hundreds of times, but I have never had the shakes before," said Ives, 31, who performed at a booth in the "Women's Life and Leisure Exhibition" opened by Britain's 58-year-old monarch earlier in the day.

The queen, who leaves cooking and vegetable preparation to her domestic staff, ignored his shaking hands and seemed intrigued, he said, but she didn't ask to buy one of the $6.85 gadgets used for cutting vegetables into garnishes.

Premature baby puts on pounds

DAYTON — An infant who surprised doctors by surviving her 18-weeks-premature birth was fatter, "very cute," and doing quite well as she turned 2 months old, a hospital official said.

Baby Malika weighed 1 pound, 15 ounces on Sunday, and is no longer the smallest baby in the Children's Medical Center newborn unit, said Dr. Sherry Courtney, director of newborn medicine at the hospital.

Malika weighed 450 grams at birth on April 26 — four grams shy of a pound — and dipped to 350 grams by May 12.

Malika's full name and family background have not been revealed.

Cash dedicates treatment center

NASHVILLE — Entertainer Johnny Cash, who says he is recovering from a chemical dependency himself, helped dedicate a new alcoholism treatment center Tuesday at Vanderbilt Medical Center.

Cash, 52, known for his movies and hit songs like "A Boy Named Sue," "I Walk The Line" and "Ring of Fire," spoke at the formal opening of the Vanderbilt Institute for Treatment of Alcoholism.

Cash left the Betty Ford Center for Chemical Dependence at Rancho Mirage, Calif., Jan. 21 after more than two months trying to kick a morphine addiction.

George Carlin finds life on HBO

LOS ANGELES — Comedian George Carlin, whose penchant for four-letter words and a defiant attitude have limited his appearances on network television, says he's found new life on Home Box Office.

"I never stopped hearing about that thing, on the plane, in the restaurant, in hotel lobbies, after the show, whatever, everyone: HBO, HBO," Carlin, 47, said of a Carnegie Hall concert on the cable TV system.

Royals lose doubleheader

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Curt Young, four days removed from the minor leagues, fired a two-hitter through 6½ innings Tuesday night to carry the Oakland A's to a 6-1 victory and a doubleheader sweep of the Kansas City Royals.

The A's, who suffered a team-record 16-0 humiliation the night before, posted an 8-4 victory in the opener. Joe Morgan and Rickey Henderson got key hits to help the A's overcome a 4-0 first-inning deficit.

Young, who was recalled from Class AAA Tacoma on Friday, retired the first 12 Royals before Hal McRae led off the fifth with a single that ricocheted off the pitcher's foot. The 24-year-old left-hander struck out three and walked one.

George Brett hit a bases-loaded sacrifice fly in the eighth off reliever Keith Atherton for Kansas City's lone run.

Davey Lopes gave the A's a 1-0 lead off Charlie Leibrandt, 2-2, with a sacrifice fly in the first.

Henderson had three hits and Morgan and Dave Kingman each added two hits and drove in a run apiece as Oakland banged out 12 hits in the opener.

Larry Sorensen picked up his second victory in 10 decisions as each team made two errors. Bill Caudill pitched the final two innings for his 15th save.

Former K-State player hired by Notre Dame

By ROB COE
Collegian Reporter

Harry Justzig, former K-State football player and graduate assistant coach, is preparing for the upcoming gridiron season. This time, however, Justzig will be helping the University of Notre Dame where he has been hired by Fighting Irish Head Coach Gerry Faust as an assistant coach.

Justzig's responsibilities at Notre Dame will include coaching the cornerbacks, assisting with the specialty teams and conveying his knowledge about future Irish opponents. The latter duty will be of much importance to Coach Faust since two teams on Notre Dame's 1984 schedule, University of Colorado and University of Missouri, are from the Big Eight Conference.

Justzig, who graduated from K-State in 1983 with a degree in finance, began playing football in the sixth grade.

He later played football at Shawnee Mission North High School and in his senior year, his team finished as state runner-up to perennial power, Wichita Southeast. After high school, Justzig earned a place on the K-State squad as a walk-on player at a defensive cornerback position.

In 1980, Justzig's playing career abruptly ended in the preseason, due to a knee injury. Because of his love for the game, he became a student assistant for Coach Jim Dickey. His responsibilities included film work and helping with the junior varsity team.

During K-State's 1982 football season, which ended with a trip to the Independence Bowl, Justzig was putting in 60 to 70 hours a week at the football offices, while receiving no wages. This, he believes, is why Coach Dickey eventually hired him in 1983 as a graduate assistant.

"I paid my dues, so to speak. Coach Dickey gave me an opportunity to stay involved with football," Justzig said.

After the 1983 season was completed, Justzig felt it was time to look for a job outside Manhattan. He began sending out resumes to people involved with high school and college football, including Notre Dame.

Justzig was initially turned down for the position of assistant coach at Notre Dame. However, Coach Faust called in May and Justzig was flown to Notre Dame's campus at South Bend, Ind., and given a tour of the small private Catholic school, which has an enrollment of approximately 9,000 students. He was then offered the job.

Justzig said he is excited about the approaching season.

"In every corner of the nation, people know about Notre Dame football. The atmosphere and tradition surrounding it is unbelievable," he said.

Justzig said a winning tradition and extensive media coverage are two big reasons for Notre Dame football's popularity. Several cable television networks and almost 350 radio stations throughout the country cover the Irish football games.

Justzig sees several similarities between the K-State and Notre Dame football programs. There are many hours spent in meetings, plenty of hard work and constant monitoring of player development, he said.

Justzig, however, is also aware of the differences between the two schools. One big difference comes economically — the Irish program's budget far outdistances K-State's.

Another difference is in the area of recruitment. Recruiting for K-State is achieved primarily in Kansas, with some done in certain other designated states. Recruiting at Notre Dame is unlimited and coast to coast.

The former Wildcat football player is excited about his future with Notre Dame.

"I plan to stay here with Coach Faust and work with Notre Dame," he said. "Our goal is to become national champions."

Self-confidence helps Lytle reach goals

By LYNN BENDER
Collegian Reporter

Self-confidence can be a powerful element in reaching the goals that often seem far away.

K-State pole vaulter Doug Lytle attributes much of his recent success to self-confidence and his belief that he has the ability to be one of the best in his event.

Lytle used this self-confidence Thursday to accomplish his goal of making the United States Olympic Team, finishing second in the finals of the pole vault at the Olympic track and field trials. At the meet, Lytle exceeded his personal record of 18-6½ set at the Athletics Congress meet, by vaulting 18-8 3/4 inches on his first attempt.

Lytle finished behind Mike Tully, who set a American record of 19-3/4. Tully's vault broke the record of 19-1/4 set by Earl Bell.

To some, Lytle's making the Olympic team was a major upset.

"I feel that it is an upset in their minds," Lytle said. "Last year I was jumping well and it wouldn't have been an upset. This year I didn't compete on a regular basis, so when I started jumping well no one really knew about me. I felt like I was one of the best out there."

"If you give it every thing you've got then you are going to do well."

— Doug Lytle

To fellow pole vaulters, his success at the trials came as less of a surprise, Lytle said.

"I don't think the other vaulters felt it was an upset," he said. "Actually I've been around for a couple of years but every time I get to the point of doing something big, something happens."

One of Lytle's major obstacles was a broken ankle he suffered at a meet in Austin, Texas, in May 1983.

"I looked at it as a gift from God, saying to me, save it for an Olympic year," Lytle said. "I was telling myself that about a month ago. I was worried to death that success wasn't going to happen, but it all started turning around."

For Lytle, the nationals and the Olympic trials were the turning points he had been striving for.

"I think I rose to the occasion with the two meets, and these were the meets to do it at," Lytle said. "They are the most respected meets and will take me the farthest in my lifetime, in terms of credibility and opportunity."

Lytle said a source of inspiration for him prior to the Olympic trials was Jeff Buckingham, a University of Kansas pole vaulter.

"He knew I was jumping well and he said that I would make the team," Lytle said. "I appreciated his belief because deep down inside I wasn't sure how well I would do."

When he walked into the Los Angeles Coliseum the night of the Olympic trial competition, Lytle said he was confident in his abilities. "I knew I could make the Olympic team because, I said to myself, 'I'm going to jump 18-8 3/4,'" he said. "In doing that it was almost evident that I would make the team."

Lytle said starting a meet is the toughest part of pole vaulting.

"The first jump for the day for any vaulter can be scary because you warm up, stretch out, and then you're off the ground," he said. "But then you put your poles down and sit around for a couple of hours before you jump again; you wonder if your body and muscles are ready to perform," Lytle said.

Lytle stays with one pole throughout the entire meet.

"I use to start with a smaller pole and move to a bigger one, but the last couple of meets I grabbed a big pole and started with it," he said. "This way, I get adjusted earlier, get my timing down, and my coordination just got better and better. Consistency is the name of the game. If you are constantly jumping 18 feet you will win, or at least place in the top three no matter what type of competition you are in."

Before meets, Lytle finds clowning around useful in relieving tension. By joking around Lytle said he is much more relaxed and is not as distracted prior to a meet.

"I like to tell jokes with the crowd, sing and whistle sometimes," he said.

Lytle said his goal of winning an Olympic gold medal is within his reach. To him, winning in Los Angeles is a matter of confidence.

"I think it's evident that I have a good shot, and I think the other vaulters and coaches in the United States feel I have a good shot," Lytle said.

To get to this point in his career, Lytle has spent 10 years practicing. He began pole vaulting in the back yard of his house using his mother's closet rod and a foam landing pit. He soon expanded to longer, fiberglass poles, boxes in the ground and runways.

"I got to the point where I could jump 14 feet in my back yard, before I finally had to retire from the facility," Lytle said.

To those pole vaulters just starting out, Lytle said the most important aspects are to believe in yourself, enjoy what you're doing, and to always give 100 percent.

"If you give it every thing you've got then you are going to do well," he said. "But when I stop having fun, I'll stop pole vaulting. When I stop enjoying it I will stop all together."

Physicians question charity as drug promotion method

By The Associated Press

SYRACUSE, N.Y. — Bristol-Myers Co. is promoting a pain-killer containing codeine by promising a donation to a children's fund on behalf of doctors who prescribe it. The government says it has no objections, but some physicians are questioning the plan.

Bristol-Myers matches participating physicians with children through the Children Inc. charitable agency. Doctors get a picture and information about the child being helped and Bristol-Myers continues the relationship as long as the doctors continue to prescribe Bufferin 3 with codeine at least 30 times a month.

"Poverty. Now you can prescribe something for it," the promotional material states.

Some doctors have criticized the promotion, saying physicians might be encouraged to prescribe the preparation when it is not needed.

"This seems like a really sneaky way to push a drug," Brendan Coleman, director of an alcoholism and drug treatment program at St. Cabrini Hospital in Seattle, said last week.

"We as a profession are looking at a variety of methods to try to cut down on the use of codeine. I don't know if I want to promote narcotics addiction in Oregon to promote a feeding program somewhere else," said Dr. Hugh B. Johnston, past president of the Oregon Medical Association.

But Bristol Laboratories of Syracuse, the division of Bristol-Myers that makes Bufferin 3, said, "We do not believe this program will extend or expand the market for codeine-containing pain relievers."

The company said the program is designed only for doctors who already are planning to prescribe a codeine-containing aspirin or aspirin substitute.

Bufferin 3 is unlikely to be over-prescribed because its combination of aspirin and codeine is nauseating and would be tolerated only by people who genuinely need it, an American Medical Association official said Thursday in Chicago.

"That would be the least of my worries," said Dr. John Ballin, the AMA's director of drugs and technology. As for the promotion with Children Inc., Ballin said, "I would not want to comment whether that is a good practice or not."

Federal Trade Commission spokeswoman Collet Guerard said the FTC would be unlikely to intervene because the promotion does not seem to be deceptive or unfair.

"We would assume that doctors could withstand any pressure like that and only prescribe what is needed," she said.

Jeanne Clarke Wood, director of Children Inc., based in Richmond, Va., said she hoped publicity over the promotion would not harm the program.

Children Inc. works through schools, orphanages and welfare agencies in 26 countries to aid about 14,000 children, each of whom is matched with an individual donor, Wood said.

She said the Bristol-Myers tie-in would allow Children Inc. to sponsor about 2,000 more children, although she said Bristol-Myers is getting a discount from the normal $18 a month it costs to sponsor a child. She refused to say how large the discount was.

Bristol-Myers contacted Children Inc. in December, and doctors have enthusiastically supported the promotion since it began about two months ago, she said.

Jurors receive report of FBI investigations

By The Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — The judge in the John Z. De Lorean trial revealed Tuesday that some jurors had received from a congressman's office copies of a report critical of undercover FBI operations.

In Washington, meanwhile, an aide to the congressman, Rep. Don Edwards, D-Calif., said the FBI had been handed a letter postmarked from San Francisco which may have led to the mailings.

U.S. District Judge Robert Takasugi, obviously concerned about the impact on the trial, summoned attorneys outside the jury's presence to discuss the development.

He said some jurors told him that a document entitled "Executive Summary of Report on Undercover FBI Operations" was sent to them in envelopes from Edwards' office.

The Edwards aide, who asked not to be identified, said the letter handed to the FBI was dated June 20 and postmarked from San Francisco.

"It asked for copies of the summary to be mailed to 13 individuals in the Los Angeles area," the aide said. "We don't know whether or not they were the jury members...that's why we've handed it over to the FBI."

The aide declined to name the individual who sent the letter.

Edwards denied he had sent the summaries to jurors. His name appeared on the envelope because he was the chairman of the Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights, which generated the report.

The congressman, a critic of FBI undercover operations, led House examination of those activities earlier this year. He has said he believes undercover operations should be governed by the same judicial restraints that apply to such practices as wiretapping, in which warrants must be issued by a judge before an activity occurs.

One of the key issues in the case is the undercover "sting" operation which resulted in De Lorean's arrest on cocaine charges.

The judge, at the suggestion of the prosecution, then summoned jurors to the courtroom to ask how many had received the mailing and if it would impair their ability to continue serving in the trial.

Seven jurors said they believed they had received it. Only one woman said she had "glanced through it."

Edwards, whose district includes San Jose in northern California, said in Washington that his office sent copies of the report to everyone who requested one.

"Anybody who asked for a copy, and we had hundreds of requests, got a copy," Edwards told reporters as he left the House floor. "I have no idea how the jurors got copies. Their names and addresses, I understand, are secret."

Competency testing gains public approval

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — A majority of Americans support merit pay for good teachers, but an even greater number believe teachers should pass competency tests to get and keep their jobs, according to an Associated Press-Media General poll.

An overwhelming 95 percent of the 1,243 respondents in the nationwide telephone survey said public school teachers should be required to pass competency tests on the subjects they teach. Three percent disagreed and 2 percent said they were not sure.

Eighty-five percent said teachers should have to pass such exams periodically in order to keep their jobs.

Eighty-three percent said all students should be required to pass standardized test before they can graduate from high school.

A majority of those polled — 61 percent — said that teachers should be required to have an education degree even if they are well trained in their subject.

Thirty states now require teachers to pass competency tests before working in their public schools — double the number in 1982. Twelve other states are considering similar testing requirements for teachers.

Teachers unions generally oppose competency testing because it is not required for most other professions. They also argue that many of the skills required to be a good teacher cannot be tested.

On the question of pay, 72 percent of the respondents in the poll supported a merit pay system for teachers, with bonuses for better teachers; 22 percent said they do not support a merit pay system for teachers, and 6 percent said they were not sure.

Merit pay is supported by President Reagan and a growing number of state and local politicians throughout the nation who see it as a way of encouraging excellence in the classroom.

Low calcium may raise blood pressure

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — People who get high blood pressure tend to consume lower than recommended amounts of calcium and other nutrients found in dairy products, says a study that also raises questions about the role that sodium plays in the disease.

Researchers from Oregon Health Sciences University in Portland say a study of statistics gathered by federal health officials several years ago indicates that "calcium was the nutrient for which reduced intake was most consistent in hypertensive individuals."

In a report published Friday in the journal Science, the researchers say that high blood pressure, or hypertension, is more closely associated with deficiencies in certain nutrients than with excesses of others, including sodium.

The study's most controversial finding was one indicating an inverse relationship between salt or sodium intake and blood pressure. The data suggests that high sodium intake results in lower blood pressure, which is the opposite of what most other human and animal studies have found.

Dr. David A. McCarron and his colleagues at Portland said the findings "raise the important question of whether sodium restriction is routinely advisable in many hypertensives."

McCarron said in a telephone interview that new evidence indicates calcium may mediate the role of sodium in hypertension. He called for hypertension experts to re-examine the relationship between sodium and the disease.

"I don't want people to go out and eat a lot of salt now," he said, "but if they eat a balanced diet with the right amounts of dairy products, fruits, vegetables and fresh meats, there is a possibility that the sodium will have no effect (on blood pressure)."

However, other blood pressure experts advised interpreting the Portland results with great caution.

"This is just one study and I could fill a room with other studies that show a definite relationship between high salt intake and increased blood pressure," said Dr. William T. Friedewald of the National Heart, Lung and Blood Institute.

The Oregon researchers said consumption of dairy products, which are the principal sources of calcium and potassium in the American diet, provides the best gauge among various food groups of whether a person 34 or older had hypertension.

The findings suggest that if nutrients such as calcium and potassium protect against high blood pressure, they do so at current recommended levels.

McCarron says dairy product consumption has declined as health-conscious Americans seek to avoid fats, cholesterol and calories. As a result, he says, the intake of calcium and other nutrients found in these products has slipped below recommended level "for some individuals."

Kansas may raise age for all alcoholic drinks to keep federal funds

By T. RUSSELL-LORETZ
Collegian Reporter

After midnight Wednesday, Congress approved a bill which would force states to raise to 21 the drinking age for all types of alcohol or lose federal highway funds. It now goes to President Reagan, who has said he favors such a bill.

The legislation, which the Senate passed Tuesday, also would give additional highway safety funds to states enacting automatic jail terms and license revocations for convicted drunken drivers.

Before approving the legislation, 81-16, the Senate rejected a measure that would have eliminated the penalties for states failing to comply with the 21-year-old drinking age. The measure, rejected by a 62-35 vote, would have instead used extra highway funds to reward states. Senators Bob Dole, R-Russell, and Nancy Landon Kassebaum, R-Wichita, voted with the majority.

The House version of the bill, which passed June 7, did not include this incentive program. Congressional action was completed Wednesday when the House agreed by voice vote to accept the incentive program.

The bill sent the White House includes additional highway safety money for states that enact the automatic penalties against convicted drunken drivers; establish a computerized traffic record keeping system; and pass laws against drivers caught under the influence of drugs.

Congressional passage of a federal drinking age bill draws mixed reactions from Kansans.

States must raise their drinking age to 21 by 1986 or lose 5 percent of their federal highway-construction aid that year and 10 percent the next year.

Current Kansas law sets 18 as the drinking age for beer that is no more than 3.2 percent alcohol by weight, and 21 as the drinking age for all other alcoholic beverages. An attempt to raise the 3.2 beer drinking age to 19 was defeated during the last session of the Kansas Legislature.

Senator Merrill Werts, R-Junction City, was one of the chief opponents of a bill introduced in the Kansas Legislature to raise the drinking age for 3.2 beer. He said a federal drinking age bill is a form of coercion.

"I don't like it. I think it's terrible," he said. "They have no business telling us how to manage our drinking problems."

The Rev. Richard Taylor, president of Kansans for Life at Its Best, in an interview Wednesday said the Senate vote was "good news."

"I only regret that the Kansas Legislature, last session, did not have the courage to raise the drinking age," he said. "Of course, this was (due to) the powerful, successful beer lobby of Associated Students of Kansas (ASK) and the beer wholesalers."

Taylor said his organization is the leading proponent for raising the drinking age.

"We're not against alcohol. We're working for freedom from alcohol suffering. The issue is suffering," he said.

Taylor has worked since 1980 to raise the drinking age in Kansas. His group was founded 100 years prior to that as the Kansas Temperance Association. The same group was called the Kansas Anti-Saloon League and the Kansas United Dry Forces at various times throughout the group's history.

Taylor said that during the last session the bill should have been a simple bill on the floor, but it got mixed up in procedure.

"ASK and the beer wholesalers used the conference committee procedure to kill the bill," he said.

The Kansas drinking age bill was sent to a conference committee, but questions of parliamentary procedure were raised and the bill was never brought to the Senate floor.

Taylor also said ASK lobbying had helped defeat the state bill.

Tracy Turner, Student Senate chairman and former ASK Academic Affairs Committee chairman, said Wednesday the drinking age is a state's rights issue.

"I'm disappointed that the federal government feels it is necessary to take action on what has traditionally been a state's rights issue," he said. "In the past, each state has taken into consideration what it feels was best."

The fairness of raising the drinking age was one of the strongest points in ASK's argument, Turner said.

"Here in Kansas, although the measure has undergone considerable controversy, the 18-year-old drinking age is fair. It is not fair to take the right to drink away from the 18-year-old," he said. "If you are talking about drunk driving it is too simplistic to look at an 18-year-old drinking age. It is a problem that spans all ages."

Werts said he believes that the Kansas Legislature will pass a law to comply with the federal proposal.

"I expect a bill will be drafted in Kansas that conforms to the requirements in any action passed by the national congress," Werts said.

He added that he expects that next year a bill to raise the legal drinking age in Kansas will be "hotly debated." It is a bill that is brought up every year, he said.

Representative Joe Knopp expressed a similar view.

"I suspect that Kansas will not have the courage to make an independent decision," he said.

During the last legislative session, Knopp supported a 19-year-old drinking age as "appropriate." He said that he did not support raising the drinking age any higher than 19, but "that was before Tuesday's vote." Knopp said he would have to look at total highway fund penalties and other effects for Kansas.

However, Knopp said he did not see it as strictly an economic issue when it came to "looking out for a few who sell beer." He said that saving lives and curtailing pain and suffering far outweighed the cost to the

Congress passes major tax increase bill

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Congress reluctantly agreed Wednesday to the third major tax increase in three years, approving a bulky package of tax changes and spending cuts intended to erase about 10 percent of the $600 billion in federal budget deficits expected through 1987.

The measure was passed 268-155 by the House and by an 83-15 margin in the Senate. Despite a last-minute plea from President Reagan, only 76 House Republicans voted for it and 86 opposed it. Democrats split 192-69 in favor of the plan.

The measure goes to Reagan for his signature. He had written lawmakers earlier in the day that passage of the bill and other pending spending reductions "will help ensure that the economic recovery now under way is sustained in the months and years ahead."

The president found broad agreement with that message among congressional leaders. As Sen. Russell

B. Long, D-La., put it, "It would be a disaster to this country for word to go out that Congress will do nothing" about lowering the deficits.

The bill would require investors, savers, telephone users, drinkers and businesses to carry more of the burden of reducing the deficit.

Few of the hundreds of provisions in the bill would have a major effect on any taxpayer, and the measure would make no significant changes in the across-the-board tax cut enacted in 1981.

"This is a promising step toward equitable deficit reduction," said Rep. Dan Rostenkowski, D-Ill., chairman of the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee and manager of the bill.

He said failure to approve the measure would be interpreted "as a clear warning of economic crisis," including higher interest rates and a new round of inflation.

"If we can't do this, we indeed face a bleak fiscal future," added Rep. Barber Conable of New York, senior Republican on Ways and Means.

Rep. Jack Kemp, R-N.Y., denied the bill will do anything to bring down interest rates. "Let's keep this economy going, let's not raise taxes," he said.

The bill would raise taxes by about $50 billion through 1987 and cut the growth of federal spending by about $13 billion. More than $11 billion of the spending changes would be in social programs, chiefly in the big Medicare health care program for the elderly and disabled.

Medicare payments to doctors would be frozen for 15 months and beneficiaries would have to pay an extra $1.40 a month for Part B (doctors' fees) insurance by 1986.

Although most of the tax increases would fall on businesses and upper-income investors, one-fourth of the money would come from eliminating a new tax break for savers and by reducing the tax benefits available from income averaging.

The bill would extend the 3 percent federal tax on telephone service through 1987, raise the cost of a fifth of 100-proof liquor by 40 cents on Oct. 1, 1985, and raise the 9-cent diesel tax to 15 cents a gallon but allow car owners to get a full rebate of the increase.

It also would make it more difficult to take a tax write-off for expensive cars used for business and for home computers and other property used partially for personal use. It would grant a tax exemption to most common employer-paid worker fringe benefits, stretch out tax benefits for investment in most real estate and restrict use of tax-free bonds for commercial purposes.

At the same time, the measure would lower taxes for certain low-income working families with children by increasing the earned-income tax credit, and cut in half the minimum 12-month period that an asset, such as stock, must be owned before profits from its sale qualify for preferential tax treatment as a capital gain.

Teams discontinue missing plane search

By GARY NELSON
Collegian Reporter

Yet another clue has been uncovered on the possible whereabouts of Manhattan resident Jim Moore and the plane he was flying.

"We presume, because of what the pilot said at the Evanston (Municipal) Airport, he was going towards Jackson Hole (Wyo.)," said Cass Krauser, director of the Wyoming Aeronautical Commission in Cheyenne, Wyo.

The search was intensified around the Afton, Wyo., area because of radar indications that lead investigators to conclude Moore and the plane could have gone down in that area, Krauser said.

"The radar recordings show that the signal stopped near Afton," he said.

Krauser added it was possible that the plane flew below a level the radar could detect or behind large areas of rock.

"The area is extremely rugged," Krauser said, "and if Moore went down in this area it will take forever to find him."

Air search teams have been searching since Sunday for any evidence of wreckage, and Krauser said the teams have never stopped looking since they started.

In a phone conversation Wednesday with Barbara Moore, she expressed her worry and concern of the matter involving her husband.

"I think people would know how I feel," she said.

Krauser said the plane — white with brown trim — left the Evanston airport at 2:25 p.m. Friday and was assumed to be heading in the Afton direction.

Afton is approximately 55 miles south of Jackson Hole. The surrounding terrain is rugged, some areas snow covered and abundant with natural lakes. Krauser said the elevation of some of the peaks is around 13,000 feet.

At 5:25 p.m. Wednesday, the Wyoming Aeronautical Commission stopped their search due to a lack of new clues in where to look.

"I've suspended the operation at this time," Krauser said. "We're just sort of taking blind shots in the dark now as to where to look next."

Krauser said he had been in contact with others to help get ideas on where to look.

"I've spoken with the director of Idaho's Aeronautical Commission on the matter," he said, "and we're having difficulty on what the next bet should be."

"It's like looking for a needle in a haystack," he added. "We're doing our best."

The mystery behind the disappearance of the Manhattan pilot and the Cessna 414 twin-engine plane began Friday when the plane was last seen at the Colorado Springs Municipal Airport by tower officials.

Moore was to bring home four passengers — Jim Dickey, K-State head football coach; Phil Woodward, co-owner of the plane and president of Woodbern Inc.; Bernie Butler, the other owner of the aircraft and Manhattan businessman; and Joe Mills, Manhattan certified public accountant — after playing golf on Thursday.

The plane was last seen on radar at 10:52 a.m. Friday on Colorado Springs airport authorities.

Jackson arranges prisoner release

By The Associated Press

MANAGUA, Nicaragua — Democratic presidential candidate the Rev. Jesse Jackson said Wednesday that Cuban President Fidel Castro will free 26 political prisoners from Cuban jails when he releases 22 Americans on Thursday.

Jackson said Castro will provide a plane to fly both sets of prisoners to the United States if the State Department grants visas to the 26 Cubans and ground clearance in Washington is given the plane.

Jackson said no names of the Cubans will be made available until Thursday, but that all of their names appear on Amnesty International's list of political prisoners.

"Castro has already given the list to Mr. (John) Ferch, (head of the U.S. interest center in Havana). Now the ball is in the court of our State Department."

Jackson is asking for a meeting Friday with President Reagan to pass on to him information gathered on his five-day Latin American trip. Jackson said he also wants to meet with Secretary of State George Shultz.

Cuba. Castro accompanied Jackson to the airport and came aboard to greet reporters and crew members. He did not mention the Cuban prisoners, many of whom have relatives in the United States.

Jackson announced the development as the plane was departing from Havana's airport on the flight to Managua. Jackson implied that he had a message to relay to Reagan from Castro.

"We would hope President Reagan would be willing to listen and engage in a dialogue about our findings," Jackson said. "Apparently we have been able to move substantially further than the diplomats and messengers who have come this way."

Jackson said a list of more than 50 names of Cuban political prisoners was submitted to Castro during their discussions Tuesday, which lasted more than eight hours.

The Reagan administration Wednesday appeared to rule out Jackson's initiative on normalizing U.S.-Cuban relations.

Most of the 22 American prisoners were jailed on charges related to drug trafficking.

"Our concern is that given the cold war behavior and the hot war rhetoric, creating so much pain, loss of trade and loss of life, that the release of American citizens was a good faith gesture and should be responded to in kind," Jackson told reporters.

He and Castro announced their agreement in 10 areas at a dramatic news conference held in Cuba's Palace of the Revolution shortly after midnight Wednesday.

Asked about Jackson's proposal for normal diplomatic relations and about his invitation to Castro to visit the United States, White House spokesman Larry Speakes said: "We'd like to see some concrete examples of a change in behavior on the part of the Cubans" before entertaining such proposals.

Speakes suggested Castro "stop exporting revolution."

Most were held on charges related to drug trafficking and have been in custody around two years, according to the official.

At their joint news conference, Jackson said Castro agreed to an immediate exchange of ambassadors with the United States if acceptable to the Reagan administration. That would require re-establishment of formal diplomatic relations that were broken in 1961.

Congress passes religious meeting bill

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Senate voted 88-11 Wednesday to allow student religious meetings in public high schools, ignoring warnings of "bizarre cults" on school grounds that prompted the House to reject such a proposal.

The Reagan administration appeared to be backing away from efforts to include a proposed subminimum wage for teen-agers in the legislation, which would facilitate final passage of the religious meetings proposal.

A source close to the Senate leadership said that the administration wants the religious meeting proposal and the subminimum wage proposal faced a possible filibuster if attempts were made to attach it to the same legislation.

The bill approved Wednesday, similar to one defeated by the House last May, is supported by President Reagan and by many religious groups that opposed a proposed constitutional amendment, defeated by the Senate in March, that would have permitted organized prayer in public schools.

The bill is intended to give student religious groups equal opportunity to use school facilities during non-class hours, if the building also is available for other extracurricular groups.

In late efforts to fashion a widely acceptable proposal, the measure was broadened to prohibit schools from barring a student meeting on the basis of "religious, political, philosophical or other content of the speech."

Sen. Mark Hatfield, R-Ore., told the Senate, "We're talking about freedom of speech. Religion happens to be the triggering amendment."

Sen. Jeremiah Denton, R-Ala., said, "This amendment will, for the first time, make it clear that secondary school students engaging in religious speech have the same rights to associate together as do students who wish to meet to discuss chess, politics or philosophy."

Sen. Howard Metzenbaum, D-Ohio, disagreed, saying the bill would allow cults to use school facilities to proselytize and would encourage some students to tease and ridicule others who do not attend religious meetings.

"I don't know why anyone would want to force our schools to give access to bizarre cults," Metzenbaum told his colleagues.

Supreme Court defeats NCAA TV rule

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court on Wednesday broke the National Collegiate Athletic Association's exclusive control over televised college football games, and perhaps sparked a mini-revolution in the nation's TV-viewing habits.

The 7-2 ruling, which frees individual colleges to make their own television deals, undoubtedly will mean more games on TV, possibly in prime time on week nights.

The televising of college football games now may resemble more closely the scheduling of televised college basketball games, which are not regulated by the NCAA.

The decision also casts doubt on the value of the remaining two years of the NCAA's four-year, $281 million contracts with ABC, CBS and ESPN, the all-sports cable TV company.

It is now likely the networks will seek to negotiate a lower price for the NCAA games or back out of the contracts since the association no longer has exclusive rights to televised games.

Justice John Paul Stevens, in his opinion for the high court, said the NCAA's exclusive TV arrangement violated a federal antitrust law — the Sherman Act — by limiting the number of games on TV and by forcing the networks to pay a set price that could drop if individual schools negotiate on their own.

International club aids in donor search

By KRISTIE FABER
Collegian Reporter

An international student at the University of North Dakota needs a kidney transplant and the K-State International Coordinating Council (ICC) is helping.

Siamak Bastami, senior in electrical engineering at NDU, went to his doctor in Grand Forks, N.D., in January to be treated for pneumonia. It was then that he was told his kidneys were only 25 percent functional, Margaret Bondlie, secretary for the NDU International Student Office, said.

Bastami's doctor diagnosed and stabilized his condition so that he could be transferred to the University of Minnesota Hospital in Minneapolis, Bondlie said.

"Sia's doctor withheld all costs for his treatment and medication," she said.

Bastami is now living with a friend in Minneapolis. His doctors want him as close to the hospital as possible so that when they find a kidney for him he will be able to go to the hospital immediately, Bondlie said.

The news of Bastami's condition reached Manhattan when a K-State student brought a poster — telling about the needed kidney transplant — to the attention of Donna Davis, assistant foreign student adviser at K-State. Davis then took the matter to the ICC which decided to help.

Davis, along with three international students from K-State, attended the National Association for Foreign Student Affairs convention recently. At the convention they sold T-shirts to raise money for Bastami's operation, Davis said.

The T-shirts were designed by some K-State international students. The logo reads "Be International."

The ICC has already raised $60 in donations and $300 from the sale of T-shirts. The organization will be selling T-shirts in the Union this week to raise more money.

Originally the NDU International Student Office tried to raise $100,000 for Bastami's treatment; however, it worked with the Disabled Students Services Office and was able to receive funding from the state of North Dakota, Bondlie said.

"Sia was accepted by the Comprehensive Health Assurance of North Dakota (CHAND), a state-funded agency that provides health insurance for the uninsurable," Bondlie said.

Although Bastami is not a U.S. citizen, he has been a resident of North Dakota for five years. Because of this he was able to receive the help from CHAND, she said.

With the funds from CHAND, the NDU International Student Office only needs to raise $15,000. It already has $9,500 in private donations and donations made by other international organizations, Bondlie said.

"We even received a call from a woman who claimed to be a psychic healer in Los Angeles. She offered her services free of charge if Sia could fly out to California," Bondlie said.

The psychic healer said she had been successful in the past with kidney patients, she said. Bastami has one class left before he graduates. He is trying to take it through correspondence so that he can graduate, Bondlie said.

His father and mother are both in Iran at the present time. Bastami father is trying to get a visa to the United States so that he can be with his son, Bondlie said.

"They have already begun the search for a kidney and if one is found within three months there's a good chance he won't have to go on dialysis," she said.

Library friends form society

The K-State libraries have friends — a whole new group of them.

The Farrell Library Society, also known as the Friends of the Library, was organized in May and is working through the summer to help improve and support the K-State libraries.

"There are a lot of people around the campus, community and state who indicate that they would like to provide their own private support to the library. There are faculty and others who recognize the shortcomings of the library and they would like to help," said Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries.

At its first meeting in May, the society elected officers, selected committees and set its goals, Hobrock said. Robert Kruh, dean of graduate school, was elected interim chairman, and Sara Williams, head of the Farrell serials department, was elected interim secretary-treasurer.

A nominating committee was formed at the meeting to select nominees for permanent society officers. A committee to establish membership policies, a bylaws committee and a projects committee were also formed.

According to the library newsletter, Insider, one of the society's objectives is to assist in acquiring an appropriate commemorative volume by mid-1986 when the University libraries will celebrate acquiring their millionth volume. A second goal is to assist in planning and identifying funding for construction of an environmentally controlled rare book substructure in Farrell 315.

The society will also assist in strengthening the libraries' research potential, Hobrock said.

"It came to me from legislators in the last year to look to the private sector for support of the library. There are a few other nice things that we would like to do beyond the obligation of the state that a friends organization could contribute to," Hobrock said.

"I think the library has an obligation to contribute to the intellectual life of the University and the community which I think goes beyond just acquiring books and periodicals," he added.

'Crimes of the Heart' starts season

By GARY JOHNSON
Contributing Writer

The Summer Repertory Theatre got off to a strong start Tuesday evening with its opening night performance of Beth Henley's Pulitzer Prize-winning play, "Crimes of the Heart."

Review

The play is set in Hazelhurst, Miss. — a small Southern town — five years after Hurricane Camille. The setting for the entire play is the well-worn kitchen in the Magrath sisters' house. The play opens just after the youngest sister, Babe, has shot her political bigwig husband, Zachery, in the stomach. The only reason she can give for her actions is she just "didn't like his stinking looks."

Lenny, the eldest sister, is feeling the effect of her 30 years. She has no love interest and no prospects if she continues to devote her life to her sickly grandfather.

The third sister, Meg, returns home after learning of Babe's situation. Meg is a 27-year-old pop singer who had left for Hollywood five years earlier, but ended up working for a dog food company. Her strong language and bold sexual encounters tend to shock the community.

The plot revolves around how the sisters behave once they are together again. Old jealousies surface and rivalries develop, but the prime matter of concern is Babe's fate. She calmly admits, after some prodding from Meg, that she shot her husband because he confronted her about the affair she had been having with a 15-year-old black boy. The boy was "so, so good" she says.

Babe's situation serves as a impetus for the comedy. The drama's real crux, though, is provided by Lenny's inevitable entrance into old maid-hood unless she can change her ways.

The lead performances are all quite effective. Kathleen Pfister gives the role of Meg a flirtatious, larger-than-life quality that doesn't degenerate into simple-minded mugging. This could easily have been the result if Pfister wanted to milk her scenes for every laugh she could get, but she shows her stage experience by backing away from scene-stealing tactics.

At first look, Jacqueline Keller might seem much too pretty for the role of Babe — a childish innocence might have worked better — but she responds very well. As Babe's actions become increasingly absurd once the true circumstances surrounding the shooting are revealed, Keller carefully avoids turning Babe's flakey behavior into farce. When Babe describes how she calmly shot Zachery and then drank three large glasses of lemonade while he lay wounded on the living room floor — "Zachery, I've made some lemonade. Can you use a glass?" — Keller uses an indifference that makes her lines all the more effective.

The real stability for the drama is provided by Kelli Wondra. While the other actors are given most of the punch lines, Wondra must assume a quiet reserve. A lesser actress might have simply disappeared on stage, but Wondra allows the tension beneath her character's surface to show without stressing the point too strongly.

Some of the supporting performances don't fare nearly as well. This is largely a problem with Henley's play itself. It's as if Henley wasn't sure of her own plot and felt she had to add broad comedy to keep her audience interested. These supporting characters take the play in the direction of farce. This situation is further confused by farcical additions to the plot, such as the family horse having been killed by lightning. These flaws in Henley's play become somewhat amplified in the SRT production, but the flaws aren't large enough that any of the play's charm or wit are sacrificed.

The play works best in the subdued moments when the comedy is allowed to grow organically from the situations, and not from the antics of the supporting cast. The strengths in Henley's drama reside in the bits of dialogue that seem absurd but have a strange ring of truth.

"Crimes of the Heart" is a good choice for opening night; it provides plenty of laughs without seeming too heavy — which can be important in the sweltering confines of the Purple Masque Theatre. It's a well-directed and staged drama that isn't pretentious or dull.

Repertory theater to go on stage at 8 tonight

The K-State Summer Repertory Theatre will present "The Dining Room" at 8 tonight in the Purple Masque Theatre.

A.R. Gurney's play was considered by many critics as one of the 10 best plays of the 1982 season. In a series of short sketches, the play comically deals with the decline of a culture and the white Anglo-Saxon Protestants of the northeastern United States. In the play, six actors play a variety of characters which calls for them to switch ages from youth to old age.

"The Dining Room," which is directed by Lew Shelton, associate professor of speech and founder of SRT, will also be presented July 3, 6, 11, 14, 19, 24 and 27.

All shows start at 8 p.m. in the Purple Masque Theatre located in East Stadium. Tickets for the show are $3 for students and senior citizens and $4 for the general public.

All passengers survive boat sinking

By The Associated Press

QUEEN CHARLOTTE CITY, British Columbia — All 20 people aboard a U.S. charter boat that sank in heavy seas Wednesday off the Queen Charlotte Islands were rescued and flown here for treatment of hypothermia after spending six hours in life rafts, officials said.

The survivors, who were crammed into the two inflatable life rafts, were snatched up in a dramatic rescue by U.S. and Canadian Coast Guard helicopters and a giant passenger ship amid spray, 20-foot waves and 75 mph winds, officials said.

"It's just starting to hit us now," said passenger Jim Hussey, 63.

"The boat was rocking a lot, but I don't think anyone was that concerned," he said in a telephone interview from the hospital with KING-TV in Seattle.

One person was in serious but stable condition, and the others in satisfactory condition, according to a spokesman at Queen Charlotte Hospital.

Media influence requires more responsibility

To what extent does the electronic news media influence voter decisions? That is the question the United States House of Representatives addressed Tuesday. By a 361-65 vote, the House passed a resolution urging television journalists to end the early projections of election winners.

By passing this resolution, the House is paying closer attention to a problem that, potentially, may have far-reaching implications on the American political process.

American society is increasingly becoming dominated by television. People in this country spend a large segment of their waking hours using television for entertainment and for information. Because of this time investment, television has become a factor in the decision-making process for a large segment of the country's population.

Television carries a large responsibility to conduct ethical reporting of news events due to this incredible influence. But as technology in the medium has improved in recent years, television has gradually strayed away from this responsibility.

In 1980, the three major networks projected Ronald Reagan the winner of the presidential election over Jimmy Carter before the polls on the West Coast had closed. A large number of voters may have been influenced by this proclamation by the networks of Reagan's victory. It is doubtful that this influence would have affected the outcome of the presidential race, but the question of network accountability stemmed from that event.

In 1984, the issue of television influence has again surfaced, beginning with the Democratic primaries. It was argued by some political analysts that the outcome of primary elections may have been affected by the networks' method of interviewing voters leaving polling places and then announcing projections before some of the polls were closed.

Television executives have argued that the networks' chief responsibility is to report the news as quickly and accurately as possible. But in following this policy, the networks may be guilty of creating the news they so diligently report and, in turn, distort the election process.

Tuesday's resolution has no real influence over the electronic media — the networks are under no obligation to follow the suggestion of Congress and can continue their present policy of projecting early election winners. So in many ways the House act was only giving lip service to a problem that deserves more serious attention.

But as the 1984 presidential election in November approaches, the media need to realize they doesn't operate in a vacuum — they cannot separate themselves from society and only report the news as it occurs as quickly as possible. Unless this point is impressed more thoroughly on electronic journalists, the concept of elections as a fair process may be placed in jeopardy.

Event hype breeds ignorance of relevant news

A friend of mine and I were listening to the radio when the legendary Jackson "Victory" tour commercial came on for the millionth time. He said he was sick of hearing the name Jackson and refused to talk about them.

I asked him what he thought about the hype.

"I don't want to talk about it," he said.

I asked him what he thought about the promoters making millions of dollars off the concert.

"I'm sick of hearing about it," he replied. "I don't want to talk about it."

I then asked him the reason for all the violence in India; why have all those people been killed and why martial law was declared there.

"Got me," he said. "But if it has anything to do with getting tickets to see Michael Jackson, I don't want to talk about it."

Somewhere a sense of importance was lost. Maybe the subject of the Jackson's "Victory" tour was just fresh on his mind but his lack of knowledge of other subjects proved that what promoters have attempted to do has worked. Jackson is a household word. All the rest of the worldly events are simply non-existent.

Any mention of that concert and people turn into rabid dogs fighting to hear about the latest information

WAYNE PRICE
Collegian Columnist

as if they were waging war for the last morsel of food in an Alpo can. But something is lost and distorted with that kind of attitude.

Events must either be overly hyped or happen in the backyard for people to take notice. The media is constantly blamed for exploiting certain issues but that's only the hot dog on the stick; society has never had any problem eating it all up.

Some people might call that feeding of hunger a form of entrapment. Possibly it is, but people watch what they want to see, listen to what they want to hear and read about things they want to find out about. How stupid are people when they say, "I turn the channel but it's always the same old junk. There's nothing else to watch"? Is there a law that forces people to watch television or is there something exciting about self-abuse? Nobody ever forces an atheist to go to church and probably not very many go on their own.

Last semester the Collegian was catching flak for its constant negative coverage of the greek system. Surely everybody knew about greeks having loud parties, causing parking problems and the disadvantages of having a little sister organization. Some people fail to realize that headlines with the words killed, kidnapped, raped and molested are just parts of the refrigerator door; the mind and eyes provide the magnets. Headlines containing words like donate and charity attract enthusiasm as carrots and celery do to a person on a diet.

Maybe it's past entrapment, maybe it's like giving heroin to an addict. I don't think so. Regardless of what people thought about the Collegian's methods, more people were informed about the greeks' situation, which at the time was news. Another front page story at the time was on former California congressman Paul McCloskey, who was at K-State talking about the war in Iran and Iraq, which was also news at the time. People should have been informed about that. I wonder which story people were more knowledgeable about. Did more people know Collegian columnists Darcy Ward or Edee Dalke?

Advertisers decide what's on television based on a perceived want. That's why television programs like "Dallas" and the "Dukes of Hazard" remain on the air; people watch them. There are reasons, maybe poor ones, why television news cameras show emotionally wrought families after a family member has been killed. People watch it — with vigor. The station might be called immoral but immorality isn't a good enough reason to turn the set off. In fact, it's almost ironic, but most people would turn the set off if some juicy hard-core emotionalism wasn't shown on TV or printed in the newspaper. When George Brett madly chased an umpire after his pine tar incident, it was shown repeatedly and I doubt anybody turned the set off after the fifth or sixth time.

And so here we sit. Everybody knows Michael Jackson is coming to Kansas City. Meanwhile, people under 21 who like to drink should be concerned, the Kansas City Power and Light Company is seeking a rate hike and the prime lending rate is at 13 percent. And hey, the large federal deficit is really no problem, as long as you have four tickets to the Jackson concert and know how to breakeance.

Labor unions face greatest threat from within

Let's face it, the '80s have not been kind to labor unions. Reagan's election resulted in numerous attacks on cherished union programs such as the minimum wage and occupational safety. Economic conditions forced labor to accept pay cuts, instead of expected increases, just to keep their members from being laid off. Union membership has dropped to a record low. As Newsweek magazine observed in 1981, "Labor is facing more than just a decline in influence in Washington. It is declining everywhere."

But even more frightening to union leaders is the prospect that their biggest threat does not even come from outside, such as Reagan or the economy, but from within. In the beginning, unions sprang up as from the grassroots as protection against the unfair labor practices that arose in the 1920s and 1930s. But just like a watchdog that was fed too much and exercised too little, unions have grown fat and lazy. At one time, unions like the American Federation of Labor and the United Mine Workers fought hard for the needs of their members. But slowly the leadership of these organization became dominated by lawyers and professional negotiators, instead of mine workers and dressmakers.

Today when one "looks for the Union label," he usually finds rampant corruption and leaders who have developed an employer's viewpoint and are unable to relate to life on the assembly lines. The hierarchy of most unions are filled with individuals with degrees from Harvard and Yale, while the rank-and-file have been educated at the school of hard knocks.

Law professor Charles James, who once did a five-year internship in the UMW, explained the result of union unresponsiveness. "Wildcat strikes and various other breakdowns in the scheme of stable production are often the membership's response to a leadership unconcerned with their needs." A good example of the discrepancy between union leaders and workers is the rank-and-file's unwillingness to support the union leader's choice for president in 1980, Jimmy Carter.

BRAD RUSSELL

Unfortunately, the road to improving union responsiveness to workers' needs are hard and long. Internal union election practices make it practically impossible for the rank-and-file to elect a candidate of their choice. For instance, almost all of effective union campaigning is done through selective campaign mailings, however challengers of the incumbent leadership are not given a copy of the membership list. The lack of this list means that efforts to target a particular group on election day are impossible.

Furthermore, challengers must rely on outside financial assistance to help fund their campaigns, since the time requirements of campaigning are large and the ability of workers to take full leaves of absence is limited. This reliance on outsiders is used as a weapon against the challenger by incumbents, who paint the challenger as an agitator, outsider or traitor.

Finally, most union newspapers are controlled by the incumbents, who appoint the editors, write articles and are the subject of most of the newspapers' material. Challengers are, with few exceptions, denied access. And the coverage they do receive is sometimes less than flattering, with one union newsletter referring to the opposition as, "...flunkies, character assassins, racists, and finks" who "pollute the waterfront with propaganda" against the leadership.

Fighting against these huge odds makes union challengers seem like Sisyphus of the ancient Greek myths. Sisyphus was once sentenced by the gods to perpetually push a huge boulder to the peak of a mountain only to have it roll back down the hill once he had completed the task. For those seeking to defeat union incumbents, the process must seem just as futile. Fortunately, change is not difficult to achieve.

Clearly, the federal government should pass laws that safeguard the fairness and equality of union elections. Membership lists should be provided to all candidates and newspaper coverage should be equal and unbiased. After all, elections are symbolic of the organizations in which they are held. And the union elections held today symbolize nothing more than a hardware store screw.

Editor,

Re: Headline in Monday's Collegian, "Mondale seeks possible running mate."

Shouldn't somebody be reading the copy that comes across the wire thrown on the page before slapping a headline on it? If anyone else read the story, they too, would have discovered that it had nothing to do with the headline. Instead it talked about the community where Mondale now lives in Minnesota.

It is true, Mondale is seeking a possible running mate, but I doubt that he's looking for that person in North Oak, Minn.

Better keep both your eyes open.

Apathy stays despite abuse

Editor,

Does the "drinking age issue haunt Kansans," or do the tragedies from drinking alcoholic beverages haunt Kansas and the United States?

I heard Ralph Nader speak to a college audience and he was pointing out all that needed to be done in the field of consumerism to improve the lot of consumers. The students would clap and cheer with his comments time and again.

Then he shifted the emphasis of his talk to the environment, pollution and ecology. He pointed out that it would be a hard, tough battle to clean up the environment, but that the students could clean up the pollution immediately in their own lives if they would give up the products of Schenly Distillers and Reynolds Co. He was met with a burst of silence. Where the students had little impact on cleaning up pollution they were eager to do so, but where they could clean up pollution in their own lives instantly, they were not interested.

Unwanted guest calls on Gatlin

NASHVILLE — Country music singer Larry Gatlin had an unexpected visitor to his hospital room — a "glib" parolee who disguised himself as a doctor and talked his way in.

Police said Gary Charles Smith, 31, of Marietta, Ga., was jailed in lieu of $1,000 bond on a charge of criminal trespass after visiting Gatlin at Southern Hills Hospital. The singer is being treated for hepatitis.

Police Lt. Bill Hamblin said Smith, paroled on a cocaine conviction, called Gatlin and identified himself as a doctor, and Gatlin gave him his room number. He said when Smith showed up later Tuesday, Gatlin realized he made a mistake and asked Smith to leave, which he did.

Dylan draws crowd of 25,000

MADRID — At least 25,000 Spaniards flocked to see American singer Bob Dylan in his first Spanish concert, a two-hour performance that didn't start until 1 a.m. Wednesday, two hours late.

In an editorial Wednesday, Madrid's leading daily El Pais called the 43-year-old singer's appearance "living nostalgia," but complained that it had taken so long for Dylan to visit Spain.

Large-scale rock concerts did not become common in Spain until after the death of Gen. Francisco Franco in 1975 and the return two years later to parliamentary democracy.

Jacksons tune up in Birmingham

BIRMINGHAM — Michael Jackson's concert tour equipment was ready and waiting Wednesday at the Birmingham Civic Center, but it's only for rehearsals and the sessions won't be open to the public.

Jackson and his brothers plan to use the civic center for rehearsals before the scheduled July 6 start of their 16-city tour, which kicks off in Kansas City and is being sponsored by Pepsi-Cola, said Peyton Lee, vice president of the local Pepsi bottler.

The Jackson brothers arrived Tuesday.

Schirra recalls Gemini 6 decision

DENVER — The crew of the shuttle Discovery spent 45 minutes in their craft rather than making an emergency exit after the rockets were shut down, and former astronaut Wally Schirra recalls that he made a similar decision not to eject in 1965.

The launch of Gemini 6 was aborted in December 1965 when an electronic plug dropped out of the tail of a Titan 2 rocket 1.6 seconds after the engines ignited, 1.4 seconds sooner than scheduled.

Schirra, 61, now a Colorado businessman who was commander of Gemini 6, said he relied on a "sixth sense" not to eject the capsule containing himself and co-pilot Tom Stafford.

Dairy cows make milk to music at K-State's research farm

By KEM ARST
Collegian Reporter

The staff at the K-State dairy teaching and research center has yet to discover if cows give more milk while listening to Michael Jackson's "Beat It" or Jim Stafford's "Cow Patty," but some believe that music may contribute to greater milk production.

The research herd at the center serves as a vital learning source for many faculty and students, but the average cow in this herd will produce 16,616 pounds of milk per year.

This summer 154 cows are producing milk and by fall the herd is expected to be up to 200.

Most of the milk goes through the K-State dairy plant and is sold as milk and dairy products, such as cheese and ice cream. A majority of the products go to the Call Hall dairy bar and the rest is used to supply the residence halls. In the summer months, the herd produces 2,000 pounds of milk a day which exceeds campus needs. The excess milk is sold to cheese manufacturers in Wamego and Alma, according to Mary Schmidt, herdsman at the research center.

"I don't think many people realize that we are one of the few universities left in the country that maintains a dairy bar using the milk from the University farm," Schmidt said. Milking shifts begin at 9:30 a.m. and end at 2:30 p.m. and then start again at 9:30 p.m. and end at 2:30 a.m.

"I guess our hours seem strange because most farms milk at 5 in the morning and 5 at night," Schmidt said, "but here all of our milking is done by civil servants."

"We have three teams of two people each and if they start milking at 9:30 in the morning, then that means they start at 8 in the morning so one of the shifts is on a normal 8 to 5 schedule, whereas if we started at 6 in the morning and 6 at night, both shifts would be off. We try to make it as convenient as possible," Schmidt said.

Milkers work 10 consecutive days, then are off for five days. Then they work 10 nights in a row and are off for five nights, so they work a total of 20 days a month with 10 days off. "Milking is a very stressful job. You are in the parlor and you really have to pay attention. It is not the kind of job you can kick back at. You have to be alert at all times and that's really stressful on people. Our milkers are all very dedicated; everybody here works together as a team," Schmidt said.

Dan Umsheid, a milker for three years, enjoys being around the animals and said his job is never boring. Between the milking and the research being done, there is always something new to learn, he said.

According to Schmidt, other responsibilities of the milkers include maintaining the appearance of the building and the herd, as well as feeding and general care of the machinery.

"(This is) a research herd and so that puts a lot of constraints on our milking procedure," Schmidt said.

Schmidt added, that depending upon the research being done, up to 10 different lots of cows are milked at one time. Each lot must be brought up and milked separately. Milk weights are recorded at each milking.

"It is a very slow process but the herd is doing better than ever before," Schmidt said. "This is a really good herd, because research can really take a toll on production but still our cows are producing really well."

Schmidt attributes the high production level to the care given to the herd.

"We stress kind behavior to our animals. If you want to get in trouble with me, let me catch you beating a cow. Everyone who works out here likes animals and we have a very gentle herd. We also play rock and country music in the parlor which lessens stress, both for the workers and the cows. The cows really like the music, and I believe this contributes to them giving so much milk," Schmidt said.

The average cow weighs 1,500 pounds.

She explained that the average cost of keeping a cow in the herd is $1.25 per day, but the cost can go up or down, depending on the amount of milk the cow gives.

"A cow giving 100 pounds of milk a day will need 40 pounds of grain and 20 pounds of hay to maintain its strength, but once a cow is producing that much milk, it is more than paying for itself," Schmidt said.

The average milk-producing span of this herd, according to Schmidt, is 3.6 years and all breeding is done within the herd so there is never a need to bring cows in from outside sources.

"Most of our cows will have around two lactations (the time in which milk is secreted) but one of our finest cows is starting its 10th lactation, and we even have a few 11- and 12-year-olds, that are still producing," Schmidt said.

It may never be known if rock or country music really cause a herd to produce more milk, but with the combination of dedicated workers and a few good tunes, the dairy farm will keep jammin' till the cows come home.

Staff/Chris Stewart

Dan Umsheid, milker for the K-State dairy teaching and research center, prepares another cow for milking Tuesday. The center provides much of the milk consumed on campus.

Carol Darling holds one of the dolls she has made called, Super Teddy. Darling has been making her stuffed cloth dolls, each with a different face and clothing, for 14 years.

Little Darlings

Carol Darling spends a lot of time with her "Little Darlings," and for children and adult doll collectors alike, it's well worth it.

Darling, a Manhattan resident, has been making dolls for about 14 years, and has been sewing since she was 3 years old.

Darling grew up in West Bondstable, Mass., and first got interested in doll making when she worked in a clothing construction store in Amherst, Mass.

"Some of the ladies I worked with were making dolls as presents for their children. They showed me what they were doing and I really got interested," she said.

The Darlings moved to Manhattan in the fall of 1983 and during the move all of the doll patterns and materials were lost so she had to start her doll making from scratch.

The first dolls Darling made were Raggedy Ann and Andy dolls, and because she received so many compliments on her creations from friends and relatives, she began making dolls for them and their children.

Soon she had more orders than she could do "just for fun," so she began to sell the dolls. Eventually Darling had a collection of many doll patterns and had experimented with many different styles and types of things to do to make each doll unique.

"Dolls are the best-selling toys in the United States and next best-selling are teddy bears — any kind of dolls or teddy bears," she said.

Just recently Darling began working on teddy bears. She has made what she calls her "Super Teddy," a red-caped bear wearing the monogram "ST." She has plans to make many other types of teddy bears for the Christmas season.

Darling gets her materials, "wherever I find something that appeals to me or I see something that would be a compliment to my dolls."

The doll bodies are handmade from cloth material and then stuffed. Darling stencils each doll's face on individually to give each one a special character.

The hair is a piece of fur, cut to "fit the doll's personality," she said.

She then constructs the clothing, which is removable so different outfits can be interchanged.

"Many times I have people come to me and say 'I like that doll, but I would like to have the blue dress instead of the red one — to match my child's room,'" Darling said.

"By making different clothing I can suit my customers' needs and the dolls can have many sets of clothing," she said.

Most of the dolls are sold through displays at craft shows in the area, although some of the dolls are sold in retail stores on the East Coast, where Darling began making the dolls.

She first displayed her dolls at an Ohio craft show to which she and other craftspeople had been specifically invited.

Darling's "Kansas Doll," was created to signify a Kansas country girl. She has made this doll, which wears a calico bonnet and a pinafore dress, since she moved to Kansas and she said they have been selling very well.

Although Darling said her dolls are "not really expensive," (most of them sell for about $25) she said most of the people who buy them are people past 30 years of age.

"Many times people tell me they are buying a doll for their grandchild but they say 'I like it so well it's going to stay at my house,'" she said.

All of the Darling dolls have been given a name, which is placed on a tag attached to each doll. Some of the dolls are made as a set, but can be sold individually.

"My favorite doll is a boy named Franklin," she said. "Every one I make seems to sell very quickly. I guess I shouldn't tell people he's my favorite."

"The boy dolls are fun to make because I have two sons. They like to give me suggestions of different things to do to make the dolls different. Some people think boys don't play with dolls, but I sell a lot of my boy dolls and teddy bears for boys to play with."

The dolls are from 11 to 16 inches tall and the teddy bears are approximately 25 inches tall.

The dolls are made to be very durable. "Try to pull off one of the eyes," Darling said. "I make them very well so they will last and can withstand years with a child."

She graduated from the University of Massachusetts with a degree in fashion merchandising and now is a full-time homemaker.

"I am the type of person who needs to be doing something all the time. When we sit around in the evening and watch television, I sit and work on dolls. There is a lot of hand work in each doll."

Each of the dolls, Darling said, takes approximately eight hours to complete.

"It just depends how many times I have made the particular doll and what type of material I am working with," Darling said.

"During the school year when my children and husband (David, an assistant professor of extension community development) are in school all day, I sew from 9 in the morning to 4 in the afternoon when my kids come home."

"I love this type of work because to me it's not work," Darling said. "It's fun. I can come and go as I wish and still be accomplishing something."

Darling puts together another version of the Super Teddy doll in her sewing room.

The doll Jed is dressed in Kansas attire.

Tai chi exercise tunes body, mind

By LORI WONG
Collegian Reporter

Long before anyone ever heard of the Jane Fonda Workout or jazzercise, another exercise program, tai chi chuan was developed and adopted by millions of people.

Unlike the Jane Fonda Workout and jazzercise, tai chi requires no strenuous calisthenics. Instead, tai chi is characterized by extreme slowness, silence, absolute continuity of movement without any breaks or pauses, and a concentrated awareness of what one's body is doing at all times.

Tai chi chuan (tie jee chahn), a system of total body exercise combined with self defense, is being taught in a University for Man course by Tom Graham, graduate in computer science.

"I was involved in martial arts before tai chi. I decided to take the class because it made sense to begin at the beginning," Graham said. "The principles of tai chi are applicable to all the martial arts or any kind of exercise for that matter."

Tai chi was born during the Taoist Movement, during which government leaders placed great emphasis on obtaining the total physical potential of the body.

Chang San-Feng is credited by Edward Maisel, teacher of tai chi and author of "Tai Chi for Health," as the founding father of this exercise system. It is recorded in Maisel's book that after San-Feng taught the system to a member of the Chan clan, it remained a secret within the clan for 14 generations spanning some 420 years.

Today, millions of Chinese practice tai chi. In large public squares, parks or in their own homes, the Chinese faithfully practice tai chi, often twice daily. In the United States, the exercise system is popular on the West Coast and has generated interest across the country through classes such as the one offered by the UFM.

"Tai chi is gaining popularity really fast. That's good and bad. Tai chi is appealing because it looks easy, and that can turn it into something it's not," Graham said. "The Chinese are really protective of the art because it's a really special thing. If it becomes commercialized in the United States, it's going to be ruined."

The Chinese words "tai chi" refer to the whole circle made up of the Yin and Yang. The Yin Yang symbol is a circle parted in the middle with a serpentine line. One half is dark and it represents feminine and negative. The other half is white and it represents masculine and positive. Tai chi refers to the whole circle in its two necessary and complementary parts.

The Chinese word "chuan" means "fist." To the Chinese, the word "fist" represents the use of the entire physical self, nothing excluded.

Tai chi is not a dance or a performing art. There is no music or musical beat to move to as there is in the Jane Fonda Workout and jazzercise. Tai chi is often called a self-defense art but according to Graham, it is not.

"It's more of an exercise rather than a self-defense art. It's getting in tune with your body," Graham said. "The philosophy is that if you really know how your body moves, the self-defense, when needed, will come naturally."

Tai chi is made up of a series of specific, learned movements called forms. There are 108 forms in the classic style of tai chi, many of which are repetitions or variations of 37 basic movements. The forms bear names which describe the movement. Examples of form names are, stork spreads wings, grasp birds tail left, hit tiger at right, and step back and repulse monkey.

Lee Shih Wu, Manhattan resident, demonstrates the forms and helps teach the UFM class. As she teaches the forms she tells her students how to move by comparing the movement to something they are familiar with.

"Soft. Step out like a cat's foot," Wu said.

Wu also stresses the relaxation necessary to perform tai chi.

"The first thing about tai chi is that you have no mind in brain. Forget about what happen before. Forget where happen. It's like inner work," she said.

The forms take different lengths of time to learn, depending on the ability of the student to learn the movements. Once the basic forms are learned, the tai chi student can continuously improve the movements by stressing the mental aspect of the exercise.

To some, the mental conditioning of tai chi is more appealing than the physical conditioning.

"It's definitely a mental, as well as physical, exercise. Tai chi is supposed to be a mind-body-spirit kind of thing," Graham said.

A's use 5 homers to drop Kansas City, 9-5

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Dwayne Murphy belted two home runs and Davey Lopes, Dave Kingman and Rickey Henderson also homered to carry the Oakland A's to a 9-5 trouncing of the Kansas City Royals Wednesday night.

Steve McCatty, 5-6, picked up the victory amid the long-barrage while the loss went to Larry Gura, 8-4, who surrendered just one of the homers. The A's scored at least one run in each of the first seven innings.

Murphy led off the fifth with a home run off Joe Beckwith and then hit his 15th homer off Mike Jones in the ninth.

Lopes smacked his seventh homer in the second. Later in the inning, Kingman, who delivered a sacrifice fly in the first, added an RBI single.

Henderson belted his ninth homer in the sixth and Kingman hit his major league-leading 20th home run in the seventh.

Doubles by George Brett and Jorge Orta gave the Royals a run in the first, then Don Slaught walked and scored on Buddy Biancalana's triple in the second.

Biancalana's groundout drove in a run in the fourth, and the Royals scored twice in the eighth on an RBI double by Pat Sheridan and Orta's run-scoring single.

The Royals, who dropped 3 of 4 games in the Oakland series, will take a day off before opening a three-game home stand Friday against the New York Yankees at Royals Stadium.

Seminar topics focus on leadership ideas

Employee creativity was one of many topics discussed during a seminar last night in the Union Big Eight Room.

Richard E. Vaden, professor of management, spoke and demonstrated to approximately 20 people, about "Good Leadership or Good Management — What Do Employees in a Small Business Want?"

When asked how employee creativity should be incorporated into a small business, Vaden said "the creativity has to be organizationally oriented."

"You can't have an employee putting a fender on a wheel just because he feels it's creative," he said.

Vaden discussed the difference between management and leadership, how employee motivation can fail for a small businessman, the styles of traits in leadership, and how to best select the style that best fits the needs of one's small business.

One participant in the seminar was Chuck McLeod, president of MacFeg Enterprises Inc. of Junction City and also president of the Minority Businessmen's Association in Junction City. McLeod said he noted specific points made on the psychology involved with small businessmen and their employees.

"I think the general tone has been good and sound," McLeod said.

Roger Williams, director of the K-State Printing Service, was another participant in the seminar and added another statement concerning employee motivation.

"You must offer more incentives to employees now," Williams said. "I believe this is important."

The seminar was sponsored by the K-State's Small Business Development Center, Manhattan Chamber of Commerce and Small Business Administration.

Vaden has a bachelor's degree in business administration from the University of Texas and his master's and doctoral degrees from Texas Tech University. He has taught at Texas Tech and K-State and he was assistant to the secretary of the Board of Regents at the University of Texas and industrial relations representative for the Kaiser Aluminum and Chemical Corporation.

Drink

Manhattan economy.

The issue is one of a state's rights, Knopp said. He said he believed a number of states would view the pressure to raise the drinking age as the last straw in a series of federal mandates — such as the 55 mph speed limit — which deny states the power to set their own laws without fear of penalty.

Knopp said he believed Congress had overreacted.

"There are other things that can be done, and should be done," Knopp said.

Raising the age for purchasing beer to be consumed off the premises is one measure which could be taken. Another is prohibiting the sale of cereal malt beverages at any establishment which sells gasoline, he said.

Knopp said that he is convinced that around Manhattan, there will be a lot of driving to the edge of town to drink beer in order to avoid detection. He said he believes there will be more keg parties at Tuttle Creek Lake or at private residences of 21-year-olds, where it will be more difficult to police the situation.

Brad Harrelson, manager of Charlie's Neighborhood Bar in Manhattan, said Wednesday he believed that if the proposed legislation becomes law, and Kansas legislators succumb to federal pressure for a 21-year-old drinking age, that the use of fake IDs would increase. This would present an enforcement problem for the taverns.

A 21-year-old drinking age would be difficult to enforce, Werts said.

"There will be less drinking in taverns and more (drinking) in cars," he said. "At the tavern or in the store, liquor can be more easily controlled. Those who are under 21 will want to drink it somewhere, either in the park or in their car."

The bill proposed by the Kansas Legislature to raise the drinking age to 19 included a grandfather clause so drinking rights would not be taken away from those already 18. However, that proposal was for an age difference of only one year, Werts said.

"It's one thing to grandfather in one year. It's quite a different thing to grandfather in three years," he said. He added that he could not speculate on how a grandfather clause would work in such a case.

Taylor said that the Kansans for Life at Its Best was sending out questionnaires to all Kansas legislators up for re-election this year.

Included in the questionnaire is a position statement which reads "To reduce highway injuries and deaths, I will support a legal age of 21 for all alcoholic beverages in Kansas. We should do this because it is right, not because of pressures from Washington."

Taylor said his group has asked all candidates to circle "yes" or "no" to indicate whether or not they will include this position statement in their campaign. He said he expects responses to come back within the month.

Terry Ray, of Ray Enterprises in Manhattan, said he does not see the Kansas Legislature going against the mandate by Congress.

"In the past, when the Kansas Legislature has been up against losing federal funds, they have always acted to prevent that loss," he said.

Ray said it was premature to speculate on any measures which might come up, but added that as an Aggieville property owner, he was concerned about the possibilities.

Ray recently sold his business interests in several Aggieville bars. He said the possibility of a nationwide 21-year-old drinking age did not "in any way" play a part in his decision to sell his businesses. But he did express his disappointment with the bill.

"I'm disappointed that the federal government chose to put the federal government's standards onto the states," he said.

Harrelson said that Charlie's Neighborhood Bar, which serves 3.2 beer, will "continue operating under the premise that nothing will change until we are notified that the legal drinking age (in Kansas) is 21. Upon that notification, it is really up in the air as to what our plans will be."

Harrelson also added that before the Kansas Legislature raises the drinking age, he feels that analysis should be done to determine whether the state will lose more revenue when it loses the liquor tax from 3.2 beer sales than the federal highway funds.

Reagan plans affect black, blue-collar voters

Trip seeks working class support

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Even before his re-election campaign formally gets under way, President Reagan sets out this week to renew his appeal to the traditionally Democratic blue-collar voters who helped him to an electoral landslide four years ago.

Reagan's tour will take him from a stock car race in Florida to a Fourth of July festival in Alabama to an auto plant in Michigan. The trip, with the exception of a fundraiser in Decatur, Ala., is being billed as official and is being funded mostly by the taxpayers and not Reagan's re-election campaign.

When combined with what now are only preparations for a later journey to a convention of campers and recreational vehicle owners in Kentucky, the presidential itinerary cuts a wide swath through Middle America, where the president's political strategists expect the 1984 campaign to be won or lost.

"The key audience in 1980 and again this year is the blue-collar worker, who can be a union member but doesn't have to be, who can be Catholic but doesn't have to be, and may be an ethnic but doesn't have to be," said one White House strategist, speaking on condition he not be further identified.

Frank Donatelli, Reagan's White House liaison with organized labor, acknowledged that the president doesn't tell each group the same thing, but he, too, emphasized the consistency of the message.

"It's the same overall pitch to all of them," the labor adviser said. "Now, clearly, there would be some issues you would only emphasize with one group or another. For instance, tuition tax credits. You wouldn't talk to a union audience about that. You would obviously talk to a Catholic audience about that."

"If you're talking to ethnics, you'd probably want to lay pretty strong emphasis on the foreign policy aspect because chances are they are immigrants from a nation that's either now communist or was once threatened with being communist," he said.

The Reagan strategist who spoke on condition of anonymity predicted that in the weeks to come, the president's blue-collar pitch will focus on the industrial states that Mondale strategists agree the Democrat must carry if he is to beat Reagan.

"You've got eight states (from Michigan and Illinois on the west to New Jersey and Connecticut on the east), six of which are among the top 10 in population," the official said. "That's really where your target audience is concentrated. If you look at your political map, you can assume we're going to do well in the West and Florida and Texas. Then all you have to do is split those industrial states, and you've got a majority (of electoral votes) right there."

Public receives 'coded' messages

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — President Reagan, who will not be addressing the 75th annual convention of the NAACP, apparently sends coded racist messages to American whites, NAACP executive director Benjamin L. Hooks said Sunday.

"I think the American public is receiving coded messages," Hooks said at a wide-ranging news conference before today's kickoff of the weeklong celebration of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in Kansas City.

"I'm not quite sure Mr. Reagan is sending them, but you can't receive what's not being sent," Hooks added.

"He knows what he's doing. I met with the man. The man is not dumb like some of you are thinking."

The signals, Hooks said, include the administration's push for the recent Supreme Court decision that reinforced the last-hired, first-fired doctrine. The message there, Hooks said, is "white males, this is your day."

And there are those who "loudly and clearly" send messages "that are not coded that they are going to stop the progress of black people."

Part of the problem, Hooks said, is that the president "has a propensity to appoint people to agencies they don't know anything about."

However, he said it was not a snub that neither Reagan nor Vice President George Bush will address the convention, as they both have done in the past.

Reagan, however, must be defeated in November, and can be despite his increasing popularity, Hooks said.

"It will be difficult," Hooks said, but a coalition must come together, such as the one that served Franklin Delano Roosevelt — of labor, women, Hispanics, blacks and progressives.

One of the goals of the NAACP is to increase voter registration as part of its effort to defeat Reagan. Registration efforts will continue past the convention, with deputy registrars working at Kansas City's Arrowhead Stadium when the family of singer Michael Jackson performs next weekend.

On another topic, Hooks complained about news coverage afforded Minister Louis Farrakhan, the Nation of Islam leader who has made remarks about Israel that have caused consternation among Jewish and national Democratic Party leaders.

Hooks said that "any minute of the day, Minister Farrakhan can get more press time than" all of the major civil rights leaders put together.

He said it was time to put the issue to rest and stop badgering civil rights leaders every time Farrakhan made a statement.

Also at the convention, the Rev.

Years of military control could end

Guatemalans vote to outline charter

By The Associated Press

GUATEMALA CITY — Guatemalans voted Sunday for a National Assembly to write a new constitution that could lead to general elections next year and an end to nearly three decades of military domination of the government.

The new constitution will be this Central American nation's eighth. It will replace one suspended in 1982 after a military coup and ignored after another coup the following year.

Gen. Oscar Humberto Mejia Victores, Guatemala's chief of state, has said elections for a president and congress will be scheduled after the assembly writes the constitution.

Seventeen political parties, nine of them recently formed, ran 1,179 candidates for the assembly's 88 seats.

First results were not expected until late Sunday.

Despite a lackluster campaign, Guatemala City's streets were crowded with people out to vote.

About 2.5 million of the nation's 7.5 million people are registered to vote and a 50 percent turnout was expected.

A fine of $5 can be levied on eligible voters who fail to cast ballots.

Political observers have predicted the largest number of assembly seats will go to a coalition of the conservative National Liberation Movement and the National Authentic Central.

Depending on the number of vote challenges, the assembly could be installed in August, and have its work completed in time for general elections to be conducted as early as March 1985.

Guatemala has been ruled by a series of military-controlled governments since 1954.

Mejia Victores, who took power after a coup in 1983, said the assembly's power will be strictly limited to writing the new constitution and electoral and habeas corpus laws, although some political leaders claim they will seek broader powers for the body.

Civilian political leaders have said the assembly may become a testing ground to determine how much power the military is willing to relinquish.

The election comes at a time when the Guatemalan economy is in trouble, due to adverse international market conditions, and domestic insecurity spurred by years of entrenched political violence from the right and left.

But a long-running leftist insurgency appears to have been largely contained by a government drive against leftist opponents that human rights groups have called a "scorched earth" campaign.

Kremlin refuses to link weapons talks

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Reagan administration said Sunday it was disappointed by the Kremlin's initial refusal to link negotiations on nuclear and anti-satellite weapons, but it held out the hope Soviet leaders would change their minds.

"We remain ready to sit down with the Soviets," the State Department said in a statement read by spokesman Joseph Reap.

The statement expressed "regret" at the reaction by the Soviets, made public Sunday by the official news agency Tass, within 36 hours of a White House proposal to link the various sets of weapons talks.

But Reap added: "We expect to continue to discuss this question with the Soviets through diplomatic channels."

At the White House, deputy press secretary Peter H. Roussel, also said the administration was seeking further word from the Soviets. "We hope to have a more serious and considered response," he said.

Meanwhile, a White House official said President Reagan was prepared to bring up the issue informally with Soviet Ambassador Anatoly F. Dobrynin at a White House barbecue for the diplomatic corps Sunday night.

"I believe the president will be saying to Dobrynin, 'What's wrong? You wanted to talk. Why can't we talk?'" said the official, who spoke on the condition that he remain anonymous.

As dean of the diplomatic corps, Dobrynin was to have been seated at the president's table in the East Room. The barbecue was originally scheduled for the South Lawn, where picnic tables were set up. But the threat of rain forced the event indoors.

"This is an opportunity for the president to say to the Soviet ambassador privately and in a social setting...that we are ready to deal with them and on this issue we have changed our position and have said we will discuss space weapons, so we would hope they will follow up on their own proposal," said the official.

The White House official said that while the administration would prefer to go to Vienna knowing the superpowers would discuss resuming nuclear arms reduction talks, as well as space weapons, it would be willing to go regardless.

The official said the administration doesn't know when it will receive the private, diplomatic response from the Soviets.

Copper miners revolt on strike anniversary

By The Associated Press

CLIFTON, Ariz. — State police in riot gear posted sharpshooters on hills and lined the main highway of this strike-torn copper town Sunday as they cleared away smoldering barricades after a night of violence.

Many troopers withdrew after the road was cleared, leaving three groups of 15 officers each at strategic points along the road. During the violence the night before, six officers were injured and 20 demonstrators were arrested.

The melee broke out after a rally marking the first anniversary of a strike against the Phelps Dodge Corp.'s main mine and smelter in neighboring Morenci.

Despite the bitter strike that began July 1, 1983, the nation's second-largest copper producer has continued to operate the mine.

A police helicopter circled at dawn Sunday as 80 to 100 troopers escorted a highway crew clearing U.S. 666 of smoldering barricades of tires and railroad ties and re-opened the road from the mine.

A few glum demonstrators offered no resistance, and about half the troopers returned to their base by 6:30 a.m.

Clouds of black ash rose from the highway Sunday as cars resumed travel, and state police spokesman Allan Schmidt of the Department of Public Safety said 286 troopers were ready to keep it open.

"We're not going to have any more of what we've had, and we'll stay here forever if we have to," he said.

Saturday's battle began after 30 or 40 demonstrators took up their usual positions along the highway to jeer at those traveling to or from work at the Morenci mine and smelter.

A larger roadside demonstration had concluded peacefully earlier in the afternoon, but Schmidt said DPS Capt. Bill Reutter decided to move against the later group because some demonstrators were impeding traffic and one man was swinging a picket sign at passing cars.

"This (impeding traffic) was absolutely and totally in violation of all the agreements that were made," Schmidt said. "We did everything we could to acquiesce to their needs."

By the time Reutter had his 125 officers in position, the roadside crowd had swelled to 100, and it did not disperse despite warnings, Schmidt said.

Police fired tear gas, while demonstrators hurled rocks and a Molotov cocktail, Schmidt said.

On Sunday, liquor sales in Clifton and Morenci were banned indefinitely on state orders. Schmidt blamed drunkenness for some of Saturday's violence, including rock-throwing and some window-breaking. One demonstrator walked naked toward the gas-masked officers and was arrested.

Phelps Dodge officials bulldozed a plywood shack where picket signs were stored and burned another overnight, saying they were placed on company property without permission.

The barricades burned through the night along a one-mile stretch of road after 125 state Department of Public Safety officers pulled back Saturday night. The officers had fired dozens of tear-gas canisters and advanced twice but could not clear the road and gave up as darkness fell.

They gave up "because you can't go into this town at night and have any semblance of safety for your officers or anybody else," Schmidt said. "You can't secure this town."

Gov. Bruce Babbitt called Saturday's confrontation "unfortunate and tragic," but Schmidt said there were no plans to bring in National Guard troops as Babbitt has done twice before.

The strike against Phelps Dodge began after a coalition of 13 unions offered to freeze pay in a new three-year contract if workers could retain a cost-of-living-adjustment clause, as they had done with other leading copper companies.

Phelps Dodge, Arizona's largest copper producer and the second-largest in the nation, said it could not afford such an agreement.

The average hourly pay for workers involved in the dispute is $13.30.

The strike has seen shootings, brawls and threats of striker evictions from company housing.

Dole declares decision near on vehicle safety measures

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Transportation Secretary Elizabeth Dole said Sunday she is "very close" to announcing her decision on whether to require air bags or automatic seat belts in new cars, but declined to tip her hand.

The issue of automatic passenger restraints is "in a formal rulemaking," Dole said on CBS-TV's "Face the Nation."

"I am going to be very careful about what I say," she said. "I am very close to an announcement and I'd prefer not to really even speculate as to what may or may not happen with regard to that particular matter."

She said in May that she would meet a self-imposed July 11 deadline for a decision on whether to require automatic restraints.

the issue — citing studies saying air bags or automatic belts could save 13,000 lives a year — after Dole defended a minimum drinking age of 21 on the ground it would save 1,200 lives annually.

Congress last month passed a law that would reduce federal highway aid to states that fail to enact a minimum drinking age of 21. President Reagan has said he supports the law, over objections that it limits states' rights.

"My first choice was to have the states do it," Dole said, but 19 states have rejected the 21-year minimum in recent months, while only four adopted it.

"This is a matter of public safety and public health," she said, noting that 18- to 20-year-old drivers are 2½ times more likely than older drivers to be killed in alcohol-related accidents.

Seasonal hiring brings jobless rate decrease

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Aided by seasonal hirings for farm work and construction, the jobless rate in Kansas fell to 3.7 percent in May, down three-tenths of a percent from the previous month, it was announced Tuesday.

The unemployment figure was the lowest in Kansas since September 1981, when the rate was 3.6 percent, the state Department of Human Resources reported.

The decline in May was attributed mostly to seasonal gains in employment for farm and construction jobs. However, there also were more hirings in manufacturing, trade and some other industries.

A total of 45,100 people were out of work in May, compared to 48,600 in April. By contrast, 5.3 percent of the state's workforce was unemployed in May 1983, or 63,600 people.

Fred Rice, chief of research and analysis in the Department of Human Resources, predicted the unemployment rate would increase up to one-half percent next month because of the influx of young people in the summer job market. After that, it should drop and reach a low point between 3 percent and 3.5 percent by October, he said.

"I think the underlying improvement will continue — both seasonal and the longer-term trends such as manufacturing," said Rice. "Usually September and October are the low rates during the year, and it looks like we will be following that same pattern this year."

Slightly more than half of the employment gains during May were from seasonal hirings — about 7,800 new jobs in farming and 3,600 for construction.

However, manufacturing employment increased about 1,600, trade jobs increased about 1,800 and most other industries picked up 300-500 jobs.

Rice said there had been significant gains in the job market since May 1983. Manufacturing, for example, is up 12,400. The improvement, he said, reflects the recovery of the Kansas economy from recessionary times.

"Normally Kansas does lag behind the rest of the nation on the upside," said Rice. "This is some evidence that we are beginning to pick up."

The jobless rate declined in May in all of the state's metropolitan areas.

Production avoids pitfalls for success

By GARY JOHNSON
Contributing Writer

Only now, 20 years after Sam Shepard's plays first appeared in New York, has his work become palatable to a Midwestern audience. His success as an actor — an Academy Award nomination for his performance as Chuck Yeager in "The Right Stuff" — is probably the greatest single factor in the sudden interest in his drama. And thanks to the excellent PBS production, "True West" is probably the most widely known of his plays.

Review

Not surprisingly then, the Summer Repertory Theatre chose "True West" to be one of its productions this summer. What is somewhat surprising is the quality of the SRT production. "True West" is the kind of play that can often degenerate into little more than screaming and mugging, but the cast largely avoids the pitfalls and the play emerges as possibly the strongest SRT production of the summer.

The play's two protagonists face off against one another in a struggle over their own identities. The American Dream has been reduced in "True West" until it means little more than establishing a role in society.

Austin is holed up at his mother's house in the suburbs while he finishes work on a screenplay. She is on vacation in Alaska — symbolically the last American frontier. Unexpectedly turning up is Austin's desert bum brother, Lee. Lee is envious of Austin's success and his envy takes the form of putting together his own "real life" story that he hopes to sell to a movie producer. After Lee convinces Austin's agent, Saul, into believing the worth of his story, Saul drops Austin's project and goes ahead with Lee's.

This is where the real struggle over identity starts. Austin is given no time to re-evaluate his own role; instead, Shepard has him metamorphosize before our eyes. Austin decides that if Lee is going to take his role as a writer, then he will take over Lee's role as desert bum and thief. Austin ventures out into the night and returns with the toasters from a dozen of the neighboring homes.

Tom Overmyer as Lee gets off to an uncertain start, seeming to think that sheer volume of voice will convey Lee's menace, but he soon settles into the role and delivers a convincing performance. Craig Stout as Austin delivers a strong performance as well. He effectively gives Austin the disposition of a man desperately trying to control both his love and fear of his brother.

At its best, the SRT production provides some side-splittingly funny scenes. The scene in which Austin plugs in the stolen toasters and commences to find which one produces "a perfectly golden piece of fluffy toast," while Lee struggles with the telephone operator is the high point of the play.

Occasionally, though, the production comes up short. In the scene during which Lee convinces Saul to play golf, Lee is so abrasive and Saul is so patronizing that any subsequent game of golf is sheer nonsense. A similar problem develops when Mom returns from Alaska. This scene is interpreted without any sense of the absurd. A straight reading makes Mom seem little more than simply senile.

Overall, though, the SRT production is quite strong. Scenic designer

Jeff Childs provides a set that is complete with a kitchen sink with running water and electrical outlets that actually work. Props manager Tamara Holbert has made sure the kitchen drawers are full of silverware and all sorts of things that can be dumped onto center stage to provide a wonderfully messy pile of debris. In the background, one can hear coyotes yelping and crickets chirping.

There are many whys that Shepard leaves unanswered in the play. Why is Austin an Ivy Leaguer and Lee a desert bum? Why is Mom in Alaska? Why does the final battle between Lee and Austin end up indecisively? Shepard offers few answers to these questions; they simply become part of the wonderfully ludicrous images with which the drama abounds. And while the lack of answers or predictability of the plot might bother some people, Shepard is mostly concerned with providing outlandish sights and sounds that he can weave around his American-Dream-in-decay theme. The results as provided by the SRT production are often powerful and are always imbued with a magic that only Shepard can provide.

JUNCTION CITY — Two Fort Riley soldiers received Army Commendation medals for rescuing 2-year-old Kay'C Martinez, Junction City, who was trapped underneath a car June 25.

Staff Sgt. Michael Hollingsworth, 30, and Sgt. Gilbert McCargo, 25, received the medals Friday during a brigade formation conducted by Col. William Mullen, commander of the 1st Brigade.

"We were more or less there by accident," McCargo said. "We were on our way to lunch at the time. We passed the street and just happened to see the car. Then we heard all the noise and crying."

"He (McCargo) told me there was somebody under the car, but I didn't believe him," Hollingsworth said. "Then we stopped and I heard her crying."

As Hollingsworth and McCargo pulled up to the car, another child jumped out of the back and ran into the house, McCargo said. Kay'C's mother came out of the house shortly after that.

Hollingsworth and McCargo were not alone in their rescue efforts as other area passers-by stopped to help.

"There was one guy there who had gotten his car jack out and was going to try to jack the car up. I was getting ready to help him do that when Sgt. Hollingsworth suggested that we just lift the car," McCargo said.

Speculations have been made as to how the child got trapped under the car, but no one really knows the details of the accident.

"As far as we could tell, she had to have jumped out the back window," Hollingsworth said. "The hatchback was up, so that had to have been what happened."

"From the way that it was described to us, the car started rolling and she apparently jumped out the back and got trapped underneath," McCargo said. "She was drug out to the position it (the car) was in when we got there."

"We don't know how the car got there," Hollingsworth said. "When we got there the car was in park and it wasn't running."

Friday afternoon the two soldiers visited Kay'C in the Geary Community Hospital and received thanks from the girl's mother, Glenda Martinez. According to hospital officials, Kay'C was transferred to Children's Mercy Hospital in Kansas City Saturday.

According to Mrs. Martinez, her mother and sister had just gotten back from the grocery store when the accident occurred.

"I was inside doing dishes," Mrs. Martinez said. "They (the mother and sister) just had their hands full and couldn't close the car doors at the time. The children were outside helping to pick up the yard when they saw the car doors open. They just crawled in to play."

"Kay'C must've been under there a couple of minutes before these two (McCargo and Hollingsworth) came along. She was wedged under the car as tight as a drum, you might say. Her leg was up over her; her foot was on her shoulder," Martinez said.

The girl suffered second and third-degree burns in the center of her back in addition to minor cuts and bruises.

"It didn't look that serious to us," McCargo said. "When her mother pulled her out from under the car, it didn't look that bad. I couldn't tell by looking at her that she had third degree burns."

"I'm just glad she's doing better," Martinez said. "It scares you. I sure hope parents are more cautious with their kids. It's a terrible thing to go through. You learn when something like this happens to your kids. You really do."

McCargo said that he thought of his own son when he saw the accident.

"It could've been my boy," Mc-

Cargo said. "I would just hope that if someone saw him in that situation, that they would help him."

Hollingsworth and McCargo had mixed emotions about receiving the Army Commendation medal, which is given to commend outstanding service.

"I didn't know what all the fuss was about," Hollingsworth said. "It was just something that needed to be done and I didn't expect any reward for doing it."

The medal is generally awarded for meritorious achievement on assignment, but can be given out for other special occasions.

"I'm just glad she's doing better," Hollingsworth said. "That's the important thing."

Hollingsworth and McCargo are members of Headquarters Company, 1st Battalion, 34th Armor, 1st Infantry Division.

Tour promotions demand decisions in newspapers' ethics

By WAYNE PRICE
Arts and Features Editor

When the promoters of the Jacksons' "Victory" tour announced the group would be coming to Kansas City, heads were turning. But two major newspapers in Kansas turned the other way when they refused to run promotional material for the concerts scheduled for July 6, 7 and 8 at Arrowhead Stadium.

One of the newspapers refusing to run the promotional releases supplied by Don King Promotions, known for promoting the Mohammed Ali boxing matches, was the Wichita Eagle-Beacon.

According to Davis Merritt, executive editor of the Eagle-Beacon, the decision not to run the material was based on the paper's ethics concerning free advertising.

"What happened was promoters sent press releases to all the radio and TV stations and newspapers and said this was the only way to buy tickets," Merritt said. "No arrangements had previously been made. We never heard anything about it until a day or two before on the radio."

Merritt said the promoters sent the material, which contained a coupon to be sent to New York for tickets, to the Eagle-Beacon addressed to the editor in hopes it would be considered a "reader's service," and therefore run in the paper free. He said, the promoters insisted the material had to run on a certain day and nothing could be changed.

"Our advertising manager had never run into anything like that," Merritt said. "We won't do that with a car dealer's ad or anybody else's."

Peter Ritter, general manager for the Eagle-Beacon, said the decision not to run the material was really "cut and dried" because it was considered free advertising.

"The decision not to run the advertisement was made because they refused to pay for it," Ritter said.

"They thought public outcry would be so great it would have to run whether as news or an advertisement. It's obvious that was a tactic they intended in order to put pressure on us."

Merritt said even though it was the advertising manager's decision not to run the material, he wouldn't have let the material be printed in the Eagle-Beacon based on two factors.

"We don't give away free advertising," Merritt said. "It's not fair to the people who buy advertising."

"The second reason is because, routinely, on the news side, we run a paragraph or two saying where a concert is and how to get tickets because that's news. But the Jackson people wanted it done in a half page. I'll be damned if I'll give it a half page, if I can do it in two paragraphs."

Merritt said his advertising manager, Mary McCoy, called the stadium and asked them if they really expected the newspaper to run the promotional item free, and the people at the stadium replied, "yes."

The Topeka Capital-Journal experienced a similar situation, Rick Dalton, managing editor, said.

As in Wichita, Topeka radio stations announced the concert and said the local newspaper would have ticket information in its next edition, without verifying the matter with the publication.

Ordinarily, the decision to run the promotion would have gone to the advertising manager, but he was out of town so Dalton made the decision.

"Basically it was the same layout as in the (Kansas City) Star and Times," Dalton said. "Nothing could be changed and it had to run on a certain date. We considered it an ad."

The Capital-Journal, Dalton said, was not going to make an exception to its policy concerning free advertising either.

"We'd have a mess if we allotted for a Michael Jackson concert and then not a local group, who've asked us to do that type of thing before," Dalton said. "If they want an ad, they can get an ad, if they pay for it."

Doug Gillian, program director for WIBW's Rock 97 in Topeka, said there was a slight mix-up between the radio station and the Capital-Journal, both owned by Stauffer Communications of Topeka.

"We were using all the information the promoters gave us," Gillian said. "We found out later that day that the Capital-Journal would not be printing the order blanks."

"This is the first time I've heard of a promoter asking us to donate space for an event that's going to make money. We were doing it as a public service for people who wanted to know about the Jackson concert. But I don't think the Capital-Journal was out of line not to run it."

Another Topeka radio station, KDVV 100, ran the promotional material but said the Kansas City Star and Times would have the order form for the tickets, not the Capital-Journal. Tony Stewart, program director at that station, said his station ran the material free and felt the Topeka and Wichita newspapers made a mistake in not running the material.

"Promoters were counting on newspapers to clean up on selling the extra issues," Stewart said. "I understand Kansas City just cleaned up. It's a shame they (Capital-Journal and Eagle-Beacon) didn't run it."

When asked about the ethics issue of giving away free advertising, Stewart replied, "Everything has to be looked at on a profit basis."

The Kansas City Star and Times, did run the promotional material, and the single copies sales for June 19 did increase.

A spokesperson for the Star and Times, reading from a prepared statement, said single copy sales for the Times increased 73 percent and single copy sales for the Star increased 20 percent.

Jeff Hall, vice-president of marketing and distribution for the Star and Times, said on June 15, promoters from the concert announced the Star and Times would have ticket information and the phone lines at the newspapers immediately become swamped.

Hall said the promoters did not pay for the advertisement containing the coupon for the concert but added the Star and Times is not in the habit of giving away free advertising.

"It was not really an advertisement," Hall said.

But when asked why the in house ad on Page 2 of the Times referred to the coupon on page four as an ad, Hall replied, "Call it an ad if you like. We do work with promoters in special cases."

Both Merritt and Dalton said public response has been very favorable regarding their decision. Dalton said 90 percent to 95 percent of the people calling the Capital-Journal agreed with that paper's decision.

Merritt said even though it was up to the Star and Times to make its own decisions, it didn't reflect good practice.

"Some journalistic lines were crossed in this promotion," Merritt said. "Some politician with a lot of power might come in and say 'listen to this, it's very important and must run.'"

"Some papers have left themselves vulnerable by doing this and even us, to a certain extent."

Dalton agreed that it was the Star and Times' own business if they ran the material free but said it wasn't a reader service in any way.

"I told a radio station the other day," Dalton said, "we'll run the ad as a public service if they want to give the tickets away."

Mondale must weigh vote support in choice

The question Walter Mondale must ask is not "who is the best," vice presidential candidate but what interest group will give him the most votes.

Recently, Mondale has interviewed or is scheduled to interview women and blacks for a running mate.

The women include Mayor Dianne Feinstein of San Francisco, Gov. Martha Layne Collins of Kentucky, and Rep. Geraldine Ferraro of New York.

Black male potential candidates include Mayor Tom Bradley of Los Angeles and Mayor W. Wilson Goode of Philadelphia.

Many women have made it clear what they want in a vice presidential candidate through the representatives of the National Organization for Women.

At a NOW convention in Miami Beach, Fla., Saturday, Mondale heard women chanting, "Run with a woman. Win with a woman." Rep. Mary Rose Oakar of Ohio was quoted as saying, "We think the best means to defeat Ronald Reagan is to have Vice President Mondale as our candidate and a woman on the ticket." However, she made it equally clear that women would support Mondale even if he doesn't choose a woman. Reagan is the "enemy," she said.

The Rev. Jesse Jackson has not made it clear whether or not he wants a black as a Mondale running mate. Jackson has, however, made it clear that he will cause problems at the Democratic National Convention this summer.

"If you want us to vote in '84, we want justice in '84," Jackson declared at a Rainbow Coalition Convention Friday. The coalition was organized by Jackson. He claims to have the power of the black vote and plans to use it to his benefit.

For Mondale, a black running mate may be the answer to retaining the black vote despite Jackson's appeals.

If Mondale gets the nomination, and at this time that seems likely, the "best" vice presidential candidate must mean which interest group holds the most votes, not which potential running mate is most qualified. If he chooses neither a woman nor a black, he risks losing support from both groups.

The political running mate choice may be his. He has made it clear to both groups that he is considering a representative from each group. Mondale must count potential votes before reading the resumes of potential candidates for a Mondale running mate.

Jackson tour could eliminate federal debt

Michael Jackson
c/o "Victory" Tour
Arrowhead Stadium
1 Arrowhead Drive
Kansas City, Mo.

Dear Mike,

Congratulations to you and your family. The Jacksons are in the news more often than President Reagan. That's quite an accomplishment.

Listen, Mike, I've been talking to a few folks who are a little upset with your tour. These people think there is something wrong with the way the concert tour is being handled.

Their first complaint is the way one has to obtain tickets. They say it isn't too much of a "Thriller." Having to obtain the coupon from a newspaper is too much trouble. Some folks have problems with the tour's promoters asking some newspapers to run the coupon for free. They say it's just free advertising.

BRIAN LA RUE
Collegian Columnist

The second complaint relates to the cost of the tickets. Asking for $30 per ticket is pretty steep, Mike, but you'll get it from your fans. Some folks are also upset because the tickets are being sold in groups of four, which means someone has to come up with $120.

Some people have complained the price of tickets will keep some of your "less-monied" fans from trying to order tickets. Others claim the system will invite scalpers to make some money from unwanted or unused tickets, which is what the concert promoters said they wanted to avoid.

I think requiring a money order for the tickets is a great idea, Mike. You never know about personal checks. The Postal Service, which sells money orders and stamps, will rake in some big bucks from your "Victory" tour.

What really irritates some people is the wait for a refund if they don't get tickets. They think a six-week wait is too long. Besides, they say, the money will be gathering interest in a bank account during that time, which they say is a bit unfair.

Then there are those who complain Arrowhead is too large for such a concert. These whiners complain that for $30, they should be able to sit close to the stage, instead of having to go through a lottery and maybe get tickets in the "nosebleed section."

They also say they should be allowed to order tickets for a specific date, instead of taking what is given to them.

I don't know, Mike. I think there are some problems with the ticket system, but it's your party. If this is the way you want it, it's OK with me.

You know, Mike, maybe you ought to talk to Reagan. I know you and he have formed a team to battle drunken driving, but I have a bigger and better idea: You and your brothers could do concert tours throughout the country for the federal government! This would give your fans across the country a chance to see you. The Jacksons could wipe out the federal debt in a couple of months.

Good luck to you and your family. By the way, Mike, I won't be at Arrowhead this weekend. I can't afford a ticket.

Sincerely,
Brian La Rue

Rumpf's talk offers misinformed interpretation on Taiwan

Editor,

After hearing the Rev. Roger Rumpf's talk on the human rights situation in Taiwan, and after reading Melissa Brune's article the next day (Wednesday's Collegian), I feel that what is being offered is an unacceptably naive, misinformed and one-sided interpretation. Moreover, as the scarcely restrained resentment of many Taiwan nationals in the audience demonstrated, attempts by the Rev. Rumpf and others to bring U.S. public opinion and foreign policy pressure to bear on Taiwan's government do not always strike a responsive chord. In fact, they may be seen as counterproductive and unwarranted intrusions into the internal affairs of the Republic of China.

First of all, the human rights situation in Taiwan ought to be seen in the context of continuous, rapid improvements in the quality of life for the average Taiwanese. Gross national product per person, for instance, has grown from U.S. $100 in 1949, to U.S. $2,280 in 1980. In addition, a highly successful land reform and the achievement of a full-employment economy have combined to make the distribution of wealth in Taiwan far more equal than it is in the United States.

Politically, there has been a gradual but steady liberalization. Along with the increased participation of native Taiwanese in all levels of government, the small island of Taiwan now supports a vigorous press with the scores of independent political magazines and newspapers. Elections are frequent and popular, and the intense campaigning that precedes them makes the Rev. Rumpf's charge that they are "token elections" appear simply absurd. In short, democracy has a strong foothold in Taiwan.

Internationally, however, Taiwan is isolated and threatened. It is no exaggeration to say that the island's cherished freedoms, its prosperity and, indeed, its survival depend on the development of markets and goodwill abroad.

It comes as no surprise, then, that many Chinese (and Taiwanese, despite Rumpf's gallingly naive assertion, most definitely are Chinese) truly regret efforts to marshal Americans against Taiwan under the banner of human rights. Actually, in terms of U.S. foreign policy, the prevailing view in Taiwan is that we already failed the human rights test when the Carter administration de-recognized Taiwan in favor of the infinitely more repressive communist regime on the mainland in 1979.

So, I strongly suggest to the Rev. Rumpf, or anyone who holds a genuine concern for the people of Taiwan, to try and find out a bit more about their society. Who knows, you may even pick up a few words of Chinese.

Jackson trip exhibits negotiation possibility

Editor,

Tim Filby's June 26 editorial is evidence of this campus' desperate need for an educational group such as the Coalition for Human Rights.

For instance, Filby writes that Jesse Jackson's missions "do more harm than good for this country," concluding that unless Jackson is seeking the vice presidential nomination he should refrain from his political missions. I find it impossible to maintain that Jackson's missions do more harm than good because he is going "against the grain of the Central American policies of the Reagan administration." The Reagan administration must be forced to admit that negotiations with the guerrillas are possible and must pursue them. To this date negotiations have not even been considered.

What is even more shocking is that many students believe communism is a real threat in this region, failing to realize that the real threats are the military-oligarchic dictatorships trained and kept in power with support of the CIA.

It is comforting to know that there exists one influential person who can make a distinction between Reagan's fantasy of communism at our back door a people fighting against a barbaric dictatorship. The people are homeless, hungry, clothesless and it is sheer self-induced folly to insist labeling them communists for this refusal to accept this condition as their God-given fate. Unless we are willing to allow our government to intervene in the affairs of Central American countries to protect big business from the consequences of this conduct, we must demand that our government make the same distinction.

Also, in response to the demand for consistency in foreign relations, I must ask: is there never a time when failure is admitted and an alternative sought? Or is it always a virtue to persist in manifest stupidity?

We ought to be thankful for people like Jackson and organizations such as the Coalition that raise issues and provide information crucial to the functioning of a democracy. By the way, Hussein is King of Jordan and Syria's president is Hafez Assad.

Actor dodges reporters' questions

LONDON — Actor Tony Curtis walked hand in hand with actress Andrea De Savio to a Los Angeles-bound plane Sunday at Heathrow Airport but snapped at reporters who asked if they were married.

"There is nothing to explain, nothing to clarify and no position to clear up. I don't have to explain anything to you," said Curtis, 59, who was here filming "Insignificance."

"Every time I open my mouth I'm misquoted," Curtis complained. "I get a lot of hassle and a lot of static. So if I don't say anything, I can't be misquoted."

A year ago, he said the 21-year-old actress would become his fourth wife. But De Savio later said Curtis had asked her to play along with that story while he entered a hospital to try to beat a drinking problem.

Jazz band performs pope's lyrics

DUESSELDORF, West Germany — Sarah Vaughan, a jazz band led by Francy Boland and an orchestra directed by Lalo Schiffrin performed songs to the lyrics of Pope John Paul II in what organizers said was a world premiere.

The texts of six poems written by Karol Wojtyla while he was still a priest in his native Poland were put to music by Italian composers Tito Fontana and Sante Palumbo, both of Milan, and Boland.

Gigi Campi, Italian producer of Saturday's $230,000 project, said there would be 25 performances on a tour including Toronto, Caracas, Rio de Janeiro, Sao Paulo, Buenos Aires and the Vatican.

Man gets 'new life' after prison

ORANGEBURG, S.C. — Lenell Geter has gotten married surrounded by friends who stood by him through two years of prison for a crime he didn't commit.

Geter, a black engineer, was given a life sentence for the 1982 holdup of a fast-food restaurant in the Dallas suburb of Balch Springs.

"I've always been a dreamer or I would not be here today," said Geter. "I knew I would be exonerated."

"It's like he got a new life," said Dallas attorney Edwin Sigel, who represented Geter in his fight to get out of prison.

Geter, 26, and 25-year-old Marcia Hickson were married Saturday.

Acting hooks woman on soaps

WILLISTON, N.D. — Janice Urseth says she never used to be a regular watcher of daytime soap operas, until she got to appear on "Days of Our Lives" as part of a trip she won to Hollywood.

She was an extra in the program that was broadcast Friday, Urseth said Saturday from her home in Williston, in western North Dakota.

"As an extra, I ate a salad at the Salem Inn while Tony DiMera argued with Anna about her affair with Andre or her lies and Neil Curtis fought with Maxwell Hathaway over financial dealings," she said of the characters in the series.

She said she won the trip through a television game show. She was paid $134 for her acting on June 18.

Wilson powers Royals to 8-0 win

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Willie Wilson remembers his first home run, but not many of his 16 others.

Wilson slammed a two-run homer Sunday to lead the Kansas City Royals on an 8-0 romp over the New York Yankees and a sweep of the weekend series. Wilson's homer, which followed U.L. Washington's two-out single in the seventh inning and gave the Royals a 4-0 lead, was the 17th of his career but only the fourth to clear the fences.

"It felt funny to try to trot around the bases rather than run," said Wilson, who hit his 13th career inside-the-park homer last month. "I didn't know how to act. I didn't know whether to smile or to just be cool, so I decided to smile."

Wilson last hit a ball out of a park on Aug. 12, 1981, off Scott McGregor in Baltimore. His first home run came in 1979 off Milwaukee's Mike Caldwell.

"Caldwell, that's it," Wilson said when asked if he could remember the other home runs. "I don't have too many. This one surprised me."

Charlie Leibrandt and Dan Quisenberry scattered nine hits in handing the Yankees their 11th shutout of the season. Quisenberry relieved Leibrandt, 3-3, after Willie Randolph walked following Tim Lincecum's two-out double in the seventh, the seventh hit off the Royals' starter, and recorded his major league-leading 21st save.

Wilson drove in the first of four runs off Mike Armstrong in the eighth inning with a sacrifice fly. The others came home on Pat Sheridan's infield hit and Hal McRae's bases-loaded two-run single.

The Royals broke through loser Bob Shirley, 1-2, in the fourth when McRae singled and Balboni drew a walk from Yankee starter and loser Bob Shirley, 1-2, and both scored on Don Slaught's double.

New York right fielder Dave Winfield, who leads the American League with a .370 batting average, started for the first time in five games after being sidelined with a sprained left shoulder. Winfield singled twice in four trips.

In dropping the three-game series, the Yankees managed only four runs and 19 hits.

Splittorff to call it quits after 13 years with Royals

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Veteran left-hander Paul Splittorff, who spent his entire 13-year career with the Kansas City Royals, announced his retirement Sunday.

Splittorff, who had a 166-143 career record for the Royals, had been sent to the bullpen this year. He was 1-3 with a 7.71 earned run average.

"I think age and inactivity probably hurt me as much as anything else," the 37-year-old pitcher said in announcing his retirement following the Royals' 8-0 defeat of the New York Yankees.

"I couldn't do anything about the age and the work load wasn't going to change," he said.

Splittorff last pitched Tuesday when he started the first game of a double-header against Oakland. He had made two other starts and nine relief appearances this year.

"Paul Splittorff is a credit to the Kansas City Royals, both on and off the field," General Manager John Schuerholz said. "He epitomizes what our organization is all about. Not only has he been an outstanding pitcher who has won many crucial games for us, but he has been an outstanding representative of all this organization stands for."

Splittorff, whose victory total ranks him 10th among active pitchers, holds Royals career records with 429 games, 393 starts and 2,554½ innings pitched.

Drug plan gives game ammunition

Drug abuse is a problem that has grown increasingly worse in the world of sports during the past few years. Few sports, if any, have remained untouched by the effects of drug use.

Football, basketball and, most notably, the national pastime, baseball, have weathered revelations of drug abuse among players. For many, finding out that baseball players had delved into drugs was a bitter pill to swallow. Baseball had remained in the eyes of many the purest of professional sports, content to sit back in its tradition and watch all the problems that plagued pro football and basketball.

But times changed. The modern world caught up to the grand old game. A players strike that eliminated half of the 1981 season was the first sign of the modernization of baseball's image. The latest blow occurred last season, with the drug abuse scandal involving members of the Kansas City Royals — it was the crowning blow to the problem.

That drug problems hit the Kansas City franchise was especially hard for many to understand. The Royals have been one of baseball's most successful organizations — Kansas City last visited the World Series in 1980 and has earned five divisional championships since 1976. For this team to be hit by drug problems showed it could happen anywhere, no matter what the strength of an organization was.

Yet baseball's reaction to its drug problems turned out to be inappropriate. Lame-duck commissioner of major league baseball Bowie Kuhn was stuck with an urgent problem, yet he wasn't equipped with the support of the owners necessary to deal with the situation.

In the end, Royals players Jerry Martin, Willie Wilson and Willie Aikens were given little more than slaps on the wrist for their part in the drug scandal. Wilson has already returned to the Royals lineup as a full-time player, while Aikens is also again in baseball, this year as a member of the Toronto Blue Jays.

Baseball, in its questionable wisdom, seemed to condone drug use by its players. Baseball's leaders reacted not with sternness, but with actions that could only be called weak. Instead of leading the way in dealing with drug abuse, they seemed to sit back and wait for the reactions of other professional sports to their drug problem.

But finally last week, baseball came up with a plan to deal with drug abuse among players. Thursday, Kuhn announced terms of rules dealing with drug abuse in the game. Among the most notable of the rules established that players guilty of drug related crimes face a minimum one-year suspension from the game and are faced with being barred from the game for life.

Kuhn also ruled that players caught possessing drugs on the field or on the premises of a stadium would also be hit with the one-year minimum suspension. Kuhn also made provisions for disciplinary actions involving players previously hit with drug suspensions or players who have been placed on a list of players seeking drug rehabilitation.

It appears that baseball has considerably strengthened its ability to deal with the drug problems that have plagued the game recently. The national pastime, after dragging its heels on the problem for too long, has finally realized that changes are needed in dealing with players.

Baseball should be congratulated for its new plan, despite its tardiness. Other leagues and organizations should take notice of this new plan and help stamp out a drug problem that should have never become a part of sports in the first place.

Sarah, I'm sorry it took me so long, but things just don't work out always as you expect them to. But now that I'm here, I'd like to say that I'm all thanks for the wonderful times we've had this semester. The good and not so good were all worth it to me. I want to say I'm sorry for being a fool or not always doing what you expected, but I hope things will be a whole lot better next semester. I really care about you and I can't tell you leave without me telling you this. I'll always be here, as your friend—your true friend—and I'll hope you'll do the same. So take a look at me now. Here's to hoping to see you and pick things up where we left off again next semester. Have a beautiful summer. Love, Your true friend, Curtis (168)

Rape trauma plea adds to arson case

By The Associated Press

OLATHE — There was something attorney William Tuley didn't know when he advised a client accused of arson to plead guilty. She had been raped, he said, just hours before allegedly setting a fire.

Shortly before her court appearance for sentencing, the 25-year-old woman met with a psychologist and recalled being raped by two men in her apartment, Tuley said. She had erased the rape from her mind and never reported it to police, he said.

Two fires were set in the apartment a few hours after the rape and a third on the following day, authorities said. No one was injured and damage was minor.

Tuley asked Johnson County District Judge Gerald Hougland to allow the woman to withdraw her plea. He told the judge that the rape was "the precipitating circumstance leading to the events for which the defendant was charged." She was suffering rape trauma syndrome, a psychological condition caused by the attack, he said.

When Tuley argued that his client was suffering from rape trauma syndrome, he also may have been making legal history.

Lawyers, legal scholars and mental health experts say they know of no other case in which the psychological impact of rape has been offered as a reason why a person may have committed a crime.

A "tremendous controversy" already has developed nationally over the admissibility of testimony about rape trauma syndrome testimony, said Edward J. Inwinkelried, a professor of law at Washington University in St. Louis. Prosecutors have attempted to use experts' testimony about the effects of rape on victims as evidence that a woman was raped, sometimes with little other evidence of the alleged attack existed.

The supreme courts of California, Missouri and Minnesota have ruled that testimony about rape trauma syndrome may not be used as evidence to prove a rape. The Kansas Supreme Court has upheld the use of testimony about rape trauma syndrome as evidence of a rape.

In the California ruling this month, the court said the syndrome concept was developed to assist diagnosis and treatment of the victim. A jury can be told a woman has suffered specific kinds of emotional distress, the court said, as long as the "rape trauma" concept is not used as evidence a rape occurred.

In that case, the court upheld the rape convictions of two men, because other evidence was strong enough to sustain the convictions.

Thomas Hinton, assistant executive director of the National District Attorneys Association, said he wasn't aware of any cases in which the defense had cited the rape trauma syndrome.

Last month Hougland sustained Tuley's motion, which the district attorney's office did not challenge, and allowed Tuley's client to withdraw her plea.

"A most unusual, or perhaps even unique, situation has occurred," Hougland said in a preface to his ruling. "Equity requires the court provide all appropriate consideration to the defendant."

Hougland said disclosure of the rape "obviously would bear upon future negotiations" and "could result in a change of attitude or position of the state" in the case.

Two original counts of aggravated arson were then reinstated against the woman. She had pleaded guilty to a reduced charge of one count of arson, which carries a possible prison sentence of three to 20 years.

Tuley and Assistant District Attorney Michael Buser said they did not want to predict how the case would be resolved. But they hinted they would not go to trial.

Emotional problems suffered by a rape victim are a form of post-traumatic stress disorder, a condition identified and labeled by the psychiatric community just a few years ago, said Herbert Modlin, a senior psychiatrist with the Menninger Foundation in Topeka. Symptoms include nightmares, mistrust of men, depression, guilt and fear of being alone.

Attorneys for Vietnam War veterans accused of crimes have used post-traumatic stress as a successful defense for some veterans.

But psychiatrists who have studied post-traumatic stress disorder said there is no medical evidence that rape trauma can cause criminal behavior.

"It just isn't what we've seen," said Calvin J. Frederick, a psychiatrist at the West Los Angeles

Veterans Administration Medical Center and a professor at UCLA.

"That's not to say it couldn't happen. There's the possibility that there was a feeling of guilt there, that — irrational as it may sound — she could have avoided the rape. This could have triggered self-destructive behavior."

She also may have been trying to destroy "the environment" in which the assault occurred, said Modlin and Marilyn Hutchinson, a Kansas City psychologist who works with rape victims.

"They can get very punitive toward themselves," Hutchinson said.

If the case of Tuley's client did go to trial, and the defendant used rape trauma syndrome as a defense, she would, in essence, be claiming temporary insanity, Inwinkelried said.

"It is not clear whether rape trauma can be fit into the framework of insanity, whether it qualifies as a recognized form of insanity," Inwinkelried said. "A neurosis or a psychological disorder does not necessarily mean insanity. They are not synonymous."

in that meeting but he hopes to see "the good results" that come out of it.

Meanwhile, Hooks said the NAACP hopes to sign Fair Share agreements with Kansas City area companies during the convention. NAACP officials were reluctant to name the companies until the signing, but one said a major utility is involved.

The Fair Share program encourages major companies across the nation, to hire minorities.

Mondale continues running mate interviews

By The Associated Press

Walter F. Mondale interviewed Rep. Geraldine Ferraro for the No. 2 spot on the Democratic ticket on Monday and pronounced her as qualified to be vice president and "clearly in contention" for the job, while the Rev. Jesse Jackson announced globe-trotting missions to Africa and the Soviet Union.

Mondale dismissed growing pressure to name a female running mate as "politics," and repeated his determination to select the most qualified vice presidential contender, regardless of sex.

Among Ferraro's supporters for the job are House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., a million-member labor union, nearly 10 percent of the Democratic National Convention delegates and three prominent women colleagues in the House of Representatives.

Mondale met with Ferraro — the fifth vice presidential contender he has interviewed and the second woman — after a morning spent attacking President Reagan.

"Our choice is...between two futures: between a Reagan future and a better future."

Mondale also renewed his attack on Reagan for not accepting a Soviet offer to begin talks on space weapons. "In my opinion, the Soviet offer was a positive development and I would have accepted it, along with a proposal for a temporary moratorium on deployment (of the weapons). What are they afraid of?"

he said of the Reagan administration, which is trying to fold nuclear weapons negotiations into the Soviet offer on space.

A CBS-New York Times poll released Monday shows Mondale trailing President Reagan by 15 percentage points and losing to the president among both men and women.

The poll said Reagan leads Mondale 50 percent to 35 percent, up from a 12 percentage point margin Reagan held over Mondale in the same poll conducted in February. The latest sample of 1,600 people has a margin of error plus or minus 3 percentage points. Among women, the poll said Reagan led 45-37; among men, Reagan led 55-32.

showed Reagan with a 19 point lead, 56-37.

Half a continent away, Sen. Gary Hart also attacked Reagan, declaring that federal budget deficits of $200 billion a year are the president's "economic Vietnam." Hart, who battled Mondale all through the Democratic presidential primary season and officially remains a contender for the presidential nomination, made no mention of his rival in prepared remarks.

"Ronald Reagan, the candidate, could run in 1980 on a platform calling for a balanced budget, but Ronald Reagan the candidate can't run in 1984 on anything but red ink," the Colorado senator said in a speech at Columbia University in New York.

The third Democratic presidential contender, the Rev. Jesse Jackson, told a news conference in San Diego he will go to Africa and seek a visa for white-minority ruled South Africa, and also will visit the Soviet Union later this year. Jackson returned from a Central American trip last week with 22 Americans and 26 Cubans who had been imprisoned in Cuban jails.

The black civil rights leader said Monday he is concerned about anti-apartheid leader Nelson Mandela, imprisoned 21 years ago on a life sentence in South Africa, but said his trip would not be specifically aimed at obtaining Mandela's release.

As for the Soviets, Jackson said, "A signal for relieving (international) tensions is the release of political prisoners. In the Soviet Union, to release (Jewish dissident Andrei) Sakharov, to release Soviet Jews (would be) a good sign."

Jackson will meet with Mondale Tuesday in Kansas City, where both men are scheduled to address the NAACP convention.

Ferraro was the second woman to be interviewed for the vice presidential spot on the ticket — Kentucky Gov. Martha Layne Collins follows on Friday — but since San Francisco Mayor Diane Feinstein made the trip to Minnesota last week, the pressure has grown noticeably on Mondale to name a female.

And Ferraro, a third-term congresswoman from Queens, has emerged as perhaps the leading woman contender.

Man receives life in prison after killing local resident

By The Associated Press

ALMA — A 19-year-old Rhode Island man was sentenced Monday to life in prison for the March 1984 slaying of a Manhattan man at a highway rest stop near Paxico.

Wabaunsee County prosecutor Ed Van Petten said Brian Lionberg, of West Warwick, R. I., was sentenced to life in prison by District Judge Tracy Klingensmith in connection with the first-degree murder of Larry Gugler, 44.

Lionberg pleaded guilty to the charge May 29, moments before selection of a jury to hear the case. Van Petten said Lionberg entered the plea after county authorities agreed to dismiss a companion charge of aggravated robbery.

Van Petten said Lionberg agreed to waive extradition back to Rhode Island, where he has been charged in connection with the stabbing death of 71-year-old Mary Burroughs, of East Greenwich, R. I.

Police arrested Lionberg in Burroughs car near Salina on March 3, after a high-speed chase that reached speeds of 100 mph. Police discovered a shotgun in the car.

Convention opens with debates

Doles make defense for racist attacks

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Reagan administration's civil rights record was debated at the 75th annual NAACP convention Monday.

Rep. Peter W. Rodino Jr., D-N.J., chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, went on the attack and told convention delegates that "civil rights are under siege and they have been under siege since the beginning of this administration."

Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan., and his wife, Transportation Secretary Elizabeth Dole, defended the Reagan administration against criticism that it shows indications of racism.

Their comments came at the start of the five-day convention of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Benjamin L. Hooks, executive director of the NAACP, addressed a pre-convention news conference Sunday and contended that the Reagan administration appears to be sending coded racist messages to American whites. He said the "coded messages" were in the form of cuts in social programs.

Rodino criticized the Justice

Department for "acting on selective cases where they believe they can question the intent of Congress."

Rodino said 55 percent fewer civil rights suits have been filed by the Reagan's Department of Justice than by the department under former President Jimmy Carter. And he said only two of 143 federal judgeships have been filled by black lawyers during the Reagan administration.

Dole, the official stand-in for Reagan at the convention, said she and her husband "share a deep abhorrence for the seeds of hatred sown by those misguided members of our society who would deny others their right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness."

She said blacks have made gains during Reagan's term.

"Blacks must be able to own lunch rooms as well as sit at the counter — to operate a bus line as well as occupy a front seat. Deregulation across all forms of transportation has increased business opportunities. It has stimulated competition. The results for minorities, particularly in trucking, have been impressive," Dole said.

Dole told delegates to "take a hard look at the record of my party" and noted that the Voting Rights Act extension and the Martin Luther King Jr. holiday bill "were passed with overwhelming Republican support."

"The party of Lincoln remains true to its heritage. The light of conscience has not gone out," Dole said.

Maxine Smith, executive secretary of the Memphis branch of the NAACP, said after the address that Dole's remarks "were hypocritical...She had to give credence to an administration of which she is part."

LeGree Daniels, a black Republican from Harrisburg, Pa., said she is disturbed by the NAACP's sway to the Democrats and disagrees with Hooks' assessment that Reagan is sending messages of racism to white Americans.

"I have sat with the president and I know he's honest. I think that we just are not getting our message out the way we should have," said Daniels, a GOP state committee member in Pennsylvania.

Another speaker Monday, NAACP general counsel Herbert H. Henderson, said the organization will probably file a suit within 60 days to stop the Justice Department "from placing its heavy thumb on the scale of justice in order to tip it in favor of the powerful and the entrenched male, white establishment."

Henderson's remarks were in reference to a recent Supreme Court ruling in a Memphis firefighters case in which the fire department was told to act on a last-hired, first-fired basis. White firefighters had challenged their dismissals during a budget crunch.

Black Republicans held a press conference in Kansas City Monday to voice their support of President Reagan and to "let people know that we exist," said Clarence McKee, head of the District of Columbia Reagan-Bush '84 committee.

The black Republicans criticized Democratic presidential candidate Walter F. Mondale, who has interviewed Mayor Tom Bradley of Los Angeles and Mayor W. Wilson Goode of Philadelphia as potential running mates. Both Bradley and Goode are black.

"It has become only too clear that Walter Mondale's vice-presidential selection process is a sham designed to keep blacks quiet until after the convention," McKee said.

Fireworks unleash canines

By The Associated Press

MADISON, Wis. — One terrified dog gnawed through a chain-link fence. Another bolted down the street, dragging what remained of his doghouse on his leash.

Their problem? Fireworks. While noisy and colorful pyrotechnics can be the highlight of the Fourth of July for children and adults, they can make the day a nightmare for pets, says Carter Luke of Madison, executive director of the Dane County Humane Society.

Luke cited the case of a panic-stricken malamute "that chewed his way right through a chain-link fence" because of loud fireworks. It was later discovered that youngsters had been throwing fireworks in his kennel, and the dog simply panicked, Luke said.

"A vet had to remove most of what was left of his teeth," Luke said.

"You've seen startled people jump because of a firecracker going off, or because of some other loud noise," Luke said. "You can imagine what the noise does to dogs and cats with their sensitive hearing."

"I've known of dogs that have jumped through picture windows to get out of houses" because of exploding fireworks, Luke said.

He said a dog dragging the frame of his doghouse down the street was another example of the terror.

"It's our worst day of the year" at the shelter, he said.

U.S. tries new angle on Soviet arms talks

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Reagan administration has agreed unconditionally to talks with the Soviet Union in September about curbing weapons in outer space, U.S. officials said Monday.

The administration asserted its unqualified readiness to meet with the Soviets after Moscow rejected as "totally unsatisfactory" a U.S. proposal to broaden the talks to include other nuclear weapons.

It was not immediately clear whether the Soviets would take the administration up on its latest approach.

Larry Speakes, the White House spokesman, underscored U.S. readiness to meet with the Soviets. But referring to the nuclear weapons, he stressed that "we will also raise these other issues."

Even if Moscow maintains its position that it does not want to talk about them, Speakes said, "we plan to raise it."

"We think INF (intermediate nuclear force talks) and START (strategic arms reduction talks) and nuclear weapons in Europe is too important of an issue not to raise at these talks and we will do it," he said.

But in a speech in Moscow, Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko repeated his government's rejection of the earlier U.S. proposal to merge talks on space weapons and nuclear missiles, calling it a "stacked deck" against the Soviets.

Gromyko said the nuclear missiles issue has "no relation to the problem" of space weapons.

A U.S. official, who spoke only on condition he not be identified, said the negotiations would be held in Vienna, as suggested by the Soviets, or at "any mutually agreeable location."

He said U.S. arms control specialists were under instruction to have an analysis of anti-satellite weapons ready for President Reagan's consideration in August.

The principal point of the study is to determine which weapons might be difficult to verify under an agreement.

Soviet President Konstantin U. Chernenko formally proposed the negotiations last week. Earlier proposals by him and his predecessor, Yuri V. Andropov, were rejected by the administration.

Two reasons were given: that it would be virtually impossible to guard against cheating and that the Soviets were trying to maintain an edge in space by negotiating a halt to U.S. research efforts.

This time the administration said it was prepared to negotiate, but wanted to broaden the talks to cover other arms issues as well.

U.S.-Soviet negotiations over intermediate-range and strategic nuclear weapons were halted late last year as Moscow protested NATO's deployment of new American missiles in Western Europe.

The Soviets have insisted they would reopen discussions of Euro-missiles in Geneva only if NATO reversed the deployment. Ruling out a missile withdrawal, the administration has refused to offer Moscow an inducement to return to the table.

At this point, the U.S. official said, the only way space weapons negotiations would be called off is if the Soviets withdrew Chernenko's offer to talk or try to prohibit in advance the United States' raising the nuclear weapons issue.

"We think their proposal is still open," he said.

Announcements

The Collegian will not be published on Wednesday as there will be no classes. The regular Monday through Thursday publication schedule will resume Thursday.

Manhattan residents may shoot fireworks through Wednesday between 8 a.m. and midnight, said Wayne Colson, Riley County Police Department dispatcher.

According to city ordinances, residents cannot throw fireworks at anyone or in a public street or place including a park, alley or avenue.

Colson said there are no county ordinances per se; however, residents must have legal fireworks.

"It is legal to shoot the fireworks (in the county) at any time, as long as it is not infringing on another's rights," Colson said.

All fireworks are prohibited the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers area at Tuttle Creek.

"Fire works are prohibited in the area around the tubes and picnic areas," Colson said.

Students hear Soviet views on boycott

By KRISTIE CRABTREE
Collegian Reporter

Several K-State students and faculty members got the opportunity to observe, first-hand, the effects of the Soviet boycott of the 1984 Summer Olympics in Los Angeles.

The Soviet boycott was one of many topics of conversation between the Soviets and those from K-State, when the Department of Political Science, in conjunction with the K-State intersession program, sponsored a trip to the Soviet Union May 15-29.

Joseph Hajda, professor of political science and organizer of these trips for five years, said that conversations about the Soviet boycott of the Olympic Games were the most interesting.

Hajda explained three different reactions he got from the Russians concerning the boycott. First, individuals in official positions would simply repeat arguments that had been published.

"We minimized contacts with those kind of people. I found scholars and students quite interested in listening to my views," he said. "They weren't ready to challenge me."

"Then there were the ordinary people and I had good talks with them about the boycott. They seemed to view the Soviet boycott as a 'tit-for-tat' reaction. They were very sorry there would be no Soviet participation," he added.

Other topics of conversation were U.S.-Soviet relations and the U.S.-Soviet grain trade.

Hajda explained that this year's tour was organized through a travel agency, which had in mind a low-cost prerequisite. The cost for the tour was a little more than $1,500.

"I schedule these trips primarily for educational reasons," Hajda said, "because the exposure to Soviet reality is so important in understanding and comprehending what is happening there."

"How that society (Soviet) compares with other societies and what kind of political and economical systems one can find there are such important issues from an educational point of view," Hajda explained.

Students who were enrolled in intersession and participating in the tour could receive two hours of credit by doing required readings, keeping a diary and presenting a paper when they returned.

The trip began May 15 when the group of 27 flew from New York to Helsinki, changed planes in Helsinki and flew to Moscow. They stayed in Moscow May 16-20.

While in Moscow, the group had a chance to do some sightseeing.

"We had visits to the Kremlin, to great Russian cathedrals and had ample time to explore the city on our own," Hajda said.

The group stayed in Kiev May 21-23, then flew to Leningrad and stayed there May 23-27.

"The great experience in Leningrad was the visit to the Hermitage, one of the best art museums in the world," Hajda said.

On May 27 the group flew to Helsinki for one day, then flew to New York May 28 for one day. They returned home May 29.

The students participating on the tour got exposure to the black market, which is flourishing in the Soviet Union, Hajda said. They were often asked to sell their blue jeans, sneakers or gum.

Elizabeth Day, senior in political science, became interested in the tour when Hajda mentioned it in a political science class.

"I wanted to go last year, but I didn't have enough money. I began working 40 hours a week last February to start saving for the trip, but I still had to borrow money from my family," she said.

Day explained that many parts of the tour were interesting, but one that sticks out in her mind as particularly fascinating was Lenin's tomb.

"I was real impressed by how important it seemed to the people in Moscow," she said.

The group really didn't get to meet too many people, Day said, but the guides and motel people were really kind.

"We were pretty much isolated since we (the students) didn't speak the language. Professor Hajda was the only one who spoke Russian," she said.

Since returning home, Day said she has really noticed the differences between the two societies.

"I felt guilty for having what I have, even being a student. We have so much more choice here in the States," she said.

As far as a return trip to the Soviet Union goes, Hajda says he won't be the organizer for it.

"I have done it so many times and it is a tremendous sacrifice on my part. It's not part of my regular duties, so I have to say that I have no plans to organize another educational tour. Maybe somebody else will," he said.

Regents OK increase in University budget

By MELISSA BRUNE
Staff Writer

The Board of Regents approved Friday $1,606,500 in a base budget increase for K-State's fiscal year 1986. The University had requested a $6,005,000 budget increase.

The total operating budget for fiscal year 1985 at K-State is $151,497,919.

The K-State Veterinary Medical Center requested a base budget increase of more than $2.5 million, $450,000 of which was approved. The medical center has an operating budget for fiscal year 1985 of $8,425,063.

For the fiscal year 1986 budget, K-State requested 19 program improvement items.

"Strengthening undergraduate education," was a top priority request. K-State requested $900,000 for this item; the regents approved $250,000.

Other requests with high priority included: $300,000 for "computing support for financial and personnel planning and management," of which $150,000 was approved; $401,000 for conservation tillage, of which $250,000 was approved; $500,000 for re-establishing Extension Services, of which $270,000 was approved; $100,000 for the Konza Prairie Research Natural Area, of which $55,000 was approved; $170,000 for hazardous and solid waste research, of which $54,000 was approved; $268,000 in support for research concerning respiratory disease and environmental stress in food animals, of which $54,000 was approved; and $43,500 in improvements at the Horticulture Research Center in Sedgwick County, all of which was approved.

The board also approved a budget developed by its staff which includes a 7 percent increase in all salaries and a 7 percent increase in other operating expenses.

Also at the regents meeting, Jordan L. Haines of Wichita confirmed his resignation from the board. His resignation was effective Saturday.

Haines is leaving his position 18 months before his second four-year term expires. He said he wanted to spend more time with his business activities. Haines is chairman of the board of the Fourth National Bank and Trust Company in Wichita.

"I made the decision based upon what I perceive as a continuing time requirement which would negatively impact my business responsibilities," Haines said. "I have thoroughly enjoyed serving on the board."

Union closes courtyard area in order to replace ceiling

The Union courtyard area will be completely sealed and closed to the public starting Thursday and until Aug. 8 for installment of a new ceiling.

Union officials said the existing asbestos ceiling material will be removed and replaced. The automatic bank machines and postal unit services located in the courtyard area will not be available for use during the period. All other departments of the Union will be open and operating as usual.

Access to the Student Governing Services offices will be through the outside east or north doors.

State to fund accelerator afterburner

By STEVE SWAFFORD
Staff Writer

K-State will receive $3.4 million in three installments for capital construction of an afterburner on the ion accelerator at the James R. McDonald Laboratory in Cardwell Hall beginning in November.

The U.S. House passed a $15.4 billion Department of Energy bill in late May, then the Senate made a few minor changes and passed a $15.3 billion version of the bill June 21.

The DOE bill must still pass a conference committee to settle the $100,000 difference between the two versions. The funding for K-State is included in both the House and Senate bills and is also included in the original proposal presented by President Reagan.

Tom Richard, director of the research laboratory, said when the funding of the project is completed, the DOE will distribute the money in three segments: $1.5 million in fiscal year 1985, $1 million in fiscal year 1986 and $0.9 million in fiscal year 1987.

C. Lewis Cocke, professor of physics, said the construction of the afterburner would roughly triple the energy of the beam from the accelerator currently in operation. He said the present system isn't obsolete, but additional funding will enable more extensive research on ion/atom collisions.

"No, it's (the accelerator) not out of date, but we can make it more up-to-date. There are many more things we can do if we can get more energy in the beam," Cocke said.

Richard said the construction consists of two major projects. The first is the construction of a new type of ion source which will be capable of producing argon ions stripped of their electrons.

"Argon ions normally have 18 electrons bound to its nucleus and in the new system called 'cryebis,' all of the electrons are removed. This is accomplished by an electron beam confined to move through a magnetic field. The magnetic field is produced by a superconducting magnet through the use of cryogenics," Richard said.

The word "cryebis" is the conjunction of two scientific processes: "cry" for cryogenics which is the science that deals with the production of very low temperatures and their effect on the properties of matter; and "ebis" for electron bombardment ion source.

The second project is the construction of a superconducting afterburner on the laboratory's existing Van de Graeff accelerator. Richard said this project will allow the energy of the ion beams to be four times the current energy level.

Before any construction for an accelerator is to be done, K-State must build an addition onto the existing accelerator building in the basement of Cardwell at a cost of $600,000.

The University has requested state funding for the renovation project, but Cocke said if the state funding does not materialize, the University has agreed to pick up the $600,000 tab.

Richard said K-State is the largest university-based facility in high-energy ion-atom collision research. He said the operating budget of the lab is $600,000 and with the construction and additions, the budget will be about $1 million by fiscal year 1987.

"We look at collisions between very fast moving ions and atoms. We look at X-ray production. We look at debris that comes off when a violent collision takes place within a very fast ion of an atom," Cocke said.

Cocke said the research done in the lab provides a data base for the efforts of the United States to develop fusion (melting together) energy which is an alternative to fission (splitting apart) energy.

The facility provides a basic data base which supports the longer range effort of fusion energy for the DOE. K-State has basic research information to educate the scientific community on the overall background of ion/atom collisions.

Cocke said K-State started out with a nuclear laboratory, but now the facility has become almost entirely an atomic collisions laboratory over the last 10 years.

"KU (University of Kansas) does not have a program like ours (K-State's). They have a wider and less-focused program. They have a lot of other branches of physics that they concentrate on; this (atomic collisions) is not one of them and we have a large effort in this one area (atomic collisions)," Cocke said.

Cocke said nine professors in the physics department are conducting research on ion/atom collisions and the facility has received national recognition.

"The facility (when completed) will be the backbone of the Department of Energy's program at the University, based ion/atom collisions in this country. It will be a user machine where people from other universities will come here to use it," Cocke said.

Scientists warn of acid rain kill

By The Associated Press

MIAMI — Acid rain could kill the fish in at least 2,600 of Florida's lakes over the next two decades if industrial smokestacks keep dumping pollutants into the air, scientists warn.

"I was stunned when I realized how bad it was," said researcher Paul Hansen. "We'd always known that Florida was receiving acid rain, but we didn't know it was this bad."

Acid rain poses a "clear and present threat" to the environment not just in the nation's old industrial heartland but also increasingly in the South, the National Clean Air Coalition and the Friends of the Earth Foundation reported recently.

"No longer can the South afford to believe that acid rain is only a Northeastern problem," the environmental groups said in a study.

Last January, the U.S. Geological Survey also reported an increased acidity in both rain and surface water in the South; at the same time, it said the acid rain problem seemed to have stabilized in the Northeast.

But the leader of a utilities' research consortium plays down the scientists' warnings. William McCollam Jr., president of the Edison Electric Institute, accused the coalition of "selective use of information" and of practicing "the politics of fear."

What Shakespeare called "the gentle rain from heaven" is becoming a deadly chemical cocktail whose most poisonous component is sulfur dioxide, according to some environmentalists.

Scientists believe that acid rain forms when sulfur dioxide and nitrogen oxides are emitted into the atmosphere during the burning of fossil fuels such as coal. The fumes mix with water vapor in the air and return to earth as acid rain, dew, snow, sleet or even dry particles.

The Department of Environmental Regulation estimates that the state's industries send 1.1 million tons of sulfur dioxide into the air each year, including 800,000 tons from fuels burned to generate electricity.

The report by the two environmental groups noted that the South produced nearly one-third of the nation's sulfur dioxide emissions and predicted an increase unless a clean-up program was begun.

Scientists agree with the utilities that it's impossible to tell whether acid rain has yet harmed wildlife in Florida's 7,712 lakes. Some 2,600 lakes are already so acidic that they are "extremely sensitive" to acid rain, according to a University of Florida study. An additional 2,000 are considered "highly sensitive," the next notch down the scale.

When lakes register a high level of acidity, most fish eggs and young fish do not develop properly and thus don't live to adulthood. Many fish eggs become sterile.

"It's not clear as yet whether Florida fish are going belly up because of acid rain," said Dr. Alex Green, a UF professor who has studied the problem.

Although many statistics have been gathered showing how much acid rain is falling on the state, only one field study has been done on the lakes themselves.

A recent study of the 20 Trail Ridge lakes in north-central Florida by Dr. Patrick Breznick of the University of Minnesota showed that the acidity of 15 lakes had increased since the mid-1970s.

But although many Florida lakes with high acidity also are devoid of fish, scientists say it's hard to tell whether pollution is to blame. And there are still plenty of lakes that teem with fish.

"That's why scientists have trouble convincing the public that there's a problem," said Hansen, a consultant for the Izaak Walton League environmental watchdog group. "If you don't have dead fish, people don't see the problem."

Acidity in lakes increases slowly, according to Hansen and other researchers, until it reaches a level lethal to wildlife.

"It's what we call the 'death curve,'" Green said. "At first, you don't notice anything, but then it goes very quickly."

Spinka and Hansen both said the estimated $4 billion to $9 billion cost of filtering out pollutants generated by utilities in Florida would add about $1 to the average monthly home electric bill.

Play's humorous tone hides serious message

By GARY JOHNSON
Contributing Writer

The most difficult play attempted this summer by the Summer Repertory Theatre is A.R. Gurney's "The Dining Room." The play gives the illusion of being a rather light piece of entertainment, but beneath the comical veneer is a rather nostalgic mourning for the decline of WASPs as a distinctive cultural group.

Review

Gurney uses the dining room as a metaphor for an aristocratic lifestyle. As he sees it, the dining room was once the center for domestic life but has recently fallen into disuse.

Gurney has arranged his play into short scenes that overlap. The characters of one scene will not have completely finished one scene before the characters of the next scene appear on stage. This is a somewhat mechanical contrivance to ease the transition from one scene to the next, but it is fairly effective. Since each character is on stage for only a few minutes before giving way to another scene, this overlapping of scenes gives the play a semblance of continuity.

For anyone who has missed his message, Gurney makes his theme quite clear in a scene in which a young college student is doing an anthropological study of "the WASPs of northeastern United States." He studiously takes photographs of his aunt while she describes the proper method for using finger bowls. To him, those finger bowls are evidence of "an almost neurotic obsession with cleanliness, reflecting the guilt which comes with the last stages of capitalism."

When he mentions her pistol-handled knives as being a "subtle hint of aggression," she becomes irritated and chases him out of her house.

When Gurney sticks to the central metaphor, "The Dining Room" is a very strong play. It isn't the sort of play that tends to produce sidesplitting laughter; the humor is quite restrained in comparison to "True West" or "Crimes of the Heart." The laughter is gentler and in more of a "that's-witty" vein.

The biggest obstacle that had to be met in the SRT production was for the actors to make their characters become convincing in a limited time. Often an audience will take a few minutes before becoming accustomed to a given actor in a particular role. In "The Dining Room" the actors don't have the luxury of any spare time; they must make their characters work from the minute they step on stage. This puts a big burden on the performers, but they respond quite well in most instances.

Tom Overmyer shows his experience by seeming to effortlessly slide into his roles. Many of the characters he plays are quite similar, but they are convincing nonetheless.

Kelli Wondra also shows a great prowess in her ability to switch from one role to another. Her roles are quite varied, and in each instance, whether it be an energetic young girl or a senile grandmother, she becomes her character genuinely.

Barry Pearson, Craig Stout, Kathleen Pfister and Jacqueline Keller all deliver exceptional performances in this very demanding work.

Director Lew Shelton should receive special mention for helping coax the very best performances out of the actors. He shows a very adroit hand at shuffling the scenes together with a minimum of catches.

If Gurney's play has any major flaw it would be in being deceptively light. At times the SRT production clouds this further by playing the comedy a bit too broadly, but this happens only rarely. For the most part, the cast interprets the material very thoughtfully and keeps the sentiment intact without turning it into sentimentality.

The next SRT production of "The Dining Room" will be at 8 p.m. tonight in the Purple Masque Theatre in East Stadium.

City plans Fourth of July celebration

By STEVE SWAFFORD
Staff Writer

The United States will be recognizing its 208th birthday Wednesday and Manhattan will be celebrating too.

The "Little Apple" Independence Celebration is commemorating the day with activities and entertainment at the Tuttle Creek State Park River Pond Area.

"It's going to be an old-fashioned, family-type affair," said Becky Blake, director of convention and visitors bureau for the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce.

Blake said the activities start at 8 a.m. with a fishing derby for children 7 to 18 years old. There is no entry fee for the event, but Blake said pre-registration is necessary at the Chamber of Commerce. All children involved will receive a certificate, and awards will be given to the person who catches the most fish, biggest fish and smallest fish.

Two area water ski clubs will perform stunts for the celebration. Milford Ski Club is scheduled at noon while the Flint Hills Water Ski Club will perform at 7 p.m. Both shows will last about one hour.

Canoe races will highlight the afternoon water action starting at 2 p.m., with three races being sponsored by the Chamber of Commerce. The three divisions are men's 1000-yard sprint, novice 400-yard sprint and a mixed couples 500-yard sprint. Trophies will be awarded for the top finishers in each event.

Blake said she encourages participants to bring their own canoes if they have them, but some will be available at the River Pond Area. Entry fee for the canoe races is $3 per person.

Throughout the afternoon, there will be rowing exhibitions by the K-State Crew, an antique aircraft flyover, hot air balloon demonstrations, horse and buggy rides and skydiving exhibitions.

Musical entertainment will start at 2 p.m. with the Swinging K Orchestra, followed by the Tommy Lee Band at 3:30 p.m. and Velocity at 5 p.m. The entertainment is furnished by the American Confederation of Musicians Local 169 and Music Performance Trust Fund. Fort Riley's 1st Infantry Division Band will play "Salute to the 50 States" at 8:30 p.m. preceding the fireworks display at sundown.

The fireworks will be shot off the east side of the dam wall. Blake said this will provide for better viewing of the evening show. Last year the fireworks display was in the River Pond area.

Blake said some of the areas in the state park, including the River Pond Area, require the $2 single-day permit. Free parking is available in the outlet area and on both sides of the road directly below the dam.

The purpose of the celebration is to make more people aware of the recreational facilities that are available at Tuttle Creek State Park and keep more people in the area for July 4, Blake said.

Blake estimated between 10,000 to 12,000 people were at the celebration last year which fell on a three-day weekend. This year she anticipates a smaller turnout since the Fourth does not fall on the weekend.

Artist plans landscape art for new mall

An environmental landscape sculpture is being planned as the outstanding feature of the public plaza that will be the entrance to the downtown mall, said Karen Daily, redevelopment officer.

Athena Tacha, a nationally-known artist, has been selected as the artist for the project. Tacha was selected by a committee of four local residents and three experts in the art field, Daily said.

Twenty-six artists submitted materials to the committee for review. After the field was narrowed to five, Tacha was selected, Daily said.

"Tacha was recently commissioned by the city of Tulsa and she did a sculpture in the river that runs through Tulsa. It's an environmental sculpture with the river flowing over it," Daily said.

The sculpture for the public plaza is still in the preliminary design stage. Tacha is planning a sculpture which will combine landscaping and the use of water, Daily said.

"The sculpture will not just be something to look at but something to climb around on and be part of," Daily said.

A concentric-ring design that steps down to water in pools at the bottom is one of the ideas being considered, Daily said. This design would enable the pools to be drained and used as a public stage for community events.

The plaza will be located on the east side of the intersection of Third Street and Poyntz Avenue. Poyntz will be closed from Third Street east.

Judge's statement raises important questions

The courts in America are drowning under a wave of cases relating to drugs and drug abuse. Members of the judicial system and law enforcement officers are becoming increasingly disenchanted with laws that leave them virtually powerless to stop the vicious cycle of drug abuse that leads to criminal activity to support a habit, which in turn overloads the nation's courts.

A U.S. District Court judge voiced his frustrations in a statement that received nationwide publicity last week. During a sentencing of a 29-year-old Washington, D.C., woman convicted of obtaining the narcotic drug Percocet, Judge William B. Bryant suggested that one answer to this kind of drug abuse would be to legalize heroin and "just let (addicts) kill themselves."

Obviously, this kind of suggestion cannot be taken seriously. Yet Judge Bryant's statement did raise valid questions as to the handling of habitual drug abusers in this country.

Bryant said heroin should be legalized so that it would be easier for addicts to obtain drugs without resorting to crime. This, in turn, would cut down on the operations of organized crime, eliminate corruption and take away the large profit dealers make from selling drugs. As with the smoker and the drinker, the heroin addict would be able to abuse his own health without crowding court dockets, congesting prisons and making the streets unsafe at night.

Legalizing heroin would not be the cure-all for society's ills. In his statement, Judge Bryant failed to note that the courts are there to serve the public, even the drug abuser who is forced to turn to crime to support his habit. But it is obvious that something needs to be done to remedy America's drug problem.

One step in the right direction would be formulating some plan to reform the drug user without sending him to jail.

In the case Bryant was hearing during his heroin legalization statement, he refused to send the woman to jail for her prescription forgery. Instead, Bryant placed the woman on probation on the condition that she continue a program for drug addicts similar to Alcoholics Anonymous, which requires participants to remain drug-free. Bryant labled the government's approach to dealing with drug abusers inside the criminal justice system "ridiculous" and suggested that abuse should be dealt with outside the penal system.

Bryant's suggestion raises a pertinent question. Why send drug abusers to jails that encourage, instead of discourage, the use of narcotics, risking further addiction to different deadly drugs?

Establishment of a new court method dealing with the problems of drug abuse should be considered by the government. A system, such as the one Bryant suggested, which assists drug abusers instead of simply punishing them, is vital to combat the growing problem of drugs and their side affects in this country.

Judge Bryant's statement supporting the legalization of heroin appear to be the words of a man frustrated with the current way of dealing with the drug problems crowding the court systems. While legalization is most definitely not the answer to the problem, Bryant's statement should still be studied by those government leaders so far removed from a desperate problem.

Landscaping provides favorable atmosphere

A leisurely walk through campus can be an enjoyable experience, even if one is on the way to class or a meeting. This campus is becoming more attractive every year. The beauty of the campus is an asset to everyone.

Not only is it nice to enjoy a walk through campus, it is a positive aspect for possible students and their parents to get such a favorable impression of K-State immediately upon arrival.

The groundskeepers, landscapers and maintenance people should be proud of the job they do in providing a pleasant atmosphere for education. Maintaining the beauty of this campus is not a one-time activity; there is always something that can be done to make campus more attractive. It often appears as though the groundskeepers work far more than anyone else on campus.

The grandeur of some of the old buildings on campus is enhanced by the clean, crisp look of the well-kept flower beds and the perpetually trimmed lawns. New structures look even more polished with these natural decorations.

The Quinlan Natural Area is precisely the cool-looking, inviting atmosphere it was meant to be. And as one walks by Farrell Library and Denison Hall, the eye is met by a myriad of colors adorning the sidewalk.

This campus has the look of being meticulously well-groomed because it is. Everyone knows the importance of appearances, and K-State is no exception. The beauty of this campus is no mistake. It is the product of many, many hours of labor.

Compliments go out to those who worked so hard at this job — keep up the good work.

Medical prescriptions pose danger to patients

Between 10 million and 20 million of us each week are placed on medication by our doctors. One out of every two times we step into the doctor's office, we receive some kind of prescription drug. And each time we assume that we are safe — after all aren't doctors well-trained professionals? And doesn't the federal government test and regulate these drugs?

BRAD RUSSELL
Collegian Columnist

The answer, quite frankly, is no, both times. Since prescription drugs are legally defined as poison, hence the need for a prescription, every medication has the potential to cause unwanted side effects. So any system of regulation is bound to be imperfect. But that hardly excuses the medical industry and the government from trying to make things safer.

Overall, of the 20 million weekly users of prescription medications, one-seventh will end up in the hospital with an adverse drug reaction. In layman's terms, an adverse drug reaction (ADR) is any side effect serious enough to produce physical harm and is not caused by patient misuse.

The possible reactions range from mild headaches to nausea to drug-induced death. Each year 30,000 to 160,000 individuals lose their lives because of adverse drug reactions. The impact of these reactions is staggering, costing the U.S. economy nearly $5 billion annually, according to Dr. David Burkholder of the University of Missouri at Kansas City.

But the saddest part of the whole story is that most of these deaths could have been avoided. Many of these drugs are unnecessary, with one of every 10 prescriptions going for medication that is totally ineffective and potentially hazardous. Why does this occur?

Well, first, doctors are not very well-educated when it comes to prescribing medication — a frightening thought when one thinks about how often they do it. Upon graduation from medical school, the average physician will have completed only six to 10 hours of pharmacology, these account for less than 1 percent of their total education. The end result is much like placing a stage coach driver behind the wheel of race car.

For instance, a national test was given to a random sample of doctors about the use of antibiotics. Of those who could finish the exam, more than half received a score of 68 or below, in other words a "D." Now there's a confidence builder.

In addition, one must realize that the major influence upon physicians' prescribing practices are the promotional activities of the drug industry. This is hardly surprising when one learns that the U.S. drug industry spends $7,500 per physician a year on advertising.

To make matters worse, the claims in these ads are misleading. Results from a National Academy of Science survey showed that almost 70 percent of the drug industry's claims were not supported by adequate evidence. Such claims, coupled with the doctors' lack of knowledge in the area, "persuade the medical community to prescribe drugs too often, or unwisely or both," according to Dr. Mickey Smith of the University of Mississippi. Clearly, many physicians have bought the drug industry's slogan — "better living through chemistry."

Perhaps the impact of ADRs could be limited if the government could adequately regulate even the most dangerous drugs. But it doesn't. Responsibility for handling drug reactions lies with the Food and Drug Administration. Its performance can, at best, be called dismal and at its worse, dangerous. A review the General Accounting Office, the investigative arm of the U.S. Congress, revealed that the FDA is troubled by a lack of information, cooperation and dedication.

However, the biggest stumbling block to effective regulation is the cozy relationship between the FDA and the drug companies. Several FDA administrators have worked for the companies they are supposed to regulate and will almost certainly have jobs waiting for them when they retire. In the past, the FDA has forewarned companies of upcoming investigations and has been very lenient with the results of industry drug tests. So much for the fear of government regulation.

Such deficiencies do not exist in the FDA's Bureau of Veterinary Medicine. In that agency, adverse reactions from around the world are recorded and reported quickly and completely. Each vet receives a computer readout of all recent reactions every two weeks. Just think of it, when thousands of humans suffer and die from certain medications, this information has almost no chance of reaching other doctors. But when a cow belches unexpectedly in Davenport, Iowa, the information is in the hands of every FDA veterinarian within 14 days.

The problem of ADRs, however, is not just the fault of the doctors, or the government or the industry. To a large extent, we bring the problem on ourselves. Let's face it, when we go visit the doctor, we expect results, we want a quick fix. Living life in the fast lane, we don't have time to exercise or rest for a couple of days. It's much easier to simply swallow a couple of pills and go on our way, regardless of the price.

And unless we change our attitudes, we are destined to lose a city the size of Manhattan each year due to ADRs. No wonder Dr. Micha Levy once observed that, "ADRs represent one of the most common problems that faces modern medicine." Better living through chemistry? Don't you believe it.

Letters

Speed law enforcement should be priority

Editor,

Re: Bijay Argawalla's and Donald Dilling's letters about Jardine drives.

Both have very valid points. Drivers do show a high degree of negligence around Jardine and there are many parents who appear to have an indifferent attitude when it comes to the safety and well-being for their children.

The problem is not necessarily the lack of parental supervision, although this contributes greatly to the problem. Even if parents were constantly supervising their children, this would not slow the speed of the drivers through Jardine. Agreed, speed bumps might help, but why spend the money to put bumps in our bumpy roads? Why not spend the money to fix the roads? We have a security force that is paid, willing and able to write tickets. Why not put them to work writing speeding tickets instead of parking tickets? I'm sure that the K-State Police force has the equipment and the ability to see that the speed limits are obeyed, but are they willing? Enforcement of the speed limits in and around Jardine and on campus, as a whole, is severely lacking.

This lack of enforcement is dangerous, more so I feel than someone parking in the wrong area of a parking lot. How many close calls have we seen between pedestrians/cyclists and cars speeding around campus? How often have you had a close call while backing out of a parking stall on campus? More than you would care to count. The reason people speed on campus is because they know there are only two chances of them being caught. Slim and none. The frequency of these "close calls" is greatly magnified in and around the Jardine area, where children often go unsupervised.

It appears that perhaps the K-State Police have their priorities mixed. The No. 1 priority appears to be the enforcement of parking regulations. Enforcement of parking regulations is important, but more important is the enforcement of the speed laws on campus. After all, how many pedestrians have been hurt by a parked car?

Cagney retreats after hospital stay

BOOTHBAY HARBOR, Maine — A limousine whisked actor James Cagney from this coastal resort to his New York state farm Monday, about two weeks after he entered a hospital following a heart attack.

Cagney, 84, his wife, Willy, and a paramedic attendant left the Fisherman's Wharf Inn and Motel on Monday morning, according to the Boothbay Register, a local newspaper. A motel spokesman confirmed Cagney had checked out.

He was released Saturday from St. Andrew's Hospital, said his agent, Marge Zimmermann. He had entered the hospital June 16.

Aborigine talks on Indian culture

SEATTLE — A 75-year-old Australian aborigine is touring the United States and Canada this summer to talk to North American Indians about the preservation of their native cultures.

"They lose their culture because of the white man's ways and go from good to bad," said Guboo Ted Thomas, speaking of most of Australia's 160,000 aborigine natives.

Economic need has forced the Australian aborigines to become urbanized, said Thomas. Only 200 of the 3,500 members of his tribe, the Yuins, remain on the Mumballa Mountain about 300 miles south of Sydney in the lush, mountainous coast of New South Wales, he added.

Cronkite to work at conventions

NEW YORK — CBS newsman Walter Cronkite, who has been at the television anchor desk for every Republican and Democratic national convention but one since 1952, will report as a special correspondent at this summer's gatherings, the network announced Monday.

Cronkite, who stepped down from the "CBS Evening News" anchor job in 1982, will provide "insights and perspectives" with occasional appearances from the anchor booth with his successor, Dan Rather, the announcement said.

Rather will be presiding over his first convention when the Democrats meet in San Francisco July 16.

'King of country' enters hospital

NASHVILLE — Eighty-year-old Grand Ole Opry star Roy Acuff underwent tests Monday after being hospitalized with chest and stomach pains, but he was well enough to joke with hospital staffers.

"If anybody wants to know what's wrong with me," he instructed, "tell 'em I just drank too much of my favorite beverage — cranberry juice."

Acuff, known as "the king of country music," had been scheduled to perform at the Opry on Sunday, but said he wasn't feeling well and drove to Edgefield Hospital, said Opry spokesman Jerry Strobel.

Acuff, famous for songs such as "The Wabash Cannonball" and "The Great Speckled Bird," has sung and played his fiddle on the Opry's live radio show since 1938 and is a regular on the syndicated television show "Hee Haw." He suffered a heart attack in 1976.

Mark Dobbins, Kevin Muff, Ron Meyer, and Brad Underwood, four new K-State basketball recruits, also enjoy the swimming pool at their house on Sunset Avenue.

'Cats' recruits fill house that Jack built

By TIM FITZGERALD
Collegian Reporter

It isn't unusual in a college town like Manhattan for four students to live together.

However, living at 511 Sunset Ave. are four students who differ slightly from other K-Staters — they are basketball recruits for next season.

Mark Dobbins, Ron Meyer, Kevin Muff and Brad Underwood live in a slightly run-down house with a front yard swimming pool.

All four had the same reason for coming to K-State: Coach Jack Hartman and his style of basketball.

They came to play basketball and Hartman has kept them busy this summer. Two of them work eight hours a day. The other two take classes and practice 1½ hours a day. Four nights a week they practice for two hours and another two nights a week they lift weights.

Meyer, a 6-9 freshman center and all-state selection for the last two seasons from Haysville Campus High School, said that between working construction 40 hours a week and practicing daily, he is grateful for the pool because it has become his only relaxation.

"You really don't have time (to do much). You work all day and then lift weights, so swimming is about it," Meyer said.

A 6-4 junior guard from McPherson, Underwood said he not only came to K-State because of Hartman, but because K-State has a strong accounting curriculum. Underwood is enthusiastic about spending his summer in Manhattan.

"I like it quite a bit, because if you've ever been in McPherson, Kansas... No, McPherson is no place to pick up a basketball game," Underwood said.

Underwood has come to K-State after spending his freshman season at Hardin Simmons University at Abilene, Texas, and last season at Independence (Kan.) Junior College where he averaged a team high 15 points per game, leading Independence to a second place finish in the junior college national tournament.

Muff is a 6-6 junior forward from Salina Central High School and transfers from Cloud County Community College. Muff, who averaged 14 points and 12 rebounds a game last year, said being in Manhattan for the summer is helping to improve his game.

"Manhattan has a lot of good competition to play against and that is helping a lot over the summer," Muff said.

Dobbins, a 6-5 freshman guard, averaged 24 points per game for Humboldt High School last year and was an all-state selection. He said he doesn't mind spending his summer in Manhattan, but he still needs to get away occasionally.

"It's fine as long as we get to go home once in a while," Dobbins said. The four said they all get along well, but life in the house hasn't been all fun. Following the big rains earlier this month the basement, where Underwood's room is, flooded. Even though the carpet is spread over the garage floor and the basement smells like a lake, they've kept a good attitude about the flooding.

"Our house is a marina," Dobbins said. "We now have minnows on sale."

"How many people can say they have two pools?" Underwood added. "One in the front and another in the basement."

The men said cooking has been the biggest inconvenience for them, but they said they've discovered several local fast-food restaurants. Meyer said Underwood is the only one who even bothers trying to cook.

"Eating is the only bad thing," Underwood said. "The only thing I cook really well is hamburger and macaroni and cheese."

Dobbins agreed Underwood is not exactly a talented a cook.

"Yeah, Underwood can open a mean bag of Doritos," Dobbins said.

All four are highly positive about the upcoming season.

"We're going to surprise some people," Muff said.

The roles they are projecting they will play vary. Muff and Underwood, being junior college transfers, are interested in stepping immediately into roles on the team, while Dobbins and Meyer think next year will be more of a learning experience.

"(I'm) hoping to play right away and contribute," Underwood said. "I think for awhile my role will be leadership and shooting the ball from the point guard position."

"(My role will be) wherever coach thinks I can help the team the most," Muff said. "I think there is a little more pressure coming in as a junior, because you're expected to do more than if you were a freshman. You're expected to know more about the game, but that puts a lot more excitement in it."

Despite their lack of home cooking, flood waters in the basement and being away from home, all four agree they like being in Manhattan for one reason — basketball.

KC sweeps twin-bill from Indians

By The Associated Press

CLEVELAND — Steve Balboni continued his recent slugging with a two-run homer in the first game and a home run and double in the nightcap as the Kansas City Royals swept Monday's two-night double-header from the Cleveland Indians 9-3 and 4-3.

George Brett also hit a two-run homer in the first game to support the seven-hit pitching of Larry Gura, 9-4.

In the nightcap, Balboni gave the Royals a 1-0 lead in the second with his homer. Willie Wilson tripled and scored on a sacrifice fly to make it 2-0 in the third against rookie Roy Smith, 2-1.

Cleveland tied it with runs in the third and fifth off Mike Jones. Brett Butler doubled in a run in the third and doubled and scored on Julio Franco's single in the fifth.

In the Kansas City sixth, Balboni doubled but was thrown out at the plate on Buddy Biancalana's single. Biancalana took second on the play and scored on U.L. Washington's single.

The Royals added the game-winning run in the ninth on Pat

Sheridan's single and a double by Brett, offsetting a homer by Cleveland's Jerry Willard in the top of the inning off the Royals' Dan Quisenberry.

Mark Huismann, 1-2, pitched 2-3 innings of two-hit relief for the victory and Quisenberry worked the last two innings for the save.

In the first game, Gura struck out three and didn't walk a batter in hurling his third complete game. He gave up two runs in the third on Chris Bando's RBI double and Tony Bernazard's RBI single and another in the ninth on Pat Tabler's homer.

Brett put the Royals ahead 2-0 in the first with his homer after Willie Wilson drew a walk from Neal Heaton, 5-7.

Top 3 net Wimbledon wins as tournament narrows to 8

By The Associated Press

WIMBLEDON, England — The "Big Three" of men's tennis — John McEnroe, Ivan Lendl and Jimmy Connors — on Monday took different routes to Wimbledon's quarterfinals, where they'll find unexpected company.

McEnroe breezed past 14th-seeded rival Bill Scanlon. Connors came on strong after a stumbling start against No. 16 Tim Mayotte, and Lendl struggled through five sets before outlasting unseeded Scott Davis.

But they all won, which is more than can be said for fifth-seeded Jimmy Arias, No. 11 Kevin Curren of South Africa, No. 12 Johan Kriek and No. 15 Vitas Gerulaitis.

Instead, joining the top three seeds in the quarters are qualifier Paul Annacone of East Hampton, N.Y.; two unseeded players, John Sadri of Charlotte, N.C., and Australian Pat Cash; No. 6 Andres Gomez of Ecuador; and No. 13 Tomas Smid of Czechoslovakia.

Women's singles play on the 100th anniversary of the women's tournament at the All-England Lawn Tennis and Croquet Club, went more according to form.

In Centre Court ceremonies following a 45-minute rain delay and before the matches, 17 former Wimbledon women's singles champions were honored. The ceremony honored Wednesday, July 16, 1884, when 13 women players walked onto the court for the first All-England women's tennis tournament.

Top-seeded Martina Navratilova, seeking her third consecutive Wimbledon singles crown, advanced to the quarterfinals when her opponent, Australia's Elizabeth Sayers, had to retire because of illness. Also advancing were No. 3 Hana Mandlikova, No. 4 Pam Shriver, No. 6 Kathy Jordan, No. 7 Manuela Maleeva and No. 10 Jo Durie. Chris Evert Lloyd, a three-time champion who is seeded No. 2, was unable to play because of a delay caused by the rain. She will face No. 12 Claudia Kohde-Kilsch of West Germany on Tuesday.

The men's quarterfinal pairings will send McEnroe against Sadri, Cash against Gomez, Annacone against Connors and Smid against his Czechoslovakian Davis Cup teammate, Lendl.

In the women's quarters, Navratilova will take on Maleeva, Shriver will play Jordan, Durie will face Mandlikova and Karlsson will meet the winner of the Lloyd-Kohde match.

McEnroe, who defeated Scanlon in the fourth round here last year but lost to him in the fourth round at the 1983 U.S. Open, took only 1 hour, 43 minutes to crush the Dallas right-hander 6-3, 6-3, 6-1.

After Scanlon broke McEnroe's service in the sixth game of the second set to pull even at 3-3, the No. 1 seed from New York ripped off the next eight games, taking a 2-0 lead in sets and a 5-0 advantage in the final stanza.

"Once I broke back, I really dominated the match," said McEnroe, who again followed his own advice and let his racket do the talking.

Houston's Kelly wins award

By The Associated Press

Jim Kelly of the Houston Gamblers, a rookie who put together the most productive season ever by a professional quarterback, was named the United States Football League's Player of the Year Monday by The Associated Press.

The 6-3, 215-pound rookie out of the University of Miami, who spurned the Buffalo Bills of the National Football League to sign with the expansion Gamblers, received 30 of a possible 36 votes in the balloting by reporters from each USFL city.

He led Houston to a 13-5 regular season record and a USFL playoff berth by passing for 5,219 yards and 44 touchdowns in the quick-striking "run and shoot" offense installed by offensive coordinator Mouse Davis.

The touchdown total, accomplished in the 18-game USFL season, was an all-time pro record, four more than Pete Liske's 40 TD passes for Calgary of the Canadian Football League in 1967 and eight more than the NFL record of 36 set by Y.A. Tittle in a 12-game season in 1963.

Kelly's nine 300-yard games surpassed the record of eight set by Dan Fouts during a 16-game NFL season in 1980. And the yardage mark is second to Warren Moon's 5,648 for Edmonton of the CFL in 1983.

Kelly, whose contract with the Gamblers pays him nearly $1 million a year, acknowledged that it was easier for him in the USFL than it would have been in the established NFL.

"I don't know if I could have done this in the NFL," Kelly said. "I wouldn't have had the run and shoot offense in the NFL. I came to the USFL because I wanted to play right away and I don't regret it. I love the USFL and I hope its around for many more years."

Reagan launches blitz in prospect of winning working class support

By The Associated Press

DECATUR, Ala. — President Reagan wooed Southern voters Wednesday at the "Firecracker 400" stock car race in Florida and the "Spirit of America" festival in Alabama at the start of a campaign tour aimed at undercutting Democratic support among blue-collar workers in industrial states.

Opening a three-day blitz of appearances in Florida, Alabama, Michigan and Texas, the president issued a Fourth of July message describing America as "a rocket, pushing upward and outward into space, into human history."

Reagan described as "very rude and unnecessary" the two-hour detention earlier Wednesday of two U.S. diplomats by officials in the Soviet Union.

The president also told reporters at the Daytona International Speedway in Daytona Beach, Fla., he did not consider the incident "serious in the sense of taking hostages or anything." But he called it "a major annoyance."

Later, aboard Air Force One, White House spokesman Larry Speakes said the United States has "protested the Soviet detention of our diplomats orally."

"You might call it a strong protest," Speakes said.

As the jet engines of Air Force One pushed the presidential party into the South, Reagan used a radio-telephone to start the "Firecracker 400" with the standard: "Gentlemen, start your engines."

"It's a wonderful Fourth of July for me," Reagan said later as he watched Richard Petty drive to victory. "It's a real kick for me."

But when the president, once a radio sportscaster, tried his hand at describing the race for radio listeners he ran into trouble.

"Somebody just went past somebody," Reagan said as the cars charged by at speeds of more than 200 miles an hour. "I think they changed positions."

After the race, Reagan joined the drivers and crews and their families for a holiday picnic.

He ate fried chicken with his fingers, was hugged and kissed by country singer Tammy Wynette, who sang "Stand By Your Man." Reagan congratulated Petty and mingled with other top stock car drivers.

"I know how you all feel, too, because I'm in a little race myself this year," he said.

While Reagan worked the South, Vice President George Bush was campaigning in Blue Island, Ill., a largely blue-collar community south of Chicago.

Asked about the Reagan administration's appeal to working-class voters, Bush acknowledged, "We do have strong opposition from the bosses of organized labor who opposed us four years ago."

He said the opposition came particularly from Lane Kirkland, president of the AFL-CIO.

Bush said Reagan appeals to the working class because he shares many of the social values that working men and women hold in high regard.

Reagan carried all four states against then-President Carter in 1980. The political undertones notwithstanding, the Reagan-Bush re-election campaign committee was paying for only part of the trip.

In an interview with Orlando, Fla., television stations, Reagan suggested that the declared intention of the Rev. Jesse Jackson to attempt to negotiate the release of Soviet dissident Andrei Sakharov may be contrary to the intent of U.S. law.

Beyond that, Reagan said, the Democratic presidential candidate's new effort "ignores things that might be going on in the quiet diplomatic channels that we have going forward."

Reagan noted that the Logan Act bars private citizens from negotiating with foreign governments, but said his administration does not intend to take action against Jackson under that law.

In response to repeated questions, Reagan also defended his administration's bid to force all 50 states to make the drinking age to 21, saying the risks of damage to states rights are worth the benefits of saving youthful lives.

Later, at a Spirit of America festival at Point Mallard Park in Decatur, Ala., Reagan hailed traditional American and democratic values and contrasted them to the world of totalitarian states which he called "a tired place held down by a gravity of its own devising."

"Other countries see our entrepreneurial spirit and seek to emulate it," the president said. "More and more the world is reawakening to the fact that freedom is better than tyranny."

1985 farm bill takes shape

Reagan seeks advice from ag leaders

By TIM CARPENTER
Collegian Reporter

WASHINGTON — As the 1985 farm bill begins to take shape, politicians and farm leaders are calling for a change in the direction of agricultural policy.

With input from a variety of educational, political and agricultural leaders, the federal government will be writing a new farm bill next year that will run from 1985-89.

In a recent presentation to more than 600 agricultural leaders, Senate Finance Committee Chairman Robert Dole, R-Kan., stressed the need to review the level of federal spending on agricultural programs.

"We can't spend $19 billion for price support programs, $12 billion for a Payment-In-Kind program like we did last year and say that's progress in agriculture," Dole said. "Many farmers find themselves in more distress now than they were three or four years ago."

"We must find some other way to face up to the problems in agriculture. The new farm bill must reflect the changes that are occurring in agriculture in the 1980s," he said.

In a recent speech at the White House, President Reagan expressed his concern for the 1985 farm bill.

"Today, we're hard at work on the 1985 farm bill. The Department of Agriculture is, and will continue, to actively solicit farmers' views on the bill. So far, they have accepted hundreds of pages of written recommendations and held listening sessions in Chicago, Atlanta, Syracuse and Riverside, Calif.," Reagan said.

Reagan said he believes a strong international agricultural policy, as well as a strong domestic policy, will ensure the economic and political success of a new farm bill.

"What we're doing, and what we'll continue to do, is to pursue new export markets and work to remove export barriers. Our trade teams have been continuously on the go in search of new markets," Reagan said.

"Last year we demonstrated our determination to counter export subsidies and recover a 1 million-ton wheat flour market in Egypt. As a result, the European community has joined us in serious discussions in an effort to solve some of the problems caused by their subsidized exports," Reagan said.

"Let me assure you. Now that we've regained our reputation as a reliable supplier, we intend to maintain that reputation. At home we tackled the price-depressing surplus of 1981 and '82, that could have hung over the market for years by quickly stepping in with the Payment-In-Kind program," Reagan said.

"Hopefully, the 1985 farm bill will move us closer to the point where the market, not the government, will be sending signals to our producers," he said.

During the first Agricultural Communicators' Congress, held last week in Washington, D.C., representatives of five of the agriculture industry's largest farmer organizations — National Farmers Union, the National Grange, the National Farmers Organization, the American Farm Bureau Federation, and the American Agricultural Movement — all gave their views on the 1985 farm bill.

"We are losing more than 1,000 farms each week, banks are close to economic chaos and there is hunger in major cities," said Cy Carpenter, president of the National Farmers Union.

"These problems are puzzling in light of the fact that the United States is the most productive agricultural system in the world," he added.

"In my opinion, the 1985 farm and food bill must attach value to the present agricultural system and rural community and provide for the proper use of food," Carpenter said. "Food is a national resource and the people are entitled to food as a matter of public policy."

In addition, Carpenter said a new farm bill must regulate production and price supports so farmers can stay in business.

"We have a predictability in the market place. We should develop farm programs accordingly," he said.

Edward Anderson, president of the National Grange, said a new farm bill must return some degree of profitability to agriculture.

"Prices in agriculture fluctuate too much and the government must provide programs to purchase the excess that farmers produce," Anderson said.

Anderson said the National Grange supports a producer-held reserve, a target price program that will cover the cost of production, a strengthening of the federal marketing programs and an expansion of foreign markets in a new farm bill.

"Agriculture is experiencing a severe communication problem. The family farms and ranchers have gone through the wringer and the general public is unaware of the economic emergency in the nation's

Officials find fishermen's bodies

ZEANDALE — Bodies of three men who apparently disappeared while fishing three days ago were recovered from the Blue and Kansas rivers Wednesday.

The bodies have been positively identified but the names have not been released, pending notification of relatives, said Sgt. Larry Freeby of the Riley County Police Department.

"Unofficially the cause of death is believed to be drowning, but there isn't a coroner's report yet," Freeby said.

Gerald Schmidt, investigator for the Pottawatomie County

Police Department, was at the scene when the second body was retrieved from the Kansas River. He said the bodies may be those of three Topeka men who were last seen Sunday when they left home to go fishing at Clinton Lake, west of Lawrence.

The first body was found in the Blue River in Manhattan, Schmidt said.

"The body was found by a couple of kids around 6:30 (Wednesday morning) at the east end of Knox Lane," he said. "It was retrieved about 7:30."

Riley County Police Col. Les Bieler said agents of the Kansas

Fish and Game Commission and a military helicopter from Fort Riley searched the river for the other men.

The second body was spotted north of Zeandale by searchers in the helicopter at about 1:30 p.m. It was retrieved by boat at about 3 p.m.

The third body was discovered soon after the second in the same area of the river, Freeby said.

A pickup truck driven by the three Topeka men was found abandoned near the Rocky Ford area of the Kansas River, Schmidt said. The men were using a 14-foot aluminum boat, Bieler said.

Fire in wood rooming house claims at least 14 residents

By The Associated Press

BEVERLY, Mass. — A predawn fire raced through an old rooming house on Wednesday, killing at least 14 people among the poor, retarded and former mental patients who lived there. Two people were missing and 13 were injured, fire officials said.

The fire chief said the 80-year-old brick and wood structure was "built to burn."

"There were flames coming out the windows, heavy smoke, people were hanging out and yelling for help," Fire Chief Dean Palmer said of the scene in the south end of this city 25 miles north of Boston.

Palmer said several people jumped from windows or were rescued over ladders. One man was dead on arrival at Beverly Hospital from injuries he suffered in a fall from a top-floor window.

At least 13 people, including a firefighter and a police officer, were taken to hospitals in the area. Seven were admitted, one in critical condition, and six were treated and released.

"This is the worst fire in terms of loss of human life that has ever occurred in almost 350 years in Beverly, and the worst fire in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts in 25 years," said Mayor F. John Monahan at a news conference.

Monahan said the fire spread so quickly that six victims were found burned to death in their beds.

He said the building was in full compliance with regulations, but vowed to find out why the fatal fire occurred, calling for an investigation of state fire, building and safety codes.

James Punchard, 42, a janitor who had lived in the Elliott Chambers building for four months, said he heard the fire alarm shortly after the blaze broke out at 4:15 a.m.

When he opened his door, Punchard said, "it was like opening the door to a wood stove. All I had on was a pair of skivvies, I mean I didn't have time to get any...my hair started to singe, burn. I just ran."

"Everyone knew that place was ready to go," said Punchard, adding that he was "forced to live there. When you're making $7,000 a year you can't spend a lot on an apartment."

Medical Examiner Russell J. Rowell confirmed that 14 were dead.

Red Cross worker Virginia Clarizia said there were 36 people in the building at the time of the fire — 33 residents and three visitors. After an eight-hour search, authorities accounted for 20 people, besides the dead, leaving the whereabouts of two still unknown.

Names of most of the victims were withheld pending notification of relatives. But the mayor said the victims include rooming house manager Hatty Whary and her two grandsons, aged 10 and 20, whose names were not available.

Palmer said the building, which housed shops on the ground floor and apartments on the upper two, had no sprinkler system, but had a new fire alarm and "met minimum emergency standards."

"It's an old wooden building," he said. "It was built to burn."

He said the cause of the blaze was unknown, but he believed it started in the front stairway, trapping people inside.

The rooming house catered to low-income tenants, retarded people and former mental patients, according to Palmer and other officials.

Maj. Daisy Ticehurst at the Salvation Army chapter across from the rooming house said "a lot of people came in here for food, clothing and counseling. A lot of them didn't have any family. Their only friends were the Salvation Army."

"They had no other place to go. You wouldn't live there if you had another place to go," she said.

Diana Hampton, 34, who said she lived in the building five months, said "I don't know what woke me up, but when I opened the door there was a cloud of smoke and I couldn't breathe."

"I put a fan in the window and stuck my head out the other one. Then a half an hour later they got me. 'I got out with just my glasses and my nightgown,' Hampton added. "My teeth are up there."

Clarizia said volunteers were working to find shelter and clothes for those driven from their beds.

"It's the worst fire tragedy in the history of the city of Beverly," said Mayor Jack Monahan.

Strong will profit from NCAA ruling

A recent 7-2 decision by the Supreme Court ruled that the National Collegiate Athletic Association's control of football television rights was unconstitutional.

This ruling also voided two-year contracts with ABC, CBS and ESPN worth more than $150 million to NCAA schools, giving schools and conferences the freedom to sell television rights as they so choose. These contracts were said to violate the federal antitrust law.

This high court decision leaves questions that many colleges are now trying to find answers to. Where will the television dollars go? Will the rich get richer? Will the poor get poorer? Will the major college football powers become weekly occurrences on TV? And a local question, how will this affect the K-State football program or will there be any effect?

Many smaller colleges believe that this new freedom from the NCAA past policy was written so that larger and smaller schools alike would gain some benefit from televised football games.

But, as it now stands, it appears that only the schools that already have strong football programs and that are "in demand" by the fans will reap any benefits. These schools have the money to better their negotiation powers — unlike the smaller schools who aren't as well-known as larger powerhouses and who once depended on the NCAA policy to help gain recognition through televised games.

So, it does appear that the rich will, in fact, get richer and the poor will get poorer. There will be televised games every Saturday airing teams such as the Nebraska, Penn State, Alabama, Notre Dame, Oklahoma, Southern Cal and other well-known teams with strong football backgrounds — eliminating the slight chance of smaller schools ever receiving any television deals to help boost their revenue.

As for K-State, it doesn't look too promising, either. K-State hasn't been too involved in television games in the past and the ruling doesn't leave it too much room for future involvement.

Inevitably, K-State will do what the Big Eight Conference decides to do concerning a television package for the conference. Until the lower courts devise new guidelines and make a new ruling, the outcome of televising smaller schools' football games is up in the air.

Drinking bill opinion depends on viewer's age

Elizabeth Dole recently told a correspondent on a CBS news program that even if she were under age 21 she would still support federal legislation raising the age to purchase and consume alcohol.

I always have problems giving parachute statements such as that much credibility; it's always easier to be self-righteous and profound after the war is over.

Now that I'm 21, I can't say I really care if the wind blows to the east or west concerning alcohol, but if some Washington bureaucrat ever attempted raising the age to an orbit higher than 21, I think I would zealously crusade to the steps of Capitol Hill in protest.

When I was 18, and the threat of not being able to consume 3.2 beer was relatively new, I developed all types of arguments, which most people say have nothing to do with buying or drinking alcohol. But to me then and somewhat now, in an ideological sense, I rationalized that if I was considered able to be drafted or vote, why not be able to consume 3.2 beer, or everything else for that matter?

When I turned 18 in 1980, the first thing I remembered having to do was register for the draft, so President Carter could flex in front of the Russians in Afghanistan. Those I registered with and I couldn't say we believed we were going to get drafted, but the possibility was never too far from our thoughts.

After what felt like selling my soul to the military, nursing a beer seemed more than a privilege — it was even more than a constitutional right.

Thinking of issues in ultimates, I began to wonder exactly what it would be like if I ever did get drafted. I would go through four months of having some drill instructor eat my buttocks for lunch. Then I might be thrown in some foreign country where the natives would spit on me and burn effigies of Uncle Sam. Then there was the strong possibility of being shot at or captured.

But to come back after that to the United States and be refused a beer because I'm not "responsible" enough at age 18... I would have to ask if that "irresponsibility" extended to shooting a rifle, laying my life on the line and having to kill others.

I would have told the Rev. Richard Taylor, this Kansan's life isn't at it best, so go fight your own wars. Granted, things never came close to making it that far, but the possibility was real enough.

The arguments I always heard included "being old enough to be drafted has nothing to do with the number of teen-age alcohol-related deaths or the numerous other problems related to alcohol." I always heard that from somebody old enough to drink, but too old to get drafted, or from the wrong sex to get drafted for that matter, Elizabeth.

WAYNE PRICE
Arts and Features Editor

No, drinking has nothing to do with war, but then again the MX missile has nothing to do with peace either. Where's the consistency of conscience? Why is it the Mothers Against Drunk Drivers valiantly testify about the number of deaths related to the lower drinking age and then legislators decide we have a problem? Before the sun falls the next day there's federal legislation.

But the mothers of the 265 Marines killed in Lebanon are barely a whisper. There are month-long debates and political side-stepping and all we do is wait for the specific issue to go away until the problem arises in new form. And remember, a sizeable number of those 265 Marines killed were under 21, ready to give their country the ultimate sacrifice. Yet their country can't even afford them a 3.2 beer. No, alcohol has nothing to do with getting drafted for those who can sit back and watch the fireworks on television.

How can people between the ages of 18 and 21 be responsible enough to vote on various tax issues, moral proposals concerning such items as gay teachers and abortion and even have a word in saying who the most important person in the world will be, and yet be too irresponsible to buy and drink a six pack of beer?

Where's the responsibility on the part of the tax evader, the corporate criminal or the doctor who milks a person's medical insurance for everything it's worth? Those voices are rarely related to persons between 18 and 21. What's good for the goose isn't necessarily good for the gander, unless the gander is 21 or older.

I'm sure those aren't the arguments of beer distributors but they're still somewhat valid arguments, at least in the mind of an 18-year-old. Has this problem of drinking just arrived or is there an election near? The last election was like something from the Civil War era, with Reagan shouting state's rights on his election platform.

Some of the arguments are valid about raising the drinking age to 21. But those who say it has nothing to do with getting drafted or voting are totally narrow-minded about how people 18 through 21 think.

I can support the Rev. Taylor and the members of MADD, as I believe they have a certain degree of sincerity behind what they believe, but I have a hard time giving much credence to those congressmen who worked out this proposal over gin and tonics.

Ending Demo barriers needs time

With the Democratic National Convention only two weeks away, it is almost certain that Walter Mondale will receive his party's nomination for president. Not surprisingly, the question is not the party's choice for a president, but Mondale's choice for vice president.

Throughout his campaign, Mondale has received endorsements from labor, women, education, ethnic groups and a variety of other organizations. And recently, Mondale has been assailed with added pressure to choose a running mate from within the ranks of these interest groups.

The National Education Association has supported Mondale for most of his campaign in his fight against Ronald Reagan and for education. Recently a spokesman for the NEA promised 270 delegates to the Democratic convention who would support Mondale.

The National Organization for Women voted Sunday to nominate a woman for vice president if Mondale doesn't, saying to the party "Run with a woman, win with a woman."

The Rev. Jesse Jackson doesn't count himself in for the vice-presidential spot, but said he would suggest candidates who would "broaden the ticket beyond just white males."

The endorsements of these groups

KAREN BELLUS
Collegian Columnist

have been the major source of support within the Democratic political machine. Anticipating the political clout of these groups, Mondale has been "interviewing" women and minorities with any political experience at all for the job of vice president. This has led to the accusation of Mondale's yes-man political tactics.

However, now is not the time for Mondale to continue his policy of trying to please Democratic interest groups who have already pledged to defeat Ronald Reagan by choosing a candidate that will satisfy the majority of the minorities.

Ronald Reagan is a formidable candidate. The Republican Party is unanimous in its choice for the presidential candidate. Currently, Reagan has a 19 percent lead over Mondale, according to a recent Gallup Poll.

Choosing a woman or minority candidate would not gain any substantial amount of votes for Mondale. The Democratic Party is united in the pledge to defeat Ronald Reagan. A minority candidate would possibly turn away Democratic voters. Minority and woman candidates are in the near future for a vice presidency. However, this year is not the year for precedent-setting if the Democrats hope to defeat Ronald Reagan.

Instead of seeking a vice-presidential candidate that will please the range of Democratic interest groups, Mondale must seek a candidate with strong experience and political notoriety that will pull votes away from the Republican Party and add support to Mondale's campaign.

Mondale, Colorado Sen. Gary Hart and Jackson have apparently resolved their differences and have pledged to work to unite the Democratic Party and defeat Ronald Reagan.

This is the direction the entire party should take. While ideals should not be compromised, the party must realize not all political barriers can successfully be eliminated in one election.

Singer Jackson films video at jail

NORTH CALDWELL, N.J. — Singer Jermaine Jackson, wearing an orange-and-red striped fantasy prison suit, has filmed a music video at the Essex County Jail Annex with scenes including an escape and dancing in the mess hall.

Lt. Frank Desmond said the 29-year-old entertainer and brother of Michael Jackson arrived at the jail at 6 p.m. Tuesday with a crew of 40 and didn't leave until 5:30 a.m. Wednesday.

Desmond said the jail's 510 inmates did not come in contact with the singer or the crew.

Jackson has recorded seven solo LPs. His "Let's Get Serious" album in 1979 sold over a million copies and was nominated for a Grammy in 1981. He joins his brothers Tito, 29, Marlon, 26, Michael, 25, and Randy, 21, on a concert tour that begins Friday in Kansas City, Mo.

Actress Kinski gives birth to boy

ROME — Actress Nastasia Kinski, star of "Tess," "Cat People" and "Unfaithfully Yours," has given birth to a boy, a spokeswoman for a private hospital said Wednesday.

Spokeswoman Villa Mafalda said the baby was born Tuesday and "both the mother and the baby are in good health."

She refused to give any other information. Kinski, 23, has not publicly identified the father.

Rockefellers consider cities for art

EL PASO — The Rockefeller family is looking for a permanent home for its vast collection of Mexican folk art and five cities in the Southwest are being considered.

Ann Rockefeller Roberts, daughter of the late Vice President Nelson Rockefeller, scheduled a visit to El Paso on Wednesday and Thursday. Roberts, who inherited some 3,000 to 4,000 pieces of Mexican art from her father, said the other cities she is considering are Albuquerque and Santa Fe, N.M., San Antonio, Texas and Los Angeles.

El Paso Museum of Art Director Leonard Sipora said he estimated the value of the collection "in the neighborhood of $1 million to $1.5 million" by placing a nominal value of $50 per item.

Carter among 65 to be honored

MINNEAPOLIS — Former President Jimmy Carter and more than 50 other politicians, entertainers, educators, athletes and government and business leaders are expected for the American Academy of Achievement's 23rd annual Salute to Excellence.

The gathering, scheduled Thursday through Sunday, will bring together 50 new "giants of accomplishment" plus 15 previous honorees in a celebration of achievement in various fields.

Also among those to be honored are heart surgeon Michael E. DeBakey, actors Ed Asner and John Travolta, entertainer Ray Charles, Pittsburgh Steelers football player Franco Harris and four Nobel Prize winners: Glenn Seaborn, Samuel Ting, Sheldon Glashow and Arthur Schlawow.

Weather

Partly cloudy today with a 20 percent chance of morning thunderstorms, high around 90. Light and variable winds. Mostly clear tonight, low 65 to 70. Sunny and warm Friday, high low to mid-90s.

Jackson's Victory tour raises questions of impact on lives

Editor,

I am shaken to the depth of my being that people are not understanding the phenomenon of the Michael Jackson tour. Or is it I who does not understand? After all, in my youth, I thought that many of us were on the verge of a fuller realization into the mystery of all things.

This tour is directly or indirectly affecting all ages and those in all life's stations. Today most of the people I know are devoting all of their extra words to the subject. Just last week a few of us who gather to discuss the bilateral nuclear freeze (which our country's citizens consider intermittently proposing to the Soviet Union) reached a dramatic consensus: we agreed to set aside the few, dangling concerns we still had regarding world peace and continuation of the human species for the more pressing topic of the symbolic "Victory" tour. We delved deep within ourselves, trying to grasp the hidden significance of the obvious mastery of promotion and hyperbole held in store for us if we were only sensitive enough to claim it.

Indeed, before the earth's crust cooled a millennia ago in the 1960s, there came a group from across the water that brought with it a similar, engulfing tidal wave. I recall its significance and I remember them vividly — John, Paul, with George and, oh yes, the unlikely apostle Ringo. They came with empty shouts of "Yeah, yeah, yeah" and matured into the philosophical sensitivity and purity of their white album.

That tidal wave swept across this land that is my land and your land, creating in its wake many oases of philosophical culture. These were nurtured in countless individual mental tidal pools.

For a time, it seemed as if all nature was filling the air with a universal, melodic opus to life, resonating from the strings of sitars and guitars to primitive bamboo flutes.

Therefore, perhaps we should seek a significance in the Michael Jackson "Victory" tour. Will the hype be transformed into something that will linger past the time when the lights are turned off? Is each outstretched, waving hand reaching

Nichols Hall construction on schedule

By KEM ARST

Work on Nichols Hall is on schedule despite last winter's severe weather and the recent heavy rains.

Work began in September of 1983 to rebuild what was once Nichols Gymnasium. The building was gutted by fire Dec. 13, 1968 and, with completion of construction, it will be Nichols Hall — the new home of the computer science and speech departments.

"The construction is coming about on schedule. I talked to the contractor and he is planning to have it legally weather tight within a month. That's windows in, roof on," said Vincent Cool, associate director of University Facilities.

Although last winter's weather was severe, it caused only minor time loss and workers were able to work through most of the winter. The recent rains however, are beginning to cause a problem in the installation of dry-wall materials, Cool said.

"Unforeseen costs have risen (because) we have found quite a bit of damaged stone in the exterior walls," Cool said. "There has been more replacement of damaged stones than we had planned, but aside from this, everything is running very smoothly for the most part."

The original gym — built in 1911 and named after Ernest R. Nichols — was once the home of the K-State basketball and track teams, but the number of fans started outgrowing Nichols in the late 1940s.

Ahearn Field House was built in 1951 and after sports left Nichols, it still remained the home of the campus radio station, KSAC. The music department was also housed in Nichols until the fire, said Jerry Katlin, director of student-alumni programs for the K-State Alumni Association.

The renovated hall will house the computer science and speech departments, library storage and a 350-foot theater, Katlin said.

"The theater will be available for performances from groups such as the K-State Players and various other plays and musicals," he added.

Between 1968 and late 1970s the fate of Nichols was uncertain. In 1979, K-State President Duane Acker made a recommendation to the Kansas Legislature to raze the building. Katlin said the recommendation drew many negative responses from students.

"Students held protest rallies on the steps of Anderson Hall to protest the president's decision. They also lobbied the state Legislature in Topeka to delay the razing of the building, asking them to research alternatives in order to preserve Nichols," he said.

Katlin said that due to student concern and lobbying efforts, a decision was made by the Legislature in 1981 to allocate preliminary planning funds.

In 1983 the Legislature gave $1.5 million to begin the actual construction, with the remainder of funds coming from the 1984 session, Katlin said.

Both Cool and Katlin estimate a completion date of April 1985.

Katlin said that upon completion there will be a dedication of the building and at this dedication, a part of the old Nichols Gym will be given to the new Nichols Hall.

The Class of 1910 dedicated a stone to the original building and the stone became a special identification mark for the building, like a plaque, Katlin said.

"After the fire, the stone was removed and kept by various class officers, but it was eventually misplaced over the years," Katlin said.

At the time the stone was misplaced no one really knew if Nichols would ever be rebuilt, so the location of the stone wasn't thought about too much, but when confirmation of the rebuilding came through, efforts were made to find the stone, Katlin said.

"Several attempts (to find the stone) were made but the stone was not located until last winter. The stone was discovered by Toni Crawford, a University archivist, on the top floor of the library, during a general clean up," Katlin said. "No one knows how it got there, but it will be replaced in (its) original position as part of the dedication."

K-State selects artist to do Nichols mural

By KRISTIE FABER
Collegian Reporter

Eric J. Bransby has been selected — as the job description points out — to "create a work of art to commemorate the students' commitment toward the preservation of Nichols Hall."

In January 1984, the Nichols Hall Art Committee was established. Its purpose was to oversee a seven-state competition of artists to design and construct a painting, fiber art, basrelief sculpture or wall sculpture to be displayed in the Nichols Hall lobby.

On June 13, the committee met and chose Bransby — 67-year-old muralist — to be the artist. He is currently a professor in the Department of Art and Art History at the University of Missouri in Kansas City.

Bransby is an authority on art history and the technique of mural painting. He is also one of the few painters who does fresco — the method used by Michelangelo when he painted the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel. It is a process in which water-colors are applied to wet plaster.

Bransby's murals can be seen at the U.S. Air Force Academy in Colorado Springs; USA Command and General Staff College at Fort Leavenworth; Brigham Young University, Utah; the University of Illinois at Urbana; Rockhurst College in Kansas City; the University of Missouri-Kansas City; and the Sedalia (Mo.) Municipal Building.

In April 1985, K-State will be added to the above locations for Bransby murals. Nichols Hall's expected completion date is set for April 1985 when dedication ceremonies and the official opening will take place.

Bransby likes to work with the architecture of a building when doing a mural. He said that he believes the purpose of a mural is to enhance its surroundings.

"I cannot design without some real feeling for the architecture," Bransby said in a letter to Jerry Katlin, chairman of the Nichols Hall Art Committee.

"I find the Nichols lobby to be a very exciting space to design for," he wrote.

Bransby will be trying to capture the past and the present in his mural for the lobby. In his sketch, Bransby has emphasized sports in memory of the building's previous function as a gymnasium.

"The committee as a whole enjoyed the freer style of your (Bransby's) current work and feel that it will compliment the entire architectural designs of the lobby," Katlin replied in a letter to Bransby.

Bransby has been commissioned for $8,000 to complete the mural which will be displayed on a wall outside of the performance lab theater.

most vital industry," said DeVon Woodland, president of the National Farmers Organization.

"It is not a farm crisis, it is a community crisis. The agriculture economy is not recovering," Woodland said. "There appears to be an undeclared war on the family farm."

"While writing the 1985 farm bill Congress will be influenced by public awareness, so it is important for agricultural journalists to communicate the need for a long-range farm program," he said.

Woodland said a long-term program should include limiting the dumping of agricultural products on the market place at inappropriate times and encouraging greater conservation practices.

John Datt of the American Farm Bureau Federation favors a smaller role for the government in the 1985 farm bill.

"Farmers must learn to make a living in the market place. The role of government should be limited," Datt said. "The new bill must be oriented to the market. The federation believes this is the best direction to go in the long run."

"The current farm bill is a complete agricultural policy failure, for 1985 we must back up and take a realistic look at what is happening. We must not be idealistic, we must be realistic. We must keep the family farm system, because they have served the country so well," Datt said.

Unless the 1985 bill gets profit back on the farm we will see the end of the family farm and a complete domination of agriculture by corporations, he said.

"The best thing Congress could do is allow for a restructuring of the farm debt. A change needs to be made in the repayment tract so that the farmers can repay their debt someday," Datt said.

from anti-guerrilla warfare. Aided by $2.4 million in federal funds, states are sending police into the air to carry out search-and-destroy missions against marijuana farms.

But, the report said, this has resulted in little "overall progress in reducing marijuana cultivation. The effect of law enforcement efforts has been primarily to cause growers to shift their operations indoors."

"Using greenhouses or buildings to cultivate marijuana indoors is becoming increasingly popular," the GAO said.

Illustrating the trend was a three-floor laboratory raided by police in Cleveland. It had $50,000 worth of hydroponic equipment, 400 marijuana plants, 50 high-intensity lights and nutrients being constantly piped into a 600-gallon growing tank.

One of the reasons for domestic marijuana's popularity is its strength, the study said. While Colombian, Mexican and Jamaican brands have a 2 percent to 4 percent content of THC — the mind-altering ingredient in pot — most domestic marijuana is made with the "sinsemilla" technique that creates potent plants with up to 11 percent THC, the study said.

"The amount of money that can be made from marijuana cultivation attracts different types of people to this illegal business," the report said. "Backgrounds of cultivators include moonshiners, farmers, housewives, artists, carpenters, mechanics and professionals."

To combat domestic pot producers, police have borrowed tactics

Family tradition ends

Albert and Lydia Ediger stand on the land near Buhler that they have been farming for 45 years. This year marks the last harvest for the Edigers and their family.

Lydia holds a pan of apricot platz for the family to cut into — except Albert who has to get the wheat to the elevator.

ABOVE: The combine empties its load into a pick-up truck until the big truck returns. RIGHT: Other members of the family help Albert determine what is causing a peculiar noise on the combine.

Harvest stories are a family tradition for some, but for Albert and Lydia Ediger, of Buhler, and their family this harvest story has taken 45 years to be written.

June 28 marked the end of 45 years of farming, and the last harvest for the family.

Since the Ediger land and crops are family-owned by Albert and Lydia, both 68 years old, and their sons LaVon, Byron and Glen, the crops are also family-harvested.

Albert, his youngest son Glen, and two grandsons Alan and Ron, (LaVon's sons), took turns riding the combine.

"You never let that combine stop," Albert said. "You always keep it going. When Lydia brings out the food this evening, we'll just take turns at eating, and keep that combine going."

"Harvest is the highlight of the year, you know," Lydia said. "But I said it's hard work and I'm always glad it's not every day of the year."

"It's kind of fun, you get tired, you get hot, especially if you have troubles and you have to work with that combine," Albert said. "I guess it's over 100 degrees around there. We've been used to it. I think these last four years have been good years for the three sons of ours, for their families to come out here."

Albert said his three sons have been farming the land for the last four years and he just comes along for the exercise. His sons, he said, get two-thirds of the crop, while he and Lydia as landlords, receive one-third.

While taking their turns off of the combine, the Edigers explained the technicalities of harvest.

"This is what you call a quarter section; it is 160 acres," Albert said. "And the wheat, I don't know, part of this will make quite a bit more than 40 bushels, the other will make under 40. We hope for 40 bushels per acre. If we have good cutting, we cut about 40 acres a day. How much we have left, I don't know."

Their son Ron explained further.

"The combine has to fill up about four times to fill the truck," Ron said. "After the truck is full, we drive it into Buhler where the co-op is, or we take it to Moundridge."

"We usually have to wait in line to unload, since everyone is harvesting about now. We try to get back here as soon as possible to avoid any 'down time.' If we don't get back to the field before the combine is ready to unload, then it has to wait for us before it can cut anymore, and that is 'down time,'" he said.

After the wheat is stored at the co-op elevator, it is decision time.

"We take it into the co-op elevator," Albert said. "It's about 11 miles from here. We take it in and there they store it and we can do whatever we want with it. We can sell it or whatever the boys want to do."

With the temperature in the mid-90s and a whisper of a breeze, Albert said he couldn't have asked for better weather for his last harvest.

"The wheat is standing pretty nice," Albert said. "The battles we've had with the rain sometimes, and the mud, getting stuck, well, this is just good cutting."

Ron agreed, adding that good weather makes for more cutting hours.

"With the weather as good as it is, we can cut till midnight, if it stays dry," Ron said. "We cut till 11:30 last night."

On one of his breaks from riding the combine, Albert commented on the effect that the government has had on farming.

"I think somehow, we should get the price up," he said, saying that the government Payment-In-Kind program "helps the big boys. I don't think it helps an average farmer."

"There are so many strings attached, so much red tape, I'm not too fond of it. But we have to get the price of wheat up. The middle man some place gets the money. I don't want to be complaining, but it's PIK set up for the bigger boys," Albert said.

The elder Edigers' decision to retire from farming was influenced by the fact that their sons are well into their own careers, and their grandsons are not interested in farming as a career.

"I farm maybe three days out of the whole year, just during harvest," Ron said. "I don't think I'd like to be a farmer. You're either working 16 hours a day in the summer or fiddling around in the shop in the winter."

Alan, the other grandson, doesn't show interest in farming either.

"I don't want to be a farmer," Alan said. "For one thing, you don't make much money in farming. Also, my interests lie elsewhere."

Even with differing opinions and careers, the Edigers are a close-knit family. Late in the afternoon, Lydia and her daughters-in-law, Janet, Byron's wife, and Linda, LaVon's wife, and their children, came to the field with a picnic dinner.

"Hey, here comes dinner," Albert said. "You know, this is the best part."

In a matter of minutes, the Edigers moved the wheat truck and the other vehicles into an L shape to "make ourselves some shade." Blankets were spread on the ground, food was set on the truck bed and Edigers were lining up to eat.

"Shall we sing the grace?" Lydia asked.

And there, in the stubble of wheat, in the heat and the dust, among family and friends, the Edigers sang grace and everything seemed to stand still. The only other audible sound was that of the combine, still moving, still working.

The food which Lydia had prepared was not simply a picnic. It was a feast — enough to feed an army of Edigers. Ham sandwiches, an assortment of chips, cucumber slices and two large coolers of iced tea and lemonade. For dessert, there were New Year's "cookies" — oval shaped, deep-fat-fried, pastries with raisins, rolled in sugar. There was also apricot platz, a pizza-shaped pastry topped with an apricot filling and a sweet, white frosting.

More members of the Ediger family appeared during the meal. By the end of the day there were 16 Edigers in all.

Many of the family members captured the last harvest on film, including videotape.

Albert and Lydia said they started farming after they bought their home and land after they were married 45 years ago.

"It's been such a variety," Lydia said. "Through the years we've had livestock — sheep, hogs and cattle — but that just kind of tapered off. We've done mostly wheat farming."

"During those years farming paid off much better than it does now. The equipment wasn't that large and you didn't have the investments that you have to have now," she said.

Lydia said they sold the farm about two years ago and moved in town. The people they sold the farm too, she said, are young and she guessed the land will still be used for wheat farming.

"I don't think living in town is that different," Lydia said. "We have quite a bit of activity in church; that's part of our social life," Lydia said.

"There's much to be thankful for," Albert said. "This area was all originally settled by Mennonites. It was the Mennonites that brought over some of this turkey wheat, the original wheat grown here. We were all raised as Mennonites. I guess it doesn't matter which church (one belongs to). After all, what you believe in, the life you live and what your goal is in life (that are important)."

Albert speaks about life thoughtfully — perhaps because he was given a "second chance" with his own life.

"It was in 1970, before harvest," Lydia said. "This sand truck hit him (when he was driving a pickup, it totaled the pickup. He was taken to the hospital then, and they notified us. He had multiple head injuries. He was unconscious for a while. Internally, there was no injury," Lydia said.

"Usually when you think of an accident, you think, 'oh my God, I'm going to get hit,'" Albert said. "But in this, I didn't know what happened. I (spent time) in two different hospitals in intensive care. The family was called in; they didn't know if... well, they never knew. But like somebody said, I guess my time wasn't up and I was spared, I have no bad effects, except that I cannot smell. I have no complaints."

"It changed my life. After the accident I wanted to be around the family more; it gave me a new outlook on life. But I'm thankful. I could have had internal injuries and I did not. Like one preacher once mentioned, 'everytime you pass a car, you pass within 10 or so feet of life or death.'"

In retrospect, thinking about this harvest, Albert removed his co-op hat and looked across the field and said: "I'm not old, I just look old. But when you get to a certain point, you throw in the hat. I'll miss it, sure. It's been good. Farming has been good. We've had good times and good crops. Yes, I must say we've been blessed."

Albert teaches third-generation Edigers to properly maneuver the combine.

Alan Ediger, senior in interior architecture and Albert's grandson, looks up to check the weather while the family has dinner in the field.

After a long day of harvest Albert and his son, Glen, climb down from the combine.

Study refutes pill, breast cancer link

By The Associated Press

ATLANTA — Scientists at the federal Centers for Disease Control said that contrary to two other studies, their research still shows no link between oral contraceptives and breast cancer.

The CDC, in response to two other studies, did more analysis of the numbers in its survey of the pill and breast cancer, first reported in March 1983.

The new research confirms the previous findings that "women who took the pill are not any more likely to develop breast cancer than women who did not," said CDC researcher Linda Webster.

Following the original CDC study last year, the British medical publication Lancet reported two studies on the pill and cancer. The first, conducted by researchers from the University of Southern California, said women who take "high-progestogen" combination-type oral contraceptives before age 25 have an increased risk of breast cancer before age 37.

The second, from researchers at Oxford, said women who take the pill before they give birth to their first child have an increased risk of breast cancer before age 45.

The CDC, in both cases, found "no significant association" between the pill and any increased risk of breast cancer.

In each case, the Atlanta-based federal health agency looked at its figures on women who met the criteria of the Lancet studies. The rates of breast cancer were not statistically different for women who did meet the pill-taking criteria and women who did not.

"Different studies have reported conflicting results concerning the risk of breast cancer for young women using oral contraceptives," the CDC noted in its Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Report. "It is possible that methodologic differences between the studies account for the differences."

Webster said the CDC study was based on a survey of more women, 4,700 cancer patients, than either of the Lancet-published studies. But that in itself doesn't necessarily mean one is more accurate than the other, she said.

Clearing house unites volunteers with needy

By KRISTIE CRABTREE
Collegian Reporter

Residents of Riley County needing help for any reason or wanting to volunteer their services can do it by merely calling the Volunteer Clearing House. Its purpose is to place volunteers who want to help others, with people who need the help, said Karen Hooker, program administrator.

In 1980, K-State conducted a needs survey of more than 100 human service providers to determine their need and use of volunteers in the Manhattan area, Hooker said. The results indicated that more than 66 groups and agencies were using volunteers and 21 more were interested in placing volunteers.

Fifty-four of the agencies reported that they would be interested in a centralized clearing house to help them in their volunteer recruitment.

From 1981 to 1984 the Volunteer Clearing House operated from K-State through the Family Center, which is located in the College of Home Economics, Hooker said.

In 1983, representatives of the Riley County Council of Social Agencies and the Family Center suggested that the United Way assume the responsibility for the clearing house. The program at K-State was low on funds and with students changing every semester, there was a lack of continuity, Hooker said.

In January 1984, United Way took over the agency.

Hooker said the Volunteer Clearing House recontacted volunteers from K-State, informing them of the changes that had occurred. The clearing house placed Introduction to Social Work students in volunteer situations. The students are required to serve 16 hours per semester working for the clearing house. The clearing house also publishes a volunteer bulletin in the Manhattan Mercury twice a month.

The Volunteer Clearing House office accepts applications from interested persons. Once the application is completed, an interview is conducted to determine the applicant's interests, skills and available times, Hooker said.

Hooker said that about one-fourth of their volunteers are K-State students.

"A lot of them can't find jobs and they want to do something to help. It also looks good on resumes. We try to find them something that matches their majors," Hooker said.

Hooker said that during the winter months they had calls from the elderly for help with transportation. They also get calls from wheelchair victims who need help getting around town. Sometimes, Hooker said, they get calls from people who want someone to come sit and talk with them for awhile.

Other volunteer opportunities exist with Access Center for the Elderly, Displaced Homemakers, Fellowship Meals and many others. More than 55 agencies are registered with the Volunteer Clearing House, Hooker said.

KPL expects lower increase on utilities

By KATHIE CORMACI
Collegian Reporter

Utility bill increases will be lower than anticipated by Kansas Power and Light (KPL) officials for approximately 131,000 KPL customers. The cut is effective toward bills mailed on or after July 1, said Hal Hudson, KPL public affairs director.

"This lowering of the purchased gas adjustment will affect customers being serviced by two of the three main gas lines in the state," Hudson said. "(Approximately) 107,000 customers, including residents of Manhattan, are serviced by KPL's main transmission system."

There are two factors that affect KPL's charge to customers. The first is the cost of the gas itself and the other is the cost of delivering that gas to various systems.

"Last December we filed a request with the Kansas Corporation Commission to raise the cost of our delivery system," Hudson said. "We requested a total $13.8 million increase (for delivery cost), but a $4.9 million cost (for delivery) had been in effect from the interim since December of 1982."

"So, we requested to leave the $4.9 million cost as permanent and add another $8.9 million to recover our cost of delivery system," he said. "If the commission does what we ask, we will collect $1.2 million less than we would be collecting if it was a complete $13.8 million increase."

If the commission allows both requests to pass, customers will end up paying more than they are paying now, but less than KPL officials had anticipated.

Customers from Emporia, Lansing, Leavenworth and Atchinson are served by the Northwest Central Pipeline. The Northern Natural Gas Pipeline serves approximately 2,000 customers. However, they will see an increase on their bills, Hudson said.

The cost of gas to the customer depends on how much it costs KPL to purchase the gas, Hudson said.

"KPL can purchase gas for the main system and the Northern Line cheaper than they can for the Northwest Line, and that is why there is a difference in cost to the customers in those areas," Hudson said.

A $10 million annual reduction means an average monthly decrease of $1.48 for customers on the main system, Hudson said.

For customers on the Northwestern Line the decrease in cost will be $2.79 on their monthly utility bill.

There is an increase of 43 cents for customers on the Northern Line, Hudson said.

"For example, on the main system, the cost is 14.8 cents per 1,000 cubic foot. On the average, customers use 10,000 cubic feet of gas per month. So, that is how we determine the $1.48 monthly reduction."

tion," Hudson said.

KPL has also made efforts towards improving efficiency of gas distribution and transmission systems.

"We are using cathodic protection. It's a process where we install cathodes near pipelines which stop rust corrosion and leaks. It's a preventative maintenance program," Hudson said.

"We would rather pay for gas that gets to the customers than pay for gas that escapes. We have made some spot market purchases and KCC has allowed us to buy gas from the Hugoton Field, which is cheaper. We buy gas from 200 companies and Hugoton is cheaper than them. When we get more gas from Hugoton we can charge a lower price to the customer," Hudson said.

Planning may lower deaths in third world countries

By The Associated Press

BALTIMORE — The number of infant and maternal deaths in developing countries could be cut in half if women have no more than four children and keep siblings at least two years apart, according to a study released Thursday.

In addition, women should bear their children between age 18 and 35, recommends the study by the Johns Hopkins School of Public Health.

UNICEF has predicted that 9.8 million infants will die this year in developing countries, excluding China.

Age, the number of births and birth spacing affect the mother's ability to carry a child to term and to provide the best biological conditions for a developing fetus, the report said. The same factors affect the family's ability to feed and care for the new child and older children.

Brett, Jackson, Carew head AL All-Star roster

By The Associated Press
NEW YORK — Perennial all-stars Rod Carew, Reggie Jackson and George Brett, along with three members of the high-flying Detroit Tigers, have been elected as American League starters for the 55th All-Star Game, the commissioner's office announced Wednesday.

Carew, California's first baseman, has been elected to a starting spot every year since fan voting resumed in 1970. This marks the 18th straight year he has been selected to start the All-Star game.

The three Tigers, catcher Lance Parrish, second baseman Lou Whitaker and outfielder Chet Lemon, will be making their first All-Star starts, as will Baltimore shortstop Cal Ripken, at the game next Tuesday in San Francisco's Candlestick Park.

New York outfielder Dave Winfield, leading the majors with a .374 batting average through Tuesday, completes the AL's starting team. The pitchers and remaining members of the 28-man squad will be selected later this week by the AL office in consultation with All-Star Manager Joe Altobelli of Baltimore.

The National League's starting lineup will be announced Thursday.

Carew received 1,219,420 votes to edge out Baltimore's Eddie Murray, who got 1,128,745, in the closest race for a starting position. Carew is batting .289 while Murray is batting .309 with 15 home runs and a major league-leading 66 runs batted in.

Brett's 1,594,542 votes was tops in the AL. The Kansas City third baseman, injured for the first month of the season and now hitting .280, was elected to start for the ninth consecutive year. California's Doug DeCinces was second at third base with 880,441.

Jackson, California's designated hitter, finished third in voting for outfield spots. His election, with 1,012,397 votes, marks the 11th time he has been picked as a starter. Jackson is hitting .244 with 12 homers and 39 RBIs.

Winfield got 1,252,242 votes and Lemon, batting .306, received 1,106,485. This is the fourth time Winfield has been chosen to start.

Jim Rice of Boston finished fourth in outfield voting with 879,099, followed by Chicago's Ron Kittle with 871,494.

Both Parrish, with a .273 average, 15 home runs and 46 RBIs, and Whitaker were picked by wide margins to represent the Tigers, who led the majors with 55-24 record through Tuesday. Parrish got the second-highest vote total in the AL with 1,524,616 to finish ahead of Chicago's Carlton Fisk, who got 831,386.

Whitaker, batting .302, got 1,341,177 votes, more than doubling the total of California's Bobby Grich, with 588,897.

Ripken became the eighth different shortstop named to start for the AL in the past 10 years. Ripken, with a .297 average, 13 home runs and 41 RBIs, got 1,442,082 votes to finish in front of Detroit's Alan Trammell, who got 1,154,353. Trammell has a .307 average, eight home runs and 41 RBIs.

Milwaukee's Robin Yount, voted to start the last two All-Star Games at shortstop, was third with 712,157.

Seattle rookie outfielder Alvin Davis, with 18 home runs and 61 runs batted in, led AL players in write-in votes with 118,872.

Saberhagen leads Royals to 4-0 win over Indians

By The Associated Press
CLEVELAND — Twenty-year-old rookie Bret Saberhagen thinks a pitcher's most important job is to throw strikes.

"If you can throw the ball where you want to you'll stay away from walks, and I think 35 to 40 percent of runs come from a walk," Saberhagen said after allowing no walks and only five hits over the first seven innings of the Kansas City Royals' 4-0 victory over the Cleveland Indians Wednesday.

"Today I was throwing the ball on the corners and getting the calls I wanted to get. Not all umpires give you the corners," said the right-hander, now 3-7, but with a fine 3.04 ERA.

Saberhagen had walked only 19 batters in 88 1/3 innings, and Manager Dick Howser, said, "A lot of those came when he was pitching around a hitter. I don't think I've seen many young guys with as much control as he has."

Relief ace Dan Quisenberry pitched the final two innings, giving up one hit, as the Royals won for the sixth time in their last seven games, and Willie Wilson sparked the offense with three hits, including a two-run triple.

The victory was Saberhagen's first since May 25. He allowed five hits, struck out three and did not walk a batter before Quisenberry came on to retire Cleveland's last six batters.

Neither Kansas City pitcher walked a batter; nor did any of the five Cleveland hurlers, who gave up 10 hits.

Steve Comer, 1-4, yielded four runs — two each in the first and second innings — to take the loss. Jamie Eassey then came in and threw 4 1/2 of hitless ball in relief before Mike Jeffcoat and Tom Waddell took over.

Wilson led off the game with a single and scored on Pat Sheridan's double to center. Sheridan went to third on an infield out, and scored on Dane Iorg's groundout. Bud Biancalana singled with two outs in the Royals second and U.L. Washington dropped a bunt single. Wilson drove in both with a triple into the right-field corner to close the scoring.

The Indians' best scoring opportunity came in the fifth. Mel Hall led off with a double, went to third on a ground out by Jerry Willard, but Saberhagen struck out George Vukovich and induced Brook Jacoby to fly out.

The Royals, with the victory, claimed their sixth win in the last seven games. The Royals won 3 of 4 games against the Indians on the road and also swept a three-game series from the New York Yankees last weekend in Kansas City.

Petty claims Firecracker win

By The Associated Press
DAYTONA BEACH, Fla. — Richard Petty outdueled Cale Yarborough coming out of the fourth turn as the leaders came up on a yellow caution flag with two laps to go and coasted to his 200th career Grand National victory, winning the Firecracker 400 Wednesday before a throng of 80,000 and President Reagan.

Petty, who celebrated his 47th birthday Monday, took the checkered flag under the third caution period of the race and completed 400-mile event in 2 hours, 19 minutes and 59 seconds at an average speed of 171.204 miles per hour.

Harry Gant swept into second as Yarborough — apparently believing the race was over — headed into the pit area with one lap to go in the 160-lap race. The four-time Firecracker winner returned to the track without stopping, but wound up finishing third.

Petty took over the lead from Gant with 33 laps to go as the leader at that point made his final pit stop. He built a healthy lead over Yarborough, who had pitted and relinquished first four laps earlier, but gradually saw his advantage dissipate.

The yellow flag went up in the 158th lap when Doug Heveron lost control on his car heading into the first turn of the 2.5-mile, high-banked track at Daytona International Speedway. The leaders were already into the lap, though, and didn't take the caution until the next lap.

Yarborough, starting on the pole for the fifth time in seven years, managed to move past Petty as the leaders charged into the fourth turn, but Petty regained the lead with an inside move and was the leader as he and Yarborough took the yellow flag.

The victory was the second this season for Petty, who held the lead five times for a total of 52 laps in his Pontiac Grand Prix.

Yarborough, meanwhile, held nine leads for 79 laps in the Chevrolet Monte Carlo SS he drove to victory in the Daytona 500 in February.

Petty, the only man who has started the annual Fourth of July race all 26 years since it began in 1959, won $43,255 for his third Firecracker victory. He also won in 1975 and 1977.

Connors, McEnroe, Lendl win; semis next at Wimbledon tourney

By The Associated Press
WIMBLEDON, England — Displaying nearly flawless tennis, top-seeded John McEnroe moved easily into the men's semifinals Wednesday and two steps away from his second consecutive Wimbledon tennis title.

The New York southpaw completely devastated fellow American John Sadri 6-3, 6-3, 6-1 to advance to a semifinal battle against unseeded Pat Cash of Australia. Cash outlasted Andres Gomez of Ecuador 6-4, 6-4, 6-7, 7-6, eliminating the tournament's No. 6 seed.

Friday's other semifinal on the grass courts of the All-England Lawn Tennis and Croquet Club will pit No. 2 Ivan Lendl against No. 3 Jimmy Connors — a rematch of the last two U.S. Open finals, where Connors has prevailed both times.

On Wednesday, Lendl crushed his Czechoslovakian Davis Cup teammate, Tomas Smid, the No. 13 seed, 6-1, 7-6, 6-3, while Connors breezed by qualifier Paul Annacone 6-2, 6-4, 6-2 in an all-American battle on center court.

In the only women's match played Wednesday, second-seeded Chris Evert Lloyd moved into the semifinals with a 6-2, 6-2 victory over Carina Karlsson of Sweden, the first qualifier in Wimbledon history to reach the women's quarterfinals.

Lloyd, a three-time Wimbledon champion, will face No. 3 Hana Mandlikova of Czechoslovakia in a semifinal match Thursday. The other women's semifinal will send top-seeded Martina Navratilova, who is seeking her third consecutive title here, against No. 6 Kathy Jordan in a rematch of the Eastbourne final almost two weeks ago. Navratilova was an easy 6-4, 6-1 winner in that encounter, running her career record over her fellow American to 11-0.

The women's final is scheduled to be played Saturday, with the men squaring off for their first-place battle Sunday.

Sadri, who first met McEnroe in the 1978 NCAA championships, reached break point against McEnroe's serve only twice — and both times came away empty-handed. The second time was in the final game of the match, but McEnroe just reached into his bag of shots and pulled out a service winner and two perfectly placed volleys.

Players set for Open start

By The Associated Press
The Western Open Golf Tournament opens today at Oak Bridge, Ill., boasting a star-studded field of participants. Offering $400,000 in prize money, the Professional Golf Association tournament is to be contested on the difficult Butler National Golf Club course.

The 156-player Western Open field includes Tom Watson and Australian Greg Norman, each the winner of two Tour titles already this season.

Norman, winner of two

Australian tournaments early in the season, is on a streak that includes victories in the Kemper and Canadian Opens, a playoff loss in the U.S. Open and a 10th place finish in Atlanta in his last four starts.

Other leading contenders for the $72,000 first prize include defending title-holder Mark McCumber, Masters champion Ben Crenshaw, PGA champ Hal Sutton, Ray Floyd, Cal Peete, Andy Bean, Fred Couples, Bruce Lelzke and Scott Simpson.

Toxic shock cases decline as scientists search for vaccine

By The Associated Press

ATLANTA — It has been four years since the national Centers for Disease Control warned of toxic shock syndrome, a rare disease that was killing women who used tampons.

Today, more than 2,500 reported cases and 110 deaths later, the number of cases is falling and research is progressing toward a vaccine. But researchers say the disease is occurring in people other than tampon-using women, and it "has not gone away."

The latest available figures from investigators at the CDC, the government's Atlanta-based health agency, show only 29 confirmed cases of TSS in the first 16 weeks of this year. In all of 1983, 306 cases were reported.

Those 306 cases represented a continuing drop from 400 in 1982, 583 in 1981 and 886 in 1980.

Although only nine deaths were reported between Jan. 1, 1983 and April 16, 1984, researchers at the CDC cautioned that the reporting of deaths lags behind the reporting of cases — in some cases, "years slower" — and that the disease is still killing victims.

"But it's difficult to know whether much of the reporting itself has fallen off, now that it's no longer a 'newsworthy' topic," said Dr. Art Reingold, a researcher with the CDC's special pathogens division.

According to Dr. Laura Markowitz, another CDC toxic shock researcher, the low case total so far this year could be deceiving — "a delay in reporting" as state health departments take their time in sending case reports to Atlanta.

Reingold said toxic shock is not occurring at the rate it was in 1980, before public awareness of the disease peaked and Procter & Gamble voluntarily stopped selling its super-absorbent Rely tampons, which were specifically linked with higher rates of the disease.

The publicity over Rely and TSS led to a barrage of lawsuits against Procter & Gamble.

Patrick Hayes, a spokesman for the Cincinnati-based company, said Tuesday he had no idea how many suits were filed or are pending. However, the Journal of the American Medical Association reported last December that P&G had faced or is facing about 200 lawsuits stemming from the disease.

The company has lost one case in court and has settled at least one other out of court.

Procter & Gamble maintains that no direct link has been found between the occurrence of toxic shock syndrome and tampon use. The company has spent at least $3 million to fund TSS research, according to Hayes.

"We think we have good data that the decrease from '80 to '81 was real," Reingold said. "Women changed their tampon using habits, as well as other factors."

"What's happened since 1981 is difficult to comment on."

"There might really be fewer cases — you can't tell," said Dr. Richard Hopkins, an epidemiologist with the Colorado Department of Health. "It's very hard to tell that from national figures."

Colorado no longer maintains active surveillance of TSS cases, but when the state did, "our cases were pretty steady" after the 1980-1981 decline, Hopkins said.

TSS, first identified by researchers in 1978, is characterized by high fever, nausea and a rapid drop in blood pressure.

"It's still a very serious disease that can be potentially fatal," Reingold said. "It still occurs."

Although initial publicity about TSS almost exclusively concerned cases in menstruating women, they are only about 70 percent of the cases reported in 1983 and 1984, Reingold said.

"It occurs in men, it occurs in women who use tampons, and it occurs in many other people with other types of infections," he said.

"It has not gone away. People need to be aware of that."

Research on TSS is concentrating on how the disease occurs and what can be done to prevent it. It has been known for some time that TSS is associated with a common bacteria called Staphylococcus aureus.

Last fall, a gene for that toxin was isolated, and further study is continuing in that direction, said Barry Kreiswirth of the Public Health Research Institute in New York.

Scientists there are trying to understand exactly how the gene is put together, or, as Kreiswirth put it, "the gene's alphabet."

Development of a vaccine for TSS — using the toxin to induce protection against it — is still "a little down the road," he said, noting that many animal studies of such a vaccine would be needed.

Divorce figures reveal 7-year-marriage 'itch'

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — There really may be a "seven-year itch" among married Americans.

The typical marriage that ended in divorce in the United States lasted seven years between the wedding and the final divorce decree, government statistics show.

But divorce figures collected from 31 states in 1981 — the most recent detailed statistics available — disclosed it took up to 80 percent longer for couples to part in some states than others. Thus, the folk belief that marriages are most likely to hit the rocks after seven years is not applicable everywhere.

Divorces generally came sooner in the West and later in the East, a pattern that sociologists have long noted but cannot easily explain.

In seven Eastern states sampled in the study, divorces came after an average of 8.3 years of marriage. The average duration of marriage before divorce was 6.8 years in the nine Southern states checked, 6.5 in eight North Central states and 5.5 years in seven Western states.

The national seven-year median was a slight increase from 1980, when divorces were occurring after 6.8 years. The median had been 6.7 years a decade earlier. Median means that half of all marriages ending in divorce had lasted longer than that period and half less.

The figures compiled by the National Center for Health Statistics, an arm of the Department of Health and Human Services, found that residents of Massachusetts spent the most time together before parting. The median duration of marriages ended in that state was 9.2 years.

But in Wyoming, divorces came after only five years of marriage.

Bryant Robey, editor of American Demographics magazine, suggested the age structure of state populations may have a major effect on length of time marriages last before divorces.

James A. Weed, a former Census Bureau population specialist now at the health statistics center, agreed that age plays a major role, although he said other factors are also important.

Marriages formed at older ages are more stable than those of younger people, Robey pointed out. And the states where couples stay together longer are those with populations that include more older people, such as Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York and Pennsylvania.

On the other hand, states with generally younger populations, such as Wyoming and Utah, find marriages ending more quickly.

The correlation between median age and duration of marriages before divorce isn't perfect. Weed noted that because marriage and divorce laws vary from state to state, that can account for some of the differences.

For example, in Wyoming a couple can seek a divorce after only 90 days of residence, and there is no waiting period between interlocutory, or provisional, and final decree. In Massachusetts they must be residents for a year, and six months must pass between interlocutory and final decree.

Beirut airport opens, protesters block roads

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Beirut's airport opened Monday for the first time in five months, but protesting families of civil war hostages blocked access roads to the airport and the crossings between the capital's Moslem and Christian sectors.

However, a committee representing the families of kidnap victims announced Monday night it was calling off the road-blocking and sit-ins to give the new national coalition government a chance to take a final decision on the hostages in the next Cabinet session Wednesday.

The committee said future steps by relatives of the hostages would be "peaceful and comprehensive" until the release of all prisoners held by the various militia bands whose fighting tore Lebanon apart in the past decade.

The committee's announcement came only hours after a delegation representing the relatives of hostages met with President Amin Gemayel at the presidential palace in suburban Baabda.

Abdul Amir Najdeh, a member of the delegation, quoted Gemayel as saying that "some of the hostages were killed immediately after being kidnapped, and others were either liquidated later or are still alive."

Shortly after the announcement, Lebanese army bulldozers started removing earth mounds and barricades of junk from roads to reopen them to traffic by Tuesday morning, state and privately owned radio stations said.

Four days of protests by the hostage families stalled the six-day-old plan to reunite Beirut, stabilize the cease-fire and introduce reforms aimed at power-sharing between Christian and Moslems to end a nine-year civil war.

The protesters — most of them women with pictures of missing persons pinned to their clothes — are demanding the release of people taken captive by various militias during the civil war.

The closure of the mid-city crossings, the barricading of major roads and a strike enforced in mostly Moslem west Beirut to support the demonstrators crippled the city's businesses.

Armed men, believed to be militiamen, ordered shopkeepers to lower their shutters and turned school buses away from local schools. Only pharmacies, restaurants and bakeries were allowed to stay open.

By mid-morning the streets were deserted except for dozens of demonstrators on the airport highway, and on the west Beirut end of the Galerie Semaan, Tayyouneh, museum and port crossing points between the capital's two sectors.

The Lebanese army, which assumed control of Beirut last week under a Syrian-backed security plan to end the rule of warring militias, made no move against the demonstrators. Some armed militiamen were seen helping the demonstrators.

The first plane landed at Beirut airport at 5:30 a.m. — an empty Boeing 707 belonging to Middle East Airlines, Lebanon's national carrier.

The plane was followed by a stream of Middle East Airlines flights from Cairo and Larnaca, Cyprus. The first loaded plane landed shortly after midday from Jidda, Saudi Arabia, but its 102 passengers were prevented by the demonstrators from leaving the airport.

The airport was closed Feb. 6 during fighting in which Moslem and Druse militiamen drove the army out of west Beirut and the southern suburbs.

Carlin backs Mondale as presidential hopeful on Democratic ticket

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Gov. John Carlin Monday declared his support for Walter Mondale for the Democratic presidential nomination.

With the party's national convention opening in San Francisco next Monday, Carlin said it is "time for unity."

The governor, who is chairman of Kansas' 44-member delegation to the national convention, announced after talking by telephone to the former vice president that he would vote for Mondale on the first ballot when the Democrats pick their presidential nominee July 18.

He said while Mondale was his original choice for the Democratic nomination, the Minnesotan has earned it and will be the party's strongest candidate because of the way he was tested in the primary selection process.

Carlin's decision to support Mondale gave the former vice president 26 votes in Kansas' delegation to 17 for Hart, with one still uncommitted. The lone holdout, state Rep. Norman Justice of Kansas City, Kan., could not be reached Monday to determine if he's still undecided. He had said he was leaning toward the Rev. Jesse Jackson.

Carlin announced he was abandoning his neutral position and supporting Mondale in a one-page statement issued through his press office.

In an Associated Press interview after the announcement, he said he had decided long ago to endorse whomever emerged as the likely winner of the nomination, and it was only a matter of deciding the best time to announce his commitment.

Receiving a 20-minute telephone call from Mondale Monday accelerated his announcement, but he had planned all along to wait no longer than Friday to reveal he would vote for Mondale, the governor said.

Carlin declared last August he was backing Ohio Sen. John Glenn for the Democratic nomination, but switched to an uncommitted position when Glenn fell out of the race in March.

Carlin had said he planned to go to San Francisco not pledged to vote for any of the three remaining contenders for the Democratic nomination — Mondale, Jackson and Colorado Sen. Gary Hart.

However, he had said in recent weeks it appeared Mondale had the nomination sewed up and he felt Hart should be Mondale's vice presidential running mate because that would be the party's strongest ticket against President Reagan.

"Mr. Mondale earned it," Carlin said in the interview. "He fought back in the primary process. A lot of frontrunners never came back like he did. Once they tailed off, they never came back. I think that's a credit to him."

"Mondale is a stronger candidate because he was tested. He knows the electorate better now."

Asked if he made his declaration ahead of the convention to get back in the good graces of the Mondale campaign organization after supporting Glenn, the governor replied, "No. If that had been my purpose, it would have been done 30 days ago."

"I respect Mr. Mondale and he respects me, and I don't think it makes any difference to him. I think it was the best way to keep Kansas united for him."

Explaining why he decided Monday to reveal his support of Mondale, Carlin said:

"I was ready to tell him (Mondale) when he called. His call just speeded it up a little. What's been going through my mind is unity and doing whatever is best."

"I feel unity is very important for the Kansas delegation. I truly want that delegation to work in harmony in San Francisco."

"I felt this was the time. I did not want to wait and get on the plane Sunday (to San Francisco) without having made a declaration."

"If he hadn't called, Friday would have been the absolute latest I'd have waited to say anything."

The governor said he was pleased Mondale spent so much time on the telephone with him. He said the former vice president talked primarily about agriculture, which

KCC reviews Wolf Creek plant safety

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Kansas Corporation Commission was asked Monday to determine a standard for deciding when utility customers must start to pay for the $2.9 billion Wolf Creek nuclear power plant.

The issue before the regulatory agency is when the plant is ready for commercial operation — the point at which its utility owners can begin to charge customers higher rates to recover costs of building the project.

During a more than five-hour hearing, Kansas Gas and Electric Co., the lead partner in the Wolf Creek project, proposed that commercial operation begin when the plant is ready to operate at 50 percent of its generating capacity — currently projected for mid-April 1985.

"Upon completion at the 50 percent power level, Wolf Creek will be a safe, reliable, continuous and substantial source of power and energy," said Forrest Rhodes, Wolf Creek plant manager for KG&E.

The staff of the KCC objected to the utility's proposal and instead called for commercial operation when the plant is at 100 percent power and after completion of a 250-hour test of the plant's steam supply system.

The commission, after listening to testimony from witnesses for its staff and KG&E, took the matter under advisement. It will issue a decision in about six or seven weeks, said KCC Chairman Michael Lennen.

Monday's hearing was the first key proceeding related to Wolf Creek rate cases, which are to be filed this fall. More importantly, the commission's decision concerning commercial operation will directly affect customers of the three utilities building the plant near Burlington in east-central Kansas.

James Haines, attorney for KG&E, noted that any delay in commercial operation of the Wolf Creek plant will raise the "ultimate cost" of the project and could drive up needed rate increases to cover construction.

A one month delay, for example, would add $25 million to the project's total cost for interest and finance charges alone, according to KG&E.

Robert Fillmore, KCC assistant general counsel, argued that Wolf Creek must be operated and tested at 100 percent of its generating capacity before it can be "proven reliable and available to serve ratepayers."

"Testing, by definition, almost precludes commercial operation," said Fillmore.

Wayne Weber, chief engineer for the KCC, and Hossein Novin, construction inspector for the KCC, emphasized that testing at 100 percent power is vital to ensure the plant will operate properly.

"I am saying the probability of any failure or break down of different equipment is greater at the 100 percent power level which puts the equipment in ultimate stress loading than at the 50 percent power level," said Novin.

Rhodes contended that testing at 50 percent power was more than adequate and said it satisfied all

Program provides adult support

Big Brothers help with growing pains

By TIM FITZGERALD
Collegian Reporter

Devin Dubuc of Manhattan is only 7, but he has learned to face life like a person almost twice his age.

Devin, like many children, has been forced to grow up with circumstances in which he had no control. Since his parents' divorce when he was a baby, Devin has lacked a serious male figure to look up to for most of his life.

Big Brothers/Big Sisters of Manhattan has a waiting list of 61 children needing adult volunteers.

The local chapter of Big Brothers/Big Sisters started in 1961 and it has been growing ever since.

Although there are currently 94 matches in the local Big Brothers/Big Sisters program, coordinator Winnie Endicott said there are approximately three children a week referred to the program. She also said the number of adult volunteers can not keep up with the demand for Big Brothers and Big Sisters.

Big Brothers and Big Sisters are asked to involve the child in low-cost activities three to six hours a week which will provide some of the adult support the children need.

"We suggest that they (volunteers) don't spend a lot of money on the kids," Endicott said, "and that they think of things to do like going to the zoo, going fishing, going hiking; things that don't cost a lot of money. We assume most of them don't have a lot of money, so they do things like that. They wash the car, work in the yard, go to the dorms, to the fraternity and sorority houses...they love that, they get lots of attention."

"We do have several discounts available around town. We try to make things available by approaching the businesses," she said. Endicott believes Devin's growing up without a serious male figure has had some positive effects on him.

"Devin is a very precocious 7-year-old who is very responsive," she said.

Because Devin has lacked a male role model, he has developed the ability to carry himself with an sense of confidence which appears out of proportion for his age.

Devin's maturity is exhibited in his choice of friends, many of whom are six years older.

Devin's mother, Deborah Dubuc, thinks her son has real leadership qualities. These qualities are what she said accounts for him spending his time with mostly older friends.

Devin's daily problems are not unique. He faces the same tribulations which children have faced for years: "Mom says my room's too messy, the pool isn't open enough, and Mom won't let me sit with my feet on the couch."

Nothing is unique about those childhood complaints — sounds like any boy at that age. What is unique, however, is the way in which Devin responds to male role models — with a great amount of childhood enthusiasm.

Devin had had a Big Brother for 2½ years — an enlisted man stationed at Fort Riley — but he was transferred last month leaving Devin alone again.

Devin's mother said that his former Big Brother meant so much to him that she and Devin have sent letters to U.S. Senator Bob Dole, R-Kan., and the Army asking that Devin's former Big Brother be commended for the time he shared with Devin.

"He was nice and he liked to take people places," Devin said. "We went to the movies, we went to ice skate, and he took me to the park and all that stuff," Devin said.

Camp to stress plus side of good nutrition, fitness

Memorial Hospital opens its doors today to the young people of Manhattan, ages 12-16, for a program titled "Camp Fitness."

The camp will teach two sections on fitness: nutrition and physical fitness. It is slated to last three weeks, meeting two times each week on Tuesday and Thursday, at 8 to 9:30 a.m. and 3 to 4:30 p.m., Debbie Hood, assistant director of food services at Memorial Hospital, said.

"When you go to the store, you try to get the most for your money. When you eat, you try to get the most for your calories," Eunice Bassler, registered dietitian, said.

Bassler will be teaching the nutrition section of Camp Fitness. She is an instructor at K-State in the foods and nutrition department, which is co-sponsoring the camp.

The main emphasis of the nutrition section will be trying to get the most nutrients and fiber per calorie.

Instead of labeling a food good or bad the department has developed anytime, sometimes and few times food categories, with specific criteria based on fiber density.

The "Incredible Bulk" is a symbol they'll be using at the camp to symbolize fiber. This shows that the food is a natural whole food, not refined or prepared using processes that remove essential nutrients, Bassler said.

Using this as the emphasis, Bassler believes the camp will be teaching the positive side of eating.

"Without watching calories you focus on the positive parts: more nutrients per calorie vs. fewer calories," Bassler said.

"With anorexia on the rise, it shows that way too much emphasis has been put on watching your weight and not eating too many calories. This almost gives eating a bad name," Bassler said.

There will also be a physical fitness section, taught by Gara Burnette, a physical therapist from Memorial Hospital.

The programs will be based on the interests of the group, Bassler said.

Manhunt produces fear among blacks

By The Associated Press

TOLEDO, Ohio — Police sought a "deranged individual" and his teenage companion Monday as suspects in a chain of Midwestern murders, while a black leader said the manhunt had created "absolute fear" in Toledo's black neighborhoods.

Toledo Deputy Police Chief Ray Vetter said officials were hoping authorities in Wisconsin, Illinois, Indiana and Michigan might provide information on Alton Coleman, 28, and Debra Brown, 19, that would give police a clue on what the couple might do next.

The FBI and police said Coleman gains the confidence of his alleged victims by stopping to talk as he wanders through black neighborhoods. Both Coleman and Brown are black.

Vetter said police may call in psychologists to figure out what motivates Coleman and Brown, whom he called prime suspects in the weekend deaths in Toledo of Virginia Temple and her 10-year-old daughter, Rachelle. No one has been charged in the killings, he said.

Aggravated battery charges were filed against the pair in the theft of money and a car from an elderly Toledo couple.

Coleman, described as a "deranged individual" by FBI Special Agent Doug Domin of Toledo, is wanted for questioning in a chain of killings and beatings across five states.

The search for the two began in Coleman's hometown, Waukegan, Ill., where he is charged with murder and kidnapping in the death of 9-year-old Vernita Wheat of Kenosha, Wis., whose body was found June 19.

Coleman also is wanted for questioning in the disappearance of an Indiana woman, the death of a 7-year-old Gary, Ind., girl and several armed robberies and assaults in the Detroit area.

Vetter said Brown, who is from Kenosha, Wis., appears to be at least a willing accomplice in the attacks.

Police have been showing pictures of the couple to Toledo residents, and in Cleveland, police contacted a black-oriented newspaper and passed out fliers on the couple. "We want to caution the people — we don't want to panic the people," the deputy chief said.

On Monday, the Toledo chapter of the New Union of Blacks in America announced it had offered a $500 reward for information about the couple. New Union President Delbert Smith said his group decided to offer the reward because there was "absolute fear" among Toledo blacks.

Frank Duvendack, 77, and his wife, Dorothy, 73, of Toledo, identified the couple from police photos as the ones who took money and their car Saturday morning. The Duvendacks were not injured. That was the last confirmed sighting of the pair, Vetter said.

Carlin

he plans to make a major issue in the campaign.

The governor said he doesn't think his declaration for Mondale will upset the Hart supporters in the Kansas delegation.

"I've been keeping in touch with the leadership of the Hart campaign, so they're not going to be surprised.

"I think it's healthy that Hart will be nominated, and that those people be allowed to cast their votes for him."

State Rep. Marvin Barkis of Louisburg, chairman of the Hart caucus within the Kansas delegation, said Carlin's declaration didn't upset him but he was surprised the governor didn't wait until San Francisco.

"I had hoped he would keep himself uncommitted right up to the convention," Barkis said.

In his prepared statement, Carlin said:

"...I have decided party unity would best be served by supporting Mr. Mondale's candidacy.

"Mr. Mondale has earned the nomination and certainly has the leadership abilities necessary to move this country forward.

"I have said repeatedly since Sen. Glenn dropped out of the race that my primary concerns this election year are having a strong ticket and having a unified party to support that ticket.

"It is important to go to San Francisco with those goals in mind. I believe my decision will be in the best interest of both goals here in Kansas and across the nation."

Shopping center to compete with mall

The Little Apple Square, a shopping center located at the corner of Fourth and Houston streets in downtown Manhattan, may be in for some tough competition from the proposed downtown mall.

The mall is slated to begin construction in 1986 in the same vicinity as Little Apple Square.

The shopping center is scheduled for completion at the end of this year, said Lonnie Underhill of General Growth Co. of Des Moines, Iowa.

The company began planning for the shopping center in January 1983, Underhill said, adding that there will be a minimum of eight stores in the building.

Currently housed in what used to be the Woolworth's building are Maurice's, the Brass Buckle, Braun's, Regis Hairstyling and the Montgomery Ward Catalog Store.

Underhill expects at least three additional stores to open by the end of 1984 — a shoe store, an eating establishment and a ladies fashion store.

The managers of the stores currently located in Little Apple Square have mixed feelings on the mall to be built in the downtown area.

"I really don't know what my company's plans are if the mall goes in," Leanna White, manager of Maurice's, a clothing store, said.

If the mall goes in, Maurice's may move to the mall, White said.

"Chances are we'll probably go in to the mall, I'm not absolutely sure though," Cheri Schleeman, Braun's manager, said. "We're really a mall-oriented store anyway."

Schleeman believes that if Braun's doesn't move to the mall, that there is a good chance the store will open another Braun's in the mall in addition to their current store.

Regis Hairstyling opened about a month ago and Cristy Soellner, manager, sees no reason to change their location after the mall has been completed.

"We'll be staying here. By then (the time the mall goes in) we should be pretty well established," Soellner said.

Recently the shopping center has added an awning above its store fronts. The awning ties together the shopping center and has with the names of the stores above each store front.

The building has 30,000 square feet. The shopping center has three store fronts on Houston Street and five on Fourth Street.

Architects present proposal for Holton Hall renovations

By LYNN BENDER
Collegian Reporter

A proposal for the renovation of Holton Hall has been submitted by architects Brent Bowman & Associates to the University for approval.

The architects have proposed a three-phase plan, which would include construction to begin on the first floor.

"The first floor would use approximately half of the resources allotted for the project," Chet Peters, vice president of student affairs, said. The first floor would also take longer to complete because of work which is needed on the stairwells, Peters added.

"The architects really haven't presented us with any hard figures, because they still want our approval on the phases idea," Tracy Turner, Student Senate chairman and member of the review committee, said.

"With the proposed three-phase plan, construction of the first phase would begin, at the earliest, during the summer of 1986," he said and added that the second and third phase could possibly be completed during the following summers.

Turner said that funding for the project will come directly from student fees. Full-time students during the fall and spring semesters pay $3, part-time students pay $1 and summer students pay $1.20.

"There is no state money involved, this is one reason why the renovation was proposed a few years ago — because we knew the Legislature would not provide any funds," Turner said.

Turner said it was estimated that there would be $88,000 at the end of the first year. As of May 1984, $4,100 was collected from student fees during the summer of 1983, for a total of $96,900 for last school year. It is estimated that by this fall $100,000 will be collected.

"We are ahead of pace from what was projected, but the original figure did not include the summer of 1983," Turner said.

"We are doing well in regard to the money we are taking in, but all the time building costs are going up. So until we know an approximate starting date we won't know how much it will cost," he added.

Because students have been paying into the project for a year now, Turner would like to see construction start as soon as possible.

"Those students who started paying into the project would feel like they are getting something for their money (when the renovation begins), and it would not be so far down the road that they would never see the end result," he said.

The philosophy that Turner would like to see taken, would be to start "as soon as we have enough money raised to cover the first phase cost. We will probably go ahead with it but it will probably be two to three more years before we would build the second phase," he said.

In 1981 the total project cost was estimated at $780,000 and Turner said that "if we would want to collect all the funds before we start any construction, it would put us at fiscal year 1992." Construction would take about one year to complete and the services in Holton would be displaced or would close during this time, Turner said.

Judge faces charges for abuse of power

By The Associated Press

ST. PAUL, Minn. — Two former U.S. attorneys general faced off Monday in the investigation of a federal judge accused of abusing his power by publicly reprimanding executives of a company that manufactured allegedly faulty intrauterine birth control devices.

Thousands of injury claims were filed in the 1970s against the Virginia-based A.H. Robins Co., over the intrauterine devices, which were used by millions of women.

Last Feb. 29, the day several Dalkon Shield cases were settled out of court for $4.6 million, U.S. District Judge Miles Lord ordered three top A.H. Robins officials to appear in his courtroom.

Lord accused the executives of earning millions of dollars while causing thousands of women to suffer.

The Dalkon Shield, he said, was "an instrument of death, mutilation and disease...a deadly depth charge in the wombs ready to explode at any time."

In the first day of a two-day misconduct investigation, Lord's attorney, Ramsey Clark, the nation's top lawyer under President Lyndon B. Johnson, said Lord "was acting in the highest tradition of an independent judiciary and none of his actions were improper in any way."

Griffin Bell, attorney general under President Carter and lawyer for Robins, countered that Lord's behavior was a "gross denial of due process of law because the executives were not given a chance to respond."

Clark and Bell began calling witnesses Monday, with closing arguments scheduled for Tuesday before a five-judge panel appointed by the 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. The case resulted from a complaint of judicial misconduct brought by A.H. Robins and its three executives.

If he is found guilty of misconduct, Lord's comments to the Robins' executives could be erased from the record and he could be reprimanded or asked to retire. Only Congress can remove a federal judge from the bench.

Before calling his witnesses, Clark read a statement written by Lord in which the judge explained why he called the executives before his bench.

"The primary purpose of the reprimand was to rebuke and sanction what otherwise was an affront to the integrity of the court," Lord wrote.

Lord said he had planned to lecture the executives in private, "but because of their disdain for the court, I read it out loud in open court."

He said A.H. Robins "was feverishly settling (out of court) to effectively flee the court's jurisdiction" and he said if that was allowed without comment, it would "make a mockery of the judicial process."

A.H. Robins contends Lord abused his judicial power when he called the three executives to his courtroom for a lecture about "corporate irresponsibility at its meanest."

Bell, in legal documents filed earlier, said if Lord's statements weren't removed from the record, they could cause "immeasurable harm" in about 4,000 unresolved claims by women who say they were injured by Dalkon Shields.

The Dalkon Shield was used by millions of women in the early 1970s until A.H. Robins pulled the IUD off the market in 1974 because of evidence that it caused infections and other problems.

Devin

Deborah thinks Devin's Big Brother provided him with a lot of things she couldn't.

"I think he needs that male role model in his life, and to do a lot of things that I can't do," Deborah said.

"For instances, I don't know how to play football. He and I do other things that are a lot of fun. We go fishing, we go to the lake and we go to Worlds of Fun, but there are just some things that you need a male companion for. And I think too that he can spill his guts easier (to a man)," Deborah said.

A second grader at Northview Grade School, Devin looks much older than 7 and he is quick to point out he is big for his age.

"I didn't get holded back or anything and my mom didn't hold me back," Devin said. "I just grew a lot. (I'm) big for my age. I eat more than my mom does, or my old Big Brother did."

Devin likes to go to the zoo (the groundhogs are his favorite), play baseball (he's a right fielder for his t-ball team), but he doesn't like girls.

"When I get bigger, I know I will," Devin said.

Since Devin never knew his father, it really doesn't bother him not having a father around. He even goes as far to say that he is fine without a father. It's obvious, though, Devin's Big Brother was important to him.

"Eddie told mom that he felt like a dad to me," Devin said.

Deborah thinks Devin's relationship with Eddie was beneficial for her son.

"I think it was a real good relationship," Deborah said. "He really misses Eddie already. It was something that was real private for him. What Eddie didn't tell me, a lot of times I didn't know, because that was his little area."

Deborah said Eddie gave Devin someone to model after which Deborah feels is important during a child's younger years. She said she thinks Devin's relationship with Eddie has helped Devin come more in contact with his feelings.

Devin is far from deciding what he wants to be when he grows up. He even isn't at the point when a child wants to be a big league baseball player. But, Devin does have one thing he wants to do when he grows up.

"I just think I maybe want to be a Big Brother, or something like that," he said. "Then I would get to take a kid around."

Governor sets reward for clues

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Gov. John Carlin on Monday offered a $5,000 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of those responsible for the Dec. 7 gunshot killing of Carson W. Friend and his pregnant wife Donna in rural southwestern Kansas.

Carlin authorized the enticement, from his special reward fund, at the request of Thomas Kelly, director of the Kansas Bureau of Investigation, who said the investigation into the deaths "is approaching a decided slowdown due to the lack of viable lead material."

"Those close to the investigation are of the opinion a catalyst is needed to generate citizen input into this matter to obtain the desired information," Kelly said in a letter to Carlin. "It is believed that a reward would be the needed catalyst in this case."

The bodies of Friend, 25, and his 17-year-old wife Donna, who was seven months pregnant at the time, were found in a rural area 12 miles south of Big Bow on the Morton and Stanton County line. Both had been shot, beaten and exposed to severe cold.

An investigation by the KBI and the county sheriffs' departments in the southwest section of the state produced no results and was followed by inquiries into Oklahoma, Texas, Arkansas, Florida and California, Kelly told Carlin.

It is the 13th time a $5,000 reward has been offered for information since the fund was established. The first reward was offered in 1976 for the killing of a Hill City woman.

Kelly said people with information in the Friends' killings should contact either his office or the Stanton County Sheriff's Department.

safety related testing required by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission.

Moreover, he emphasized that the 250-hour test of the steam supply system was needed only for completion of a warranty by the manufacturer of its components.

"It has no function in establishing the ability of Wolf Creek to operate in a safe and reliable manner," Forrest said of the requirement for 250-hours of continuous testing of the plant at 100 percent power.

"In fact, all systems which would be required to operate at 100 percent power will be in operation and demonstrated their ability to operate safely and reliably at the completion of testing at 50 percent power level."

Wolf Creek, under construction near Burlington in east-central Kansas, is a joint project of KG&E, Kansas City Power & Light Co. and a group of 25 rural electric cooperatives called the Kansas Electric Power Cooperative Inc. KG&E and KCPL each own 47 percent of the plant and KEPCo owns 6 percent.

KEPCo attorney Clifford Berthoff said the co-op group differed with the majority partners in its standard for commercial operation and he recommended it be established after 100 hours of testing at 100 percent power.

Last month, KG&E projected that Wolf Creek would be at 50 percent power by mid-April 1985 and Rhodes said Monday it would take another 38 days to reach 100 percent power and complete all testing at that level. The $2.9 billion cost of Wolf Creek is based on commercial operation at 50 percent of plant generating capacity.

KG&E has said it will ask state utility regulators to phase in rate increases from Wolf Creek over five years.

Driver stupidity reduces law to paper shield

The K-State campus is basically designed for students who travel by foot or other nonmotorized means; hence, traffic laws are geared for this group. One of the most abused traffic laws concerns the numerous pedestrian crosswalks on campus.

Art Stone, director of the K-State Police, said vehicles must yield to pedestrians who have taken a step off the curb and onto the crosswalk, showing initiative of crossing the street. The dangerous question, he said, results when the drivers decide when that first step has been taken.

That decision by drivers, though rarely a matter of life and death, adds another responsibility which goes along with operating a vehicle. But how often do motorists feel as if they own the road and play the game of cat and mouse with people wanting to cross the street at a pedestrian crosswalk or, even worse yet, that they are oblivious to the law? A pedestrian shouldn't have to weigh crossing the street and be the target of a motorist's ignorance on a campus designed for the person on foot.

Granted, the severity of the problem is lessened on some streets, as the one located between the Union and Ahearn Field House or the one between Willard and King halls, but there is a certain degree of danger at crossings near campus on Denison Avenue, Clafin Road and Manhattan Avenue if pedestrians want to take advantage of traffic system designed for them.

Hopefully, it won't take a serious injury or lawsuit for drivers to respect the pedestrian. If motorists find the pedestrian law burdensome and time consuming, they should bypass campus and be forced to adapt to a new definition of time consuming. Pedestrian laws are made for protection and a matter of convenience for the non-motorist, but, unfortunately because of some drivers' stupidity, the law is only a paper shield.

Cutting social science budgets means disaster

No less of an expert than Irving Horowitz, professor of political science and sociology at Rutgers University, has said that "the scientific community is subject to the iron law of politics: to the victor belongs the spoils; to the vanquished, the ashes." And the recent rising emphasis of the hard sciences have left the social sciences in a heap.

For example, the budgetary reductions at the National Science Foundation have been very unequal, with social sciences getting tremendous cuts while some of the hard sciences received increases. At the National Endowment for the Humanities things have been even worse. Not only did the NEH receive a general 50 percent budget cut, but programs in sociology and economics were sliced almost 75 percent.

The cumulative effect of these budget cuts will be disastrous. Such actions are like taking microscopes from biologists or telescopes from astronomers. As William Carey from the executive office of the American Association for the Advancement of Science recently remarked, "The social sciences should be prepared to struggle for their lives."

This life-or-death situation has come about for several reasons, with the most obvious being the fact that the social sciences and humanities bring mostly bad news. And nobody likes the bearing of bad news less than a politician. Results from this kind of research are often unpopular or unglamorous, when compared to achievements like the space shuttle or recombinant DNA.

BRAD RUSSELL
Collegian Columnist

Fields such as sociology, economics and political science are revealing so many disturbing things about this country that those doing the research are beginning to be regarded as un-American. Since the results often do not correspond to the way many of those in high political places see the world, or wish it to be, those doing that research become guilty by association.

A second feature of the humanities is that it doesn't solve any of the problems it finds. Politicians and taxpayers are simply being unrealistic in demanding a "solution" to poverty or a "solution" to drug abuse. It's much like the freshmen philosophy class in which everyone wants to know the "right answer" to questions like "Is there a God?"

The goal of research in this area is not to eliminate the problem, but to identify it, understand it and help to reduce its prevalence, if possible. But when these social problems persist or grow worse, someone must be blamed — generally, those researching the subject in question.

A third difference between hard, technological research and the humanities is that changes in social science theories don't always change in the same manner as in other scientific areas. The hard sciences abound with great scientific breakthroughs such as Newton's discoveries in physics, the nuclear revolution, and now the recent revelations about DNA.

Changes in the social sciences occur more incrementally, less revolutionary, in a step-by-step process. Since this process is hardly earth-shaking, it receives very little publicity, and hence, very little popular support.

A final handicap of the so-called soft sciences is the fact that they are within everyone's everyday experience. All of us have had experience in economics, i.e. balancing our check books, and since we are self-styled experts, we cannot understand why the politicians can't balance their budgets as we do. Similarly, the public perception of the results of welfare research is often negative because we once saw a welfare queen buy beer with food stamps.

On the other hand, not too many of us have any everyday experience with subatomic physics, so if the scientists say there are tiny things called protons, electrons and neutrons spinning around inside everything around us, we must take their word for it. We don't dispute the results of these types of scientific studies because it is outside our realm of experience.

But we are quick to find fault with studies about the things we do experience, and this turns out to mean budget cuts for the humanities. As our leaders devise more and more programs to promote the hard sciences, and leave the other sciences behind, we should begin to ask a few questions. How does one place the value of one kind of research above another? By what criteria do we judge their usefulness and utility? Who's to say that a new mathematical theory is more valuable than a new anthropological discovery?

The fact is that we will never know where great ideas of our time will come from or how they will be discovered. But what we do know is that when free flowing, unfettered research is being pursued on all levels, many great discoveries will be made.

The process is much like searching for oil. Although the exact location and time of the "gushers" is never known in advance, widespread exploration is bound to locate productive "wells." So the goal of our research should be the free-thinking generation of new ideas.

But our leaders are ignoring these facts. They are placing their bets on technological research alone, with corresponding research in the humanities. Stemming from the mistaken belief that technology can solve all our problems, they are staking our future on technological fixes. Although the stakes are high, it's a bet they are going to lose. As I see it, the brightest future belongs to those who do the most for humanity. This would require a balance of both "hard" and "soft" science. To me, that's the winner's bet.

Parents need protection from children's shows

WASHINGTON — First my credentials. I write as the father of a 12-year-old boy, as a former psychology major, sociology minor, a subscriber to Psychology Today, reader of the New York Times's science section and general all-around savant when it comes to the issue of movie violence, children and the new proposed PG-13 rating. I have no idea if the proposed rating will do any good.

I also have no idea if movie violence, of the heart-ripping-out kind in "Indiana Jones" or the gremlin-in-the-food-processor kind in "Gremlins," harms children — gives them nightmares or makes them want to sleep with the lights on. My own experience is that sometimes it does, sometimes it doesn't and it never happens the way I expect.

But the one thing I know about movie violence — as a fact, a variable truth and beyond any doubt — is that I hate it. I know it is unfashionable to talk about adults when it comes to movie violence. The trendy thing to do is always invoke children and their mental health. We would not, after all, want our young ones to become pyromaniacs because of a movie they saw.

RICHARD COHEN
Columnist

But my suspicion is that a goodly number of us are hiding behind our little ones, using them to make a case that we would like to make for ourselves. I, for one, have seen both "Indiana Jones" and "Gremlins," exhibits A and B, and was both scared to death and revolted. I expected when I saw the credits for "Indiana Jones" that Idi Amin would be listed as a consultant. It's unrelentingly gory and disgusting — exciting yes, but not a lot of fun. A heart gets ripped out, children are brutalized and awful things get served for dinner — like monkey brains. I loathed it.

Ditto, "Gremlins." I watched this movie like a stranger in a foreign land. Much of the audience was laughing hysterically as the little monsters either killed innocent people or were killed themselves. What was so funny? I felt as if I were involved in one of those incidents in which some depressed person threatens to jump from a building — and the crowd below eggs him on. If this is funny, World War II must have been a scream.

But the truth, it seems, is that children and adults of subnormal intelligence aren't really bothered by this sort of thing. Maybe the television generation is inured to violence. Maybe my mother was right about sneakers and people who have grown up wearing them — they really have not turned out quite right. Maybe children know that a movie is only a movie, when to many of us it's more real than what's called real life.

It could be that with age comes a new kind of sensitivity. Or maybe after Beirut, Central America, Northern Ireland and so much else, there is nothing amusing about cruelty and violence. It's like seeing a movie called "Audit" about a guy who's asked to report to the nearest IRS office with all his receipts. Only children could think that's funny.

It is for this reason, therefore, that I propose a new rating — CO, for Children Only. This would be the reverse of X, which is for adults only. A CO rating would warn adults that the movie should be viewed only by children, that it contains sickening violence, that grown-ups will spend an inordinate amount of time with their hands over their eyes. Among other things — it's just plain stupid to pay good money for a movie that you will not watch.

A CO rating would be wonderful. The usher would turn adults away from the door. He would ask old-looking children to provide proof that they are not, say, over the age of 19. I, for one, would be able to tell my son that I would love to take him to a movie in which a Cabbage Patch Doll guts a koala bear — but they won't allow me in the theater.

But instead of doing that, Hollywood is considering establishing yet another rating for children — PG-13 — when it is not the children who need protecting. It's us, I want to be protected from the walking dead, from bestial natives who desperately need sensitivity training, from toothy monsters who need a bite plate — from the "genius" of that awful Steven Spielberg. I'm tired of being scared. Worse, I'm scared of being scared. Movies may be better than ever, but I'm not.

Hollywood — protect me.

Dylan concertgoers wreck town

SLANE, Ireland — Villagers cleared wreckage Monday after rioting by young people attending a Bob Dylan concert at an ancient battle site.

A 100-strong mob that went on the rampage early Sunday smashed shop windows, set three police cars on fire and, after clashing with local police officers, besieged the police station in this village 35 miles north of Dublin.

A dozen officers barricaded inside the station had to radio for help as the howling, drunken crowd bombarded the building with stones, sticks and bottles.

The mob was dispersed by 200 baton-wielding riot police called in from seven nearby towns. Police spokesmen reported 18 people injured, including three officers, but none seriously.

The Sunday afternoon concert before 40,000 went ahead, but Lord Henry Mountcharles, who owns Slane Castle, said it might be the last concert in the open-air amphitheater at the castle, site of the 1690 Battle of the Boyne between Protestants and Catholics.

The body of a Dublin teen-ager who apparently tried to swim to the riverside concert was recovered from the Boyne River, police said.

Actor Cole to play role of felon

LOS ANGELES — Actor Gary Cole, who plays convicted murderer Dr. Jeffrey MacDonald in a movie on the former Green Beret's fight to exonerate himself, says the presumption of innocence is important to the role.

"Jeffrey MacDonald thinks he is innocent, so I have to think he's innocent in order to play him," Cole said.

MacDonald is serving three life terms for his conviction in 1979 for the Fort Bragg, N.C., slayings of his pregnant wife and two small daughters. Nine years earlier, he was acquitted of the charges.

MacDonald has exhausted his appeals. He must await a government decision on a motion by his lawyers for a new trial.

NBC will air a four-hour movie based on Joe McGinniss' book about the killings, "Fatal Vision," on Nov. 4 and 5. Also in the cast are Eva Marie Saint and Karl Malden, who will play the parents of MacDonald's wife, Colette.

Barry Newman plays a defense lawyer, and Andy Griffith the cigar-chewing prosecutor.

Mr. Ed Fan Club honors Tiny Tim

DALLAS — The Mr. Ed Fan Club, gathering at a Dallas bowling alley, honored the memory of television's famous talking horse and presented an award to featured guest Tiny Tim.

The ukelele-strumming singer's repertoire was greeted with an ovation from the crowd of 400 and won an award as Greatest Performance of the 20th Century.

Among his numbers was a version of the equine TV star's theme song beginning, "A horse is a horse, of course, of course ..."

Alan Young, who played straight man to Ed, also was on hand for the Saturday gathering called "Edstock" ("15 years after Woodstock").

Weather

Mostly sunny and continued hot today, high 95 to 100. South winds 15 to 20 mph. Partly cloudy tonight with a 20 percent chance of thunderstorms, low in low to mid-70s. Partly cloudy Wednesday with a chance for thunderstorms, high low to mid-90s.

St. Mary Hospital fitness trail offers course to health

By VIKKI WATSON
Staff Writer

In a world where a sound mind and sound body are highly desired attributes, Manhattan may boast a large number in the "sound body" category — or at least that's the hope behind the new St. Mary Hospital Ray Paquette Memorial Fitness Trail.

The fitness trail, which opened July 5, is directly north of the hospital. It was the partial brainchild of Jackie Rawlings, chief physical therapist at St. Mary, who saw the trail as an excellent way for people to become physically fit.

"We really want to encourage people to be more responsible for their own health," Rawlings said. "We live very sedentary lives in the U.S. which plays a large part in heart attacks."

The course, which cost approximately $30,000 and was funded by both St. Mary and private donations, is open 24 hours a day and includes night-time lighting. The running/walking surface is made of chat, which is much easier to run on than asphalt, Rawlings said.

"It's really nice to run or walk on," she said.

Those who run this half-mile course may stop at 20 stations for 32 exercise spots. The equipment, which includes parallel and vault bars, a slant board, balance beam and overhead ladder, is designed to give the whole body a rigorous workout, Rawlings said. Running the course provides the aerobic exercise.

"If you go through all the stations you'd use just about every joint and muscle in the body," Rawlings said.

And exercising those various parts of the body is ideal when one wants to get in good physical condition — even for those who partake in some form of exercise now, she said.

"I've been running the past four years and I intend to use it to build up upper body strength," said Rawlings, who discovered that many muscle groups were previously unworked by her jogging runs. "I still neglected some areas of my body. It encourages me to do more."

And doing more could mean the beginning of a lean, well-conditioned body or the start of pain and agony, said Rawlings, who urged all would-be exercise enthusiasts to first consult a physician before undertaking any conditioning program. There is no age limit to who can successfully use the course, she said.

"You need to use common sense," Rawlings said. "You should have your doctor's consent and a physical because some stations are very strenuous."

Leon White and Sister Benedicta Moeder, both of Manhattan, exercise on the newly completed St. Mary Hospital Ray Paquette Memorial Fitness Trail Monday. The lighted, half-mile trail which opened Thursday, is available to anyone 24 hours a day without charge.

Relay '84 runners to pass through Manhattan

By KRISTIE CRABTREE
Collegian Reporter

Geneva, Switzerland was the starting point June 12 for a relay event in which participants will run across continental Europe, the United Kingdom and the United States, carrying the message "step by step for a world without hunger."

That relay is scheduled to arrive in Manhattan on the evening of July 18. The destination of Relay '84 is the Olympic Games Aug. 4, in Los Angeles.

According to information distributed by World Runners, a running club dedicated to ending world hunger, the purpose of the relay will be to educate individuals and communities so they can participate in ending the world hunger problem.

The coordination of Relay '84 with the Summer Olympics is a natural one, according to the club. One of the basic aims of the Olympic movement is to educate through sport in a spirit of better understanding between each other and of friendship, thereby helping to build a better or more peaceful world.

World Runners is combining the knowledge of their sport with an educational effort to reach out and carry this message since they believe ending hunger is one of the basic conditions necessary for a more peaceful world.

The Missouri-Kansas segments of Relay '84 will begin when the relay arrives Sunday evening in St. Louis. The runners will depart from St. Louis early in the morning on July 16. The relay plans to arrive Monday evening at Jefferson City, Mo. The runners will leave the morning of July 17, en route to Kansas City, Mo. They will leave Kansas City the morning of July 18, arriving in Manhattan that evening and leaving again early on July 19.

This not a competitive run, Bob Mann, coordinator of the relay from St. Louis to Manhattan, said. All runners of all ability levels are needed to support the Missouri-Kansas route.

Lynn Doxon, volunteer manager of the Kansas Region, said she became involved in Relay '84 by participating in the Hunger Project. World Runners is something that came out of somebody's participation in the Hunger Project, Doxon said, and that group contacted people in the Hunger Project to see if someone would organize the run.

The several hundred European runners who started in Switzerland, Doxon said, won't be going the entire distance across the United States. There will be only 12 participants running the complete distance. The other segments of the relay will be filled by local runners, Doxon said.

She said the Relay needs more participants to run segments to the Colorado border. The runners will be placed along the route, as close to their home as possible and according to the distance they want to run, Doxon said. People from Manhattan and towns west of Manhattan to the Colorado border interested in participating in Relay '84 may contact Doxon at 537-0938.

Shoulder injury stifles Cooney's comeback

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Gerry Cooney's planned boxing comeback was derailed Monday when he was forced to postpone a July 20 fight against Philip Brown in Dallas because of a shoulder injury.

Dr. Jeffrey Minkoff, an orthopedist, said Cooney suffered an injury to the rotator cuff area of the left shoulder.

He said the injury "has diminished motion and produced a large amount of pain. This injury is significant enough to cause postponement of a one-on-one confrontation."

Minkoff said further tests will have to be made to determine the severity of the injury and decisions regarding Cooney's boxing future would have to await the results of the tests.

"It has been postponed indefinitely, and that's a long time," said George Krieger, a vice president of Home Box Office Sports, the cable company which planned to televise the scheduled 10-round bout.

The 6-foot-7 Cooney, of Huntington, N.Y., has not fought since he was stopped by Holmes in the 13th round in a bid for the World Boxing Council heavyweight title on June 11, 1982.

That was Cooney's only loss in 26 professional fights. His last victory was a 58-second knockout of Ken Norton May 11, 1981.

Cooney, 27, was supposed to fight Brown — 20-0-2 with 15 knockouts — on June 18, 1983, but that also fell through because Cooney suffered a hand injury. He had knuckle surgery to repair the problem.

Cooney was set to fight an exhibition with Joe Bugner in January 1982 to help him tune up for the Holmes bout, but the exhibition was canceled because of more back problems.

The Holmes fight was moved from March to June in 1982 when Cooney hurt his left shoulder while sparring.

Lea, Steib starting pitchers as baseball's stars compete

By The Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — Dave Stieb of the Toronto Blue Jays received his second consecutive starting role for the American League Monday as managers bypassed a unique matchup of youth-versus-age in announcing their lineups for the 55th All-Star Game.

In a somewhat surprising move, Baltimore Manager Joe Altobelli of the AL and Philadelphia Manager Paul Owens of the National League opted for practicality in naming their starting pitchers.

Owens picked Charlie Lea of the Montreal Expos, giving the major league's two Canadian teams the honor of supplying the starting pitcher.

In picking the right-handed Stieb, Altobelli passed over Detroit's Jack Morris, who pitched a no-hitter this season and was the AL's winningest pitcher at the midsummer break with a 12-5 record, and Phil Niekro of the New York Yankees, 11-4 with a league-leading 1.84 earned run average.

Lea, appearing in his first All-Star Game, was tied with Joaquin Andujar of St. Louis as the winningest pitcher in the majors. Lea has a 13-4 record, and Andujar, who left the country because of illness in his family and was replaced on the All-Star roster, is 13-6. Left-hander Fernando Valenzuela of Los Angeles is Andujar's replacement.

A more obvious, dream matchup would have been 19-year-old rookie Dwight Gooden of the New York Mets, 8-5 with a league-leading 133 strikeouts, against the knuckleballer Niekro, who turned 45 this year.

It would have provided a matchup of the youngest and oldest players in All-Star history.

"I'm sure that was brought up in the thinking of a lot of people," Owens said, "because it would have been unique. But we went with the pitcher who had the most rest because we didn't want to hurt anyone."

Lea pitched Wednesday night, going nine innings to beat Atlanta.

"There was a lot of thought given to Niekro because he's had a lot of success at Candlestick," said Altobelli. "But we finally decided to go with the same horse that got us here last year."

Stieb worked three hitless innings and gave up one unearned run while striking out four as the AL broke an 11-game losing streak in the 1983 All-Star Game. The National League has won 19 of the past 21 All-Star contests.

Police discount arson in York cathedral fire

By The Associated Press

YORK, England — A fire, possibly caused by lightning, gutted the great Gothic cathedral of York Minster early today, a police chief said.

Inspector Arthur Lacy of North Yorkshire police said lightning was believed to have struck the roof where the fire began above the south door of the Minster in the roof of the south transept.

"We may have witnesses to support that," Lacy said as the fire continued to rage more than 2½ hours after the first alarm.

The Anglican cathedral, built between 1220 and 1470, is the largest medieval church in northern Europe.

Police and the Dean of York, the Very Rev. Ronald Jasper who lives a few hundred yards from the building, went into the burning cathedral and carried out some of the valuable treasures.

Because of the danger of the roof falling in, the rescue attempts had to be abandoned.

Police discounted the possibility of arson and said they had no reason to connect it with Friday's disputed consecration of a new bishop who has raised doubts about traditional Christian beliefs.

They said the Minster has its own staff of six policemen as well as security staff on duty, 24 hours a day.

In 1967, a successful international appeal was launched to raise nearly $5 million to strengthen the foundations, and architects said the work would assure the structure's existence for another 500 years.

Police said the cathedral area of the city was evacuated and was cordoned off as the flames soared into the sky.

The spokesman said the initial alarm was sounded by an automatic link between the cathedral and the county fire brigade headquarters in Northallerton, 30 miles to the north.

Last Friday, Archbishop John Habgood consecrated the controversial Rev. David Jenkins, 59, to bishop of Durham.

The ceremony was interrupted by a parish priest, the Rev. John Mowll, who rushed forward midway through the service and grabbed the lectern. Mowll was escorted out of the cathedral by two church wardens, as was a lay protester who earlier shouted from a pew that the service should be stopped.

Jenkins, a former theology professor who now is the fourth senior prelate in Britain's state church, started a major controversy by saying he did not believe in the virgin birth of Jesus Christ or that Christ actually rose from the dead.

He also said that while he believes Jesus was both man and God, that other people do not have to believe this to be good Christians.

Jenkins was chosen by a church commission headed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the most Rev. Robert Runcie, leader of the 65-million-member worldwide Anglican communion.

The summer session of the general synod — leadership council — of the Church of England opened at York University on Saturday.

Police search for suspects in 2 murders

By The Associated Press

TOLEDO, Ohio — Police hunting a man allegedly on a Midwest crime spree with his teen-age girlfriend warned parents Sunday to keep their children indoors after the bodies of a woman and her young daughter were found stuffed in a basement crawl space.

"I've been asking my neighbors about their doors, windows, and they are keeping them very locked up, like me," said Steven Ford, who lives around the corner from the house where the bodies of Virginia Temple and her 10-year-old daughter, Rachelle, were found Saturday.

Police Capt. James Weigand said evidence from the Temple home and witnesses connected Alton Coleman, 28, and Debra Brown, 19, with the deaths. No charges had been filed Sunday in the deaths.

Coleman and Brown were charged with aggravated robbery in an attack Saturday on an elderly Toledo couple who were bound and gagged and robbed at gunpoint of money and a car at their home, about 1½ miles from the Temple home, said Detective Thomas Ross.

Illinois and federal authorities already have charged Coleman, of Waukegan, Ill., with murder and kidnapping in the death of 9-year-old Vernita Wheat of Kenosha, Wis., whose body was found in Waukegan on June 19.

Coleman also is wanted for questioning in the disappearance of an Indiana woman, the death of a 7-year-old Gary, Ind., girl and several armed robberies in the Detroit area.

Police said Sunday they were looking for a silver-gray Chevrolet Citation taken from Frank Duvendack, 77, and his wife, Dorothy, 73.

"We're going under the premise that they are following their modus operandi, and once they kill someone in a community they steal a car and get out of town," Ross said.

Ross urged caution, however, saying a search continued in Toledo.

Weigand said Temple's four other children, ranging in age from 1 to 6, were in the house but were not harmed. They told police their mother let a couple in resembling a relative who stopped by the house Saturday afternoon.

Temple's neighbors were shocked that she would have let a stranger in the house, said Doe Morizen, who has lived down the street from the family for five years.

But Coleman is a smooth talker who quickly gains people's confidence, according to Doug Domin of the FBI in Toledo.

Police said there was evidence of a struggle in the Temple house, which was ransacked. Weigand would not say how the mother and daughter were killed until autopsies were completed.

World leaders meet in Iraq to determine war's impact

By The Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Iraqis chanting "Yes, yes, yes for peace!" greeted officials of political parties, liberation movements and labor unions from 107 countries who met here Sunday to gauge the impact of the Iran-Iraq war on world peace and security.

Twenty bands representing youth clubs in Baghdad, the capital, and other parts of Iraq played folk music as about 15,000 Iraqis hailed 500 delegates as they walked into the heavily guarded conference palace.

Children waving small Iraqi flags joined ululating women in performing a folk dance. Others threw rice at the participants.

Iraqi Foreign Minister Tariq Aziz told the opening session that the three-day, Iraq-sponsored meeting was a "peaceful political demonstration aimed at facilitating the adoption of practical steps in the world that would make peace possible."

Aziz repeated that his country was ready for a "negotiated settlement" to its 46-month war with Iran.

He contended that the Iranian revolutionary regime of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini has "sought no means but war to decide its conflict with Iraq."

Iraq and Iran went to war in September 1980, mainly over possession of the Shatt al-Arab waterway.

Aziz said the conference was organized to "issue a strong call for peace" because, he charged, "Iran has rejected all the U.N. Security Council resolutions on the war."

It was the second peace conference organized by Iraq in Baghdad since the outbreak of the war. The Iraqis last year sponsored the Popular Islamic Conference on the "impact of the gulf war on relations between Islamic countries and on world peace."

Combining education, family takes planning

By T. RUSSELL LORETZ
Collegian Reporter

It's not the broom closet she was expecting, anyway.

In the basement of Umberger Hall, through the double doors marked "Distribution Center," past stacks of literature neatly organized on gray metallic shelves, a cheery "you found me!" may be heard from one of the adjoining rooms.

It's here in this basement office that Katey Walker, extension specialist in family resources and public policy, began her position on March 5.

Walker received her bachelor's degree in general home economics as well as her master's and doctoral degrees in economics from the University of California in Davis, Calif. Prior to her arrival at K-State, she worked in the extension service at the University of Florida.

Talking with her, one gets the feeling that she has had a lot of practice at living optimistically, and the ability to transform a basement storage area into an office is a mere sample of Walker's talent to make molehills out of mountains.

"The rest of the extension home economics department is up on second floor, but when I came there wasn't any office space up there," Walker explained. "This used to be a storage area here, so when I came they just moved it out and made room for me."

For Walker, work began toward her graduate degrees as a single mother with four daughters ages 3, 4, 6 and 8. Her daughters, Sharon, Karen, Lauren and Dauren, Walker said, are "all grown up now." Her youngest graduated with a degree in computer science from Florida State University last December.

"They figured it was all right for me to leave now," Walker said.

She said she returned to school in 1965 following her divorce, and after an absence from academia for 13 years. At the time she returned, she said she wasn't sure what she wanted to do.

"I knew going home to mother's was not the answer," Walker said. "I thought I would go to school and get myself up-to-date in the academic world and explore what career options there were."

Walker said she accomplished the task of getting more education, "very, very slowly." She said it took her about nine years to get her doctorate, beginning with some basic courses.

"I often tell the story that the reason why I got into the economics profession is because I was looking for classes held between the hours of 10 (a.m.) to 3 (p.m.)," Walker said.

By taking two courses a semester during those hours, she said she was home to see her children off to school and home again when they returned.

She said she was luckier than most single women because she had adequate child support. She also worked part time as a reader (grading tests) and a research assistant.

The economics department at the University of California had instituted a "Ph.D. only" program Walker said, so she was able to work toward her doctoral degree before formerly completing her master's program. She was able to design her own program which enabled her to study the subjects she was most interested in.

She said that the Davis community was geared toward teaching and attending classes, so her daughters did not think her attending classes was out of the ordinary. Her daughters even had friends whose parents either taught or attended classes at the university.

But, Walker said, even though women were not uncommon on campus, mothers going to school full time were somewhat unusual. She said she did not feel alone, though, because her professors, friends and fellow classmates were all supportive.

When she was in a class which had a group homework project, she said the rest of the group members would come over to her house so that she wouldn't need a baby sitter.

When she did need a baby sitter, a former roommate from Walker's undergraduate days, also with four children, looked after her daughters. To her, it was like family, she said.

The problems of raising a family, Walker said, did not escape her. Having sick children is one of the biggest problems single parents face, she said.

"Every now and then I had to miss something," Walker said.

But the personal and professional rewards of her nine-year effort were well worth it, she said.

"Having a Ph.D. opened up a whole world of university teaching, either undergraduate students or adult education," Walker said.

Walker said she was an avid practitioner of time management while in school. Besides using a weekly schedule of chores for the girls, she was up at 5 every morning to study.

"That was a quiet time and I could get a lot more done then," Walker said. "Of course, that won't work for people that are night-owl types."

She said it is a question of determining when one is most productive.

Another time-management technique which Walker advises all parents to practice when attending school is to set aside time for study and time for family activities. For Walker this meant she could combine a lifetime love for 4-H with time for her daughters by being a 4-H leader. She also advises students with children to "take it slow."

"It's a question of getting started," Walker said. "If I'd known in the beginning how long it was going to take, I probably would never have started," Walker said. "It's a good thing that you can't look into the future and tell these things sometimes."

Her job will take her visiting, teaching and counseling through county extension offices throughout Kansas. Extension work is primarily an informal adult education network which works through the extension agent in each county. The extension network also sponsors the 4-H program for young people.

Walker said she believes that within her new position there is a need to focus on public policy education. This would consist of helping people study issues that concern individuals and families and often require some kind of community or group decisions. Walker should know.

Department expands computer hardware

The computer science department will have 56 new computers and computer terminals for students by this fall.

Virgil Wallentine, head of the computer science department, said the department has always been low on the number of computers for students. Although he does not believe this directly affects their grades, he said it restricts how well they are prepared and the quality of their education.

SOS band highlights Fort Riley concert

By LISA FORD
Collegian Reporter

Making its last stop in America, the SOS band, best known for its platinum single, "Take Your Time (Do It Right)," provided entertainment at a free concert for Fort Riley servicemen and their dependents Thursday.

The eight-member band was the featured act for the 1984 KOOL Super Nights world tour, sponsored by Brown and Williamson Tobacco Corporation, manufacturer of KOOL cigarettes. SOS has already completed performances at 22 military bases in Panama and the United States, and left for Europe Friday to complete a tour of 40 military bases in Germany, Korea, Okinawa and Guam.

Also performing at the concert was the group One Way, featuring Al Hudson, who has appeared with SOS at 20 stateside bases.

"The KOOL Super Nights Tour has been a dream of ours for four years," Bob Miller, program manager, said. "The response of the military community has been positive and enthusiastic. We're personally pleased to be bringing top professional entertainment to some very dedicated servicemembers both here at home and overseas."

According to Abdul-Ra'ooof, lead vocalist and trumpet player, and Lloyd Oby, trombone and keyboard player, SOS will be doing all the scheduled KOOL concerts.

"In fact, we're getting ready to go to Europe tomorrow (July 6)," Ra'ooof said. "It'll be us and First Choice, a female group. We're going to Germany, Guam and Korea; we're actually going to England tomorrow."

The band was contacted to do the KOOL concert two years ago, and according to Ra'ooof, SOS and the KOOL organization have had an ongoing relationship since 1982. In 1982, SOS was contacted through a booking agent who set up a strictly military tour for them with KOOL throughout the states. In 1983, SOS participated in the KOOL City Jam,

Social Security system harms young people

Social Security's fate is again in the news. According to Saturday's Kansas City Times, President Reagan said in an interview aired Friday in San Antonio, Texas, "there is a 'probability' that 'many people, young people, now paying in' to Social Security 'will never be able to receive as much as they're paying' in benefits when they retire."

Although Reagan does not have an answer to the problem, he reiterates that he will not cut funds to Social Security beneficiaries. He also made the claim that Social Security will remain strong for another 20 years.

Current benefactors are entitled to the years of putting money into the system. But something needs to be done now to solve the financial problems of the program, not 20 years from now, if what Reagan said was true. The administration is simply pushing the problem onto the backs of future policy makers.

For the youth entering the workforce, the idea of paying into a fund that will never give the same return is preposterous at best. Money going into Social Security could be used by individuals to make investments that would bring a greater return.

There is no doubt that the Democrats will bring up the Social Security issue this election year. Reagan will either need to find a solution to the problem or talk his way around it.

Reagan should either find more funds for Social Security or abolish the program; the later would be the more favorable of the two alternatives.

According to statistics, by 2030, there will be two people paying into Social Security for every one person drawing on the account, if the program remains on its current track. That is also assuming the program survives until 2030.

The time is now to solve the Social Security issue. Every working American is affected by it. The program cannot survive for long on its current course.

The mistakes of yesterday are being perpetuated today in the form of Social Security. Young Americans entering the work force shouldn't be forced to pay into a system that will never give a return on their money.

The program should be phased out so that it will not adversely affect current benefactors and others nearing retirement. The government should stop collecting money for Social Security and instead should encourage people to set up individual retirement funds.

Fight against overpopulation needs support

One of the world's most pressing problems is the issue of growing population and its control. As the 20th century nears its end, world population has grown at a staggering rate — bringing with it the increased problems of feeding and housing the masses.

Yet the Reagan administration, in another shocking snub of humanitarian programs, is considering the halt of United States' contributions to any international population control plan that involves or encourages, in any way, the use of abortion.

With America's contributions to population control programs, according to estimates, world population will more than double within the next 66 years — from 4.6 billion people to an incredible 10.3 billion in 2050 — following current trends. The only variable leading to the eventual end of this increase will be the gradual exhaustion of the earth's resources.

Without the complete help of the world's richest country, world population may spin into an uncontrollable spiraling increase. In the past 20 years, America has been the leader of population control efforts. Due in part to this United States leadership, fertility rates have slowed 15 percent to 45 percent in many overcrowded Third World nations.

Overpopulated and impoverished countries, without this American aid, may be unequipped to handle the control of their own birth rates.

Obviously, world population control is in dire need of some kind of aid from the United States. Whether abortion should be used as a tool to control population is not the main issue in the Reagan plan to end aid. What is important is that the United States should not hurt the effort to control population by imposing a policy so inflexible as to severely damage any growth limitation programs.

Demo running mate fight could be a laugher

CHANUTE — Wally Mondale needs your help.

Wally needs someone to run on the Democratic ticket with him as vice president. Boy, he has been busy.

He's been interviewing a lot of people. He's interviewed men and women. He's interviewed WASPs and minorities. He's interviewed governors, senators and representatives. He's brought a lot of people to Minnesota to explain why they want to be the Democratic nominee for vice president.

It has been interesting, to say the least, to watch Mondale and the candidates parade by the media's cameras, smiling and exchanging gifts, glances and laughs. Wally's had fun interviewing these people. What else can explain why he's still smiling while he's conducting the interviews?

Wally is in a tough position. He must find a candidate to please everyone. Labor wants a union man; businessmen want a friend who can see their point of view. The Democratic Party wants unity without having a "yes" man (or woman). The most important thing wanted by all Democrats is a Mondale-Candidate X ticket which can draw votes away from the Reagan-Bush ticket.

Who will be able to fill the ticket? Who is "Candidate X"?

Does Gary Hart fill the bill? Could the Rev. Jesse Jackson draw the needed votes to upset the Republicans? Will women flock to the polls to vote for Rep. Geraldine Ferraro, D-N.Y., or San Francisco Mayor Dianne Feinstein? Does Sen. Lloyd Bentsen, D-Texas, have the right stuff? Does Dale Bumpers?

I think Mondale needs someone who can draw conservative votes away from the GOP. He needs someone who can please everyone all the time, someone who is loved and respected by millions around the world.

Wally Mondale needs Rich Little on the ticket.

I can hear the moans all ready. Yes, I am serious. Rich Little could be the key ingredient in a Democratic victory in November.

Think about it for a minute. Who hates Rich Little? He is, in my opinion, the best comedian and impressionist alive. He is able to make people laugh, cry and think within a five-minute performance.

Most politicians would give anything to have the talents Rich possesses.

Rich could please everybody. Liberals can look to Rich for his fireside chats, styled after Jimmy Carter's. Conservatives can feast on his moving speeches, a la Ronald Reagan. Moderates can chuckle as Rich stumbles through a state dinner, via Gerald Ford.

Rich could be a valuable asset for foreign relations. When the Russians threaten the country, he can use his John Wayne impersonation and tell the Russians what they can do with their SS-20s. For a lighter touch, Rich could allow Henry Kissinger to negotiate a treaty with his calm, soothing manner.

Rich's Carol Channing and Pearl Bailey impersonations can show that the Democrats want to bring more women and minorities into the upper echelons of government.

Rich can throw state dinners and provide his own entertainment. An all-star cast, including Johnny Carson, Groucho Marx, W.C. Fields, Humphrey Bogart, Red Skelton and Jimmy Stewart, can entertain the guests for hours.

If this sounds like "Send in the Clowns," you're right. What could be more fitting for the 1984 campaign than having a professional comedian run with Mondale against a professional actor and George Bush, author of the term "voodoo economics"?

The campaign would be a laugher, to say the least.

Letters

Headline contradicts facts

Editor,

I enjoyed the article on the events at the NAACP convention underway in Kansas City. The headline, however, might be called inflammatory and misleading. Does "Doles make defense for racist attacks" mean: A. "Doles defend administration racism" or B. "Doles counter attacks on racism"? The headline you chose incorrectly suggests more A than B.

McEnroe whips Connors, nets 3rd title

By The Associated Press

WIMBLEDON, England — John McEnroe vowed to let his racket do the talking, and the message came through loud and clear.

McEnroe crushed Jimmy Connors 6-1, 6-1, 6-2 Sunday to capture the men's singles at the Wimbledon tennis championships for the third time, including the last two. It was the first time since Don Budge won in 1937-38 that an American had won the men's singles in consecutive years.

"I just feel thankful I played one of the greatest matches I've ever played," McEnroe said. "I decided to let my tennis do my talking, and hopefully that's what people are talking about."

So crushing and thorough was McEnroe's thrashing of Connors, a two-time Wimbledon champion who was seeded third this year, that the brash, talented New Yorker needed only 80 minutes to complete the rout — four minutes less than it took Martina Navratilova to down Chris Evert Lloyd 7-6, 6-2 for the women's singles title on Saturday.

Also on Sunday, John Lloyd of Britain and Wendy Turnbull of Australia teamed up to defeat Americans Steve Denton and Kathy Jordan 6-3, 6-3 and successfully defend their mixed doubles title.

With McEnroe and Peter Fleming winning the men's doubles — 6-2, 5-7, 6-2, 3-6, 6-3 over Australian's Pat Cash and Paul McNamee — and Navratilova and Pam Shriver taking the women's doubles — 6-3, 6-4 over fellow Americans Jordan and Anne Smith — it was the first time in Wimbledon history that the top seeds won all five major championships.

On Sunday, the hallowed grass courts of the All-England Lawn Tennis and Croquet Club saw one of the finest exhibitions of the sport ever. McEnroe was brilliant, losing only 11 points on his own serve in 11 service games.

Roaming the court with grace and quickness, he unleashed his remarkable repertoire — passing shots from both the forehand and backhand, drop shots, topspin lobs, drive volleys and a few that defied explanation.

Whatever Connors tried, McEnroe had not only the answer, but the winning answer. His game was as hot as the weather as the two fought under a broiling sun and court-side temperatures at 102 degrees.

"All week long I've been seeing the ball as big as a basketball," Connors said, "but today I couldn't find it."

"It was just one of those days. He played well and I didn't quite get started, and hence the result."

McEnroe had the most one-sided victory in the Wimbledon men's singles final since Budge crushed Henry Austin 6-1, 6-0, 6-3 in 1938.

"I felt really good when I went out there, and right away I was serving well," McEnroe said. "I was able to hit a variety of serves, slicing it wide and popping it in the middle. I was able to mix it up a lot and I really overpowered him, which does not happen too often."

McEnroe, whose game is tied to his serving, hit 72 percent of his first serves, and that was pulled down drastically by the third set. He was over 80 percent in the first two sets.

The final was a rematch of the 1982 title battle, which Connors won.

But Sunday was McEnroe's finest hour.

And while his racket was speaking loudly match after match, the man the British press dubbed "Super Brat" and "Mac the Mouth" kept his temper and his mouth in check.

"I could have disputed a lot of calls, but I decided to let my tennis do the talking, and hopefully it did," he said. "I think all the constant talking about my behavior when I came over here seven weeks ago was unfortunate and unfair. I just came here to try and be the best tennis player I can be, and, hopefully, the people will see that."

He dominated Connors from the opening serve. When Connors won the coin toss, he elected to receive — Connors being known as having one of the game's best returns of service.

But on this day, it didn't work. McEnroe's service, not the hardest in the game, had perfect placement and spins.

He opened the match with a love game, then broke Connors at 15, demonstrating early the variety of his shots.

When he held at 15, closing out the game with an ace, he had a 3-0 lead and the rout was on.

McEnroe broke Connors again in the sixth game and closed out the opening set in 21 minutes when he held service at 30.

In the second set, McEnroe cruised to a 4-0 advantage, breaking Connors' service in the first and third games. But it was in the fourth game of that set that showed McEnroe's serve at its best.

The 25-year-old left-hander from New York opened with an ace, his fourth of the match, took the second point on a backhand volley off the return of service, then closed out the game with two more aces.

McEnroe began the third set in the same manner he had rolled through the first two, holding his service at love.

And when Connors did win a point, the crowd roared its approval. When he won the second game, he almost received a standing ovation.

The two continued to hold serve until the sixth game when, at game point, Connors double-faulted to defend. McEnroe then rifled a forehand service return cross-court that Connors could only watch.

On the next serve, Connors netted the service return, which was deep and right at his feet.

That gave McEnroe the break he needed, and he closed out the match by holding serve at 15, then breaking Connors at love in the eighth game.

In all, he slammed 10 aces and numerous service winners. And he had extremely few unforced errors.

It was, for McEnroe, almost perfect tennis.

McEnroe said he wanted this year's Wimbledon title for his mother, but he refused to say why.

"I dedicated it to her — she knows why," he said.

Black tosses three-hitter as Royals defeat Orioles

By The Associated Press

BALTIMORE — Bud Black recovered quickly from his worst outing of the season and the proper amount of rest may have been a factor.

After being shelled for nine hits and seven runs in one inning-plus by Cleveland in his previous outing last Tuesday when he worked with only three days' rest, Black hurled a three-hitter Sunday and pitched the Kansas City Royals to a 6-1 victory over the Baltimore Orioles as Don Slaught hit a three-run homer.

"My stuff was basically the same," Black said, comparing Sunday's performance with that against Cleveland. "I just made better pitches with better location."

Slaught tripled and scored Kansas City's first run on a wild pitch by loser Dennis Martinez, 2-5, while third baseman George Brett, who made two outstanding fielding plays, singled home the Royals' second run. Kansas City wrapped it up with four runs in the ninth off Tippy Martinez.

Black allowed only one baserunner on a walk before Cal Ripken Jr. hit his 14th homer with one out in the fourth. He then retired seven batters in a row before Floyd Rayford singled in the sixth. Black walked one and struck out eight.

Brett made a fine short-hop pickup of Gary Roenicke's sharp grounder in the second inning and threw out Rayford in the fourth after making a diving stop to his left. Ripken followed with his first home run since June 16.

Slaught tripled in the Kansas City second when right fielder Mike Young turned the wrong way on his slicing, wind-blown drive. Slaught scored the game's first run on a wild pitch. Pat Sheridan singled in the Royals' third, stole second and scored on a single by Brett, one of five hits off Dennis Martinez during his 7 1/3-inning stint.

In the Royals' ninth, Hal McRae singled off Tippy Martinez and moved up on a wild pitch. After Steve Balboni was intentionally walked, Slaught hit his first home run of the year to make it 5-1. One out later, U.L. Washington hit his first homer of the season.

League's season strange at break

Well, the 1984 baseball season has reached its halfway point as the All-Star break approaches. What have baseball fans learned so far this season? Let's make a list.

First, a team was crowned the team of the century only to fall back to the level of the mere mortal baseball clubs. Second, teams that didn't have a prayer starting out the year can compete with the rest of the big boys. Third, a division can be so bad that a team five games under .500 can still be in the thick of things halfway through the year. Fourth, there really is baseball in San Diego.

Let's move to lesson No. 1 so far in the 1984 season. The Detroit Tigers earned the exalted position of The Best in Baseball after a torrid start which saw them winning 35 of their first 40 games. Flashy numbers, for sure, but perhaps baseball watchers were a bit premature in crowning the Tigers ahead of the, say, 1927 Yankees.

Yes, the Tigers have fallen back to earth. Following a lofty start, Detroit has played only .500 ball, going 21-21 since that time. While that still puts the Tigers playing "only" .683 baseball, still far and away baseball's best record, it sounds more mortal than playing in the .800s.

Still, the Tigers with Lou Whitaker, Chet Lemon, Jack Morris and Lance Parrish, all American League All-Stars, along with Dan Petry and Alan Trammell, still look mighty tough in the Eastern Division. Still, Toronto sits only 6 1/2 games out of first, despite Detroit's heroics.

Lesson two — there really is life after mediocrity. Well, at least for the Chicago Cubs and New York Mets. Who'd have thought the Cubbies and Mets would be battling for first come July in the National League East? Between the two clubs, the Mets and Cubs have held first place in the East for 82 of the season's 97 days. It's been enough to send fans in Chicago and New York (and elsewhere) into hysteria.

But let us not forget, Cub fans, that this is the same team that has fallen apart in the second-half of most seasons since the Chicago Fire. It's become something of a tradition to watch the Cubs swoon — like Groundhog's Day, the Cubbies always see their shadow and retreat to the safety of the second division.

Although the Mets have a brighter past than the Cubs, it's still to early to dig out the Amazon' Mets banners. Although led by young stars Dwight Gooden and Darryl Strawberry, July and August are when the pennant races heat up and the Mets will likely fade under the pressure. Look for the Phillies, Expos and Cardinals to be in front in September.

Lesson three at the mid-point of the '84 season is that the American League Western Division should be declared a disaster area. Only three teams — Minnesota, Chicago and California — sit barely above .500, and Texas, with a horrible 37-48 mark, stands only 6 1/2 games behind first place.

Kansas City started off slow and haven't been over .500 since April 20 but has come on lately to come within 3 games of first. The Royals have been bolstered by the hot bats of Steve Balboni, going into the All-Star break with 15 home runs, Pat Sheridan and Darryl Motley. If the Royals' young pitchers can come around soon, Kansas City may stay in the thick of things in the West, which is more than many expected from the rebuilding club.

Finally, the Padres have brought real baseball to the city of San Diego. With the arrival of the Goose, Rich Gossage, from the Yankees, the superb play of Tony Gwynn, hitting a red-hot .351, the Padres have held the lead in the NL Western Division for the past month. It's no fluke that San Diego stands 4 1/2 games ahead of Atlanta.

With their performance, the Padres for the first time truly have a pennant contender, something San Diego has waited for for a long time.

It's been a strange season so far in 1984. Losers have become winners and winners, such as the Yankees and the Milwaukee Brewers, have become big losers. But for those fans whose teams sit toward the bottom of the standings, as well as those fans riding high with winning clubs, remember, it's only July. Or as Yogi Berra would say, "the season ain't over 'til it's over."

AL looks for repeat as All-Star game resumes

By The Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — Joe Altobelli is returning to Candlestick Park a lot happier than he left it. He'll be wearing a World Series championship ring for baseball's 55th All-Star Game Tuesday night.

The Baltimore Orioles' manager, who will be in charge of the American League team, hasn't been to Candlestick since late in the 1979 season when he was fired by the San Francisco Giants. The National League club gave Altobelli his first managing job in the big leagues in 1977.

"Common sense-wise, my first job as a major league manager was a tremendous experience. ...I have no ill feelings," Altobelli said as he prepared to leave the Orioles, now third in the AL East, and assume his All-Star duties.

The American League broke an embarrassing 11-year losing streak in last summer's All-Star game, pounding out a 13-3 victory. The 1984 squad includes seasoned All-Star performers George Brett, Jim Rice, Reggie Jackson, Rod Carew, Eddie Murray and Dave Winfield, along with younger stars like Cal Ripken Jr. and Mike Boddicker.

The National League club managed by Paul Owens of the Philadelphia Phillies has a hitting attack featuring veterans Dale Murphy, Mike Schmidt and Gary Carter and youngsters Tony Gwynn, Darryl Strawberry and Ryne Sandberg.

The pitching talent includes 19-year-old Dwight Gooden, the New York Mets' strikeout ace who is the youngest player ever selected for an All-Star game. Altobelli's staff includes 45-year-old Phil Niekro of the New York Yankees.

Most of Altobelli's managerial training came in the Orioles' farm system, and he returned to the Baltimore organization on Nov. 12, 1982 after Earl Weaver's retirement as manager. The Orioles beat the Phillies in the World Series last fall.

Tuesday night's attraction will be the second All-Star game at Candlestick. The first was in 1961, when the stadium was just a year old.

Last year's 13-3 score at Chicago's Comiskey Park was one of the most one-sided in All-Star game history.

Michael thrills crowd at Jackson concert

By NANCY MALIR
Contributing Writer

It was worth 30 bucks. To see Michael Jackson perform his renowned moon walk, display his sequin-gloved hand, and shift animatedly to "Beat It's" rhythms are experiences a price tag can't be pinned on. The man is incredible. He's gorgeous, he's sophisticated, he's a stage presence no one can ever hope to compete with — including his brothers.

Review

He moves in a realm beyond the intellectual grasp of the world's majority and lives a reality incapable of being comprehended by the masses.

At 25, he's a multi-billion-dollar superstar with a following of worshippers that Walter Mondale and Jerry Falwell can only fantasize about.

The price of the ticket has nothing to do with being in the presence of la roi Jackson at the debut concert of his Victory Tour at the moment when he's the undisputed king of pop, the wizard of dance and the idol of millions.

Jackson was spectacular from the moment he rose out of the stage with his brothers until he departed it amid a glitzy array of fireworks.

The show opened at dusk in a stadium filled with atypical concert goers — no longhairs or bikers here. The four-pack ticket issuing procedure was apparent in the groups' sizes: Mom and Dad and the two kids, two couples, four guys.

Women in Anne Klein dresses and men in coats and ties were not uncommon. Obnoxious behavior and the smell of pot was.

At approximately 9:45 p.m., five large fuzzy creatures stomped onto the stage from the right, while lasers in half a dozen pastels shot across the stage and the stadium. From the left appeared five knights who attempted to pull the sword from the stone in the tradition of the legend of Excalibur. And when the one succeeded, the sword was immediately exaggerated by a flash of laser light and streaks of green and red laser beams.

Then it happened. What critics and fans alike had been waiting for for months.

The Jacksons emerged from an opening in the stage floor to the depthless rumbling of the narrator's "Arise and behold the kingdom."

The five remained stationary briefly, then, in a gesture that must have made the sound technician a nervous wreck lest he not perform perfectly, the Jacksons slowly and deliberately descended the platform in simultaneous rhythm as the sound of their steps boomed via special effects around the stadium.

They stopped for another moment — confident, sure and poised — before breaking into "Wanna Be Startin' Something."

And so it continued for a little under an hour and a half. Through song and dance, costume changes and light and stage theatrics, the high the Jacksons created at the outset never diminished.

The climax of the show came when Michael, after escaping from the lighted clutches of some unseen monster in another extravagant display of theatrical ingenuity, literally exploded from a black cylinder that had risen from stage left. He jumped from the platform to the opening lines of what will probably be his all-time theme song "Beat It."

Jermaine Jackson played a set of his own numbers about midway through the concert. Though well-received, he came nowhere near creating the frenzy brother Michael did throughout the multi-million-dollar technical and music extravaganza that will be the talk of the entertainment industry and the envy of other performers for years to come.

It was worth 30 bucks to see Michael Jackson sing and move. It was worth 30 bucks to see his brothers perform unblemished background music and synopated dance rhythms. It was worth 30 bucks to see such an unequalled theatrical staging of lights, sound and special effects. I'd pay $50 to see it again.

Sakharov's wife to be tried, London newspaper reports

By The Associated Press

LONDON — Yelena Bonner, wife of Soviet dissident Andrei Sakharov, is to be put on trial for "anti-Soviet behavior," The Sunday Express of London reported.

The newspaper, citing unidentified "informed sources in Moscow," said preliminary proceedings already had begun against Bonner in Gorky, 240 miles east of Moscow, where Sakharov has been in internal exile for 4½ years.

The Sunday Express said Bonner is accused of keeping in touch with Western journalists during her husband's exile to keep his cause alive. The Express did not spell out what article of the Soviet criminal code would be used to try Bonner.

On May 6, Irina Kristi, a friend of Bonner's, told The Associated Press that Bonner had told her she was being investigated under an article of the Soviet criminal code that prohibits "anti-Soviet slander and agitation."

The Sunday Express said that "the new crackdown on the Sakharovs, if it goes ahead, will signal a brutal Russian snub for the West's hopes of cooperation between the superpowers."

Sakharov, a renowned nuclear physicist and winner of the 1975 Nobel Peace Prize, has been barred from contact with the West since he was banished to Gorky, a city closed to foreigners, in January 1980.

a concert performed for the cities, not military bases. That worked well, according to Ra'ooof.

"We get basically the same response from the military bases as we do from the cities," Ra'ooof said. "This (the military base) is primarily a family environment. It's good because it gives the families a chance to come out and enjoy. The service people can also really appreciate getting this kind of entertainment. It's not every day that they're going to get entertainment like this, so naturally we get good receptions from concerts like this."

Oby said that his concert location preferences are Dallas, Houston or Los Angeles.

"I like the Southeast and the West Coast," Oby said. "I personally like that crowd better for some reason."

New York is a challenge because of the different crowd encountered there, where as here, everybody's a lot more loose. Everyone acts more like themselves here, and it's more of a family situation."

The original SOS band has been together for seven years, Ra'ooof said. There are basically three lead vocalists, although everyone in the band sings.

"I'm one of the basically new members," Oby said. "I got the gig with SOS through a recording session in which the keyboard player was producing a number of artists. I play the keyboard, by the way."

The KOOL tour, which will be completed Aug. 1 in Guam, has been entertaining the military each year since 1981.

tion in the classroom, but without the proper equipment, a quality education cannot be expected," Wallentine said. "For those who learn better by doing, this lack of access hurts."

Of the 56 new computers and terminals, 20 terminals — which are attached to the mainframe in Cardwell Hall — will be placed in Fairchild Hall for the beginning programming classes adding to the already existing terminals in Seaton, Durland and Cardwell halls.

Twelve personal computers will be put in the basement of Fairchild for computer literacy classes which will be new to K-State this fall.

Twenty-four personal computers will be put elsewhere in Fairchild in special labs for undergraduate computer science students "who need dedicated machines," Wallentine said.

Even if there was ample computer time for all students to program at their leisure, computer students are limited to that time, he added.

Without this system, Wallentine believes that much computer time would be wasted.

"This encourages good solid design, which develops good discipline," he said.

With the additions to the computer science department this fall the total number of computer terminals will be increased by one-third.

The most important aspect of this, Wallentine said, is that the old key-punch apparatus will be gone.

Wallentine said there has been constant complaining by students in previous years about the lack of computers.

"If a week goes by without it (complaining), it would be a surprise. There will still be complaining this fall," he said.

Wallentine said the department will still be 30 to 40 personal computers short at that time.

"We are so much better off now than last year, it is hard to think in those terms. But there still won't be enough," he said.

Tom Gallagher, director of the computing center, said the problem with lack of computer facilities is being worked on constantly.

"It is the money (from student fees and state funding) that we need," Gallagher said.

Reagan administration reverses decision on auto restraint systems

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Reagan administration, reversing course from its position 2½ years ago, has decided to order air bags or automatic seat belts phased into new cars over the next six years, administration sources said Tuesday night.

But the order, to be announced Wednesday, would relieve the automakers of having to put in the devices if the manufacturer can show a car is able to meet certain government crash protection standards without passenger restraints.

General Motors Corp., for example, has been developing interior designs on some model cars that it claims could meet government crash protection requirements without passenger restraints.

The proposal, according to the sources, also calls for continued campaigns to persuade states to pass mandatory seat belt use laws with the provision that the federal requirement for passive restraints be made void if a high enough percentage of states approve such laws.

Transportation Secretary Elizabeth Dole is said to favor the air bag over the passive belt and the rule is expected to include some incentives for automakers who agree to the air bag option. It was not clear Tuesday night what kind of incentives would be offered.

The sources, speaking on the condition that they not be identified, said that the new regulation — the latest in 15 years of debate on the passive restraint issue — will require all manufacturers to require passive restraints in at least some of their cars beginning with the 1987 models and in all cars within three to four years after that unless they can meet crash protection standards otherwise.

The decision, probably the most controversial one made by Dole, represents a reversal from the administration's position 2½ years ago when the department rescinded regulations that would have required automatic restraints in some cars beginning with 1982 models.

The Supreme Court said the government acted illegally in scrapping the requirement and ordered that the issue be given another look.

Advocates on both sides of the issue have hinted that no matter what decision was made, it probably would be challenged in court. One department source said Dole attempted to reach a middle ground in an issue that dates back to 1969.

FTC allows Kansas oil refinery to stay open

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Attorney General Robert Stephan best summed up the reaction of state officials to news Tuesday the Federal Trade Commission had voted to allow Texaco Oil Company to maintain and operate the Getty Oil Refinery in El Dorado when he said "I'm ecstatic."

Stephan and other state officials breathed a collective sigh of relief as Texaco officials agreed to operate the plant near Wichita in south-central Kansas for at least three years. The decision ensures some 1,000 jobs associated with the refinery — the largest in Kansas — will not be lost in Texaco's $10.1 billion merger with Getty Oil Company.

"I still believe in justice," Stephan said when he learned of the FTC decision. "I am absolutely ecstatic about this. I'm just thrilled."

And Gov. John Carlin said the FTC reversal of its position on the refinery proved the federal government doesn't always know what's best for the states.

"This is proof that occasionally state officials need to unite and do something for the good of the state," Carlin said of the team effort which rescued the Getty refinery. "It just shows the federal government needs to be reminded that its actions aren't always in the best interests of particular states."

Stephan, Carlin and the Kansas congressional delegation, led by U.S. Sen. Bob Dole, scrambled to save the El Dorado plant from being cut adrift by Texaco, the third largest oil company in the nation.

Stephan actively protested the proposed merger and filed a lawsuit seeking to block the merger of the two big oil companies if nothing was done to assure the continued operation of the El Dorado refinery.

Stephan said he wanted to read the FTC's full decree and consult with members of the El Dorado task force and members of the Kansas congressional delegation first, but from what he understood today about the ruling there should be no reason to continue his lawsuit.

"I want to hold that in abeyance until I read the decree and consult with everyone involved," the attorney general said. "But if all is as it sounds, there is no reason to pursue the litigation to try to stop the merger."

"I would look forward to Texaco becoming a model Kansas citizen. There's no way to guarantee the existence of that refinery forever, but this gives us a step up."

"It's an affirmative as far as I'm concerned and is a plus for the state. It's a good refinery and I'm sure it's got an existence for many years."

Dole and U.S. Sen. Nancy Landon Kassebaum, both R-Kan., also reacted happily at the FTC decision.

"This is good news indeed for El Dorado and the surrounding communities that have a very real stake in the plant," Dole said in a news release from his Topeka office. "My staff and I have worked closely with the FTC, the oil companies, civic leaders and the rest of the Kansas delegation to see a solid resolution of this potential economic blow."

On Tuesday, the trade commission modified its original position regarding the fate of the El Dorado facility. In giving tentative approval to the merger in February, the FTC had said Texaco must divest itself of the refinery and the pipeline serving it.

In addition, the merger agreement called for Texaco to sell 575 Getty service stations in Missouri and Kansas, and an additional 175 Getty stations in the Kansas City area.

The commission was trying to avoid certain antitrust problems created by the merger. The Clayton Antitrust Act prohibits the acquisition of all or part of a corporation if such an acquisition might substantially lessen competition or create a monopoly.

Dole said the key to the FTC decision came last month when Texaco agreed to operate the refinery for at least three years. Dole obtained the commitment from John McKinley, chairman of the board of Texaco, after a meeting between the two.

"After our meeting, I was confident Texaco sincerely wanted to become a member of the community," Dole said. "I am equally confident that the community will now rally around Texaco. This support has already been expressed to the Federal Trade Commission in the form of thousands of coupons and letters."

The commission decision to permit Texaco to keep the El Dorado refinery came on a 4-1 vote. The consent agreement gives Texaco the option of selling either the Wyco Pipeline serving Denver or the El Dorado refinery, the Chase Pipeline and related distribution and marketing assets.

However, Texaco officials contacted Tuesday by Sen. Kassebaum, said they would divest the Wyco Pipeline and continue to operate the El Dorado facility.

"This is good news for the people of El Dorado and all of those who depend upon the refinery for employment and security and for refined petroleum products," Sen. Kassebaum said in a news release from her Topeka office. "By revising its order to allow Texaco to keep the refinery, the FTC has reassured El Dorado, oil producers and consumers that it acts in the public's best interests."

U.S. Rep. Bob Whittaker, R-Kan., also applauded the decision.

"This is particularly helpful for the people of Butler County," Whittaker said.

Sen. Kassebaum said it became clear during discussions of the merger that finding a buyer who would maintain the facilities as an ongoing refinery would be difficult, due to the critical need for a supply of crude oil. Industry analysts predicted that only a major, integrated oil company would be able to operate the refinery economically and profitably.

Mail distribution policy changes mean more work for University

By STEVE ONKEN
Collegian Reporter

Mail call has become a little more hectic due to a policy change concerning the distribution of campus mail.

Mail sent to K-State will no longer be sorted by departments, only by building, and any address lacking the building's name will be sent to Anderson Hall for University Facilities employees to sort and distribute.

According to Evelyn Hupe, from the administrative offices at University Facilities, the change was put into effect July 2 by the Manhattan Postal Service.

"We are just in a 'make do' situation right now," Hupe said. "According to Marvin Roth, postmaster for the Manhattan Post Office, the problems began when one building became locations for several departments. This increased the sorting the post office was required to do, and often that the name of the building was completely left off the address, including only the department name."

"Postal regulations require that we send the mail to the campus, the department or the building. We are not really changing our delivery procedures. But we are changing the separation of the mail within the buildings to the departments," Roth said.

Before the July 2 policy change, when the Manhattan Post Office received mail for the University, it was separated by buildings and then by departments in the building before delivery. When the address did not include the name of the building or the department name, it was sent to Anderson Hall for University Facilities to sort and distribute.

"Currently, we are updating our methods in handling the campus mail situation. It may not be felt right at this time, but in the future, with computerized techniques, we hope to be able to sort all of the mail by the departments again," Roth said.

In a January meeting, Dan Beatty, vice president for business affairs, informed University faculty, staff and students, to use the building names for correspondence.

But mail was still came in without building names. Although the post office was still able to separate the mail by departments and get the mail to the buildings, it became increasingly more difficult to do, Roth said.

Also, Roth found that much of the departmental stationery did not include the building name on the letterhead.

Hupe said that about 60 percent of the mail that comes to the campus does not include a building name. That mail will arrive at its destination, but might take a little more time to get there, she said.

"In dealing with this new policy change, one of the things we didn't realize is how much mail we receive at the University that was not identified with a building name. I really can't believe how careless writers are about addressing mail," Hupe said.

Currently, Hupe said that through a combined effort with the campus mail carriers and the campus postal services, the mail that is not addressed by buildings is being sorted and delivered. On occasion, she said, they have not got some of the mail out until 5 p.m. Furthermore, since the mail load in the summer is less than during the school year, Hupe said University Facilities may hire some part-time student help until there is a better adjustment of the new policy.

"It is important that people sending mail from the University tell people who write to the University to include the name of the building in the address. It will help in the long run to speed up the process of the mail service," Hupe said.

Roth said time notice for the change was an unfortunate mistake in warning University staff of the upcoming change. He said that he notified University officials toward the end of May telling them of the proposed change on July 2. He said this date was selected because the middle of the summer is the slowest time for the University mail.

"But the word was not passed throughout the University by the in-house publication (In-View) until around June 22, wasting three weeks that could have been used in preparing for the change in policy," Roth said.

"I didn't mean to cause a turmoil. We are currently working with the University on this matter and we will try to solve the situation," Roth said.

Bus depot opens in new location, provides smoother traffic patterns

By LISA WILSON
Collegian Reporter

A new Union Bus Depot is tentatively scheduled to open Friday at the site of the former Skyview Drive-in, 720 Rosencutter Road.

According to Mikki Reagor, owner, the depot is moving from 212 S. Fourth St. because bus companies want the depot to be located closer to the highway and away from the immediate downtown areas.

"It takes too much time (for buses to get to the highway from the depot) and there is too much congestion," Reagor said. "The move is good timing with the new mail going in."

The new location allows for better accessibility for buses arriving and departing Manhattan than the old bus depot, Reagor said.

"The new bus depot will serve as a central location...more accessible to Westloop Shopping Center, residential area and closer to the community," Reagor said. "We will be able to serve the city better."

John Clayton, senior in English and depot employee, said another reason for the move is to get away from drunken men who frequently loiter at the depot.

"We will certainly be happy to get out of this part of town because down here we have a collection of drunks and loafers. They smell and offend other people, get sick in the restrooms and beg for money," Clayton said. "Due to the summer weather, they (drunken men) don't have to go home. They just drink until they pass out, wake up and drink some more."

Reagor anticipates only one problem with the new location.

"There are no sidewalks," Reagor said. "They (students and other customers) would have to ride their bikes on the highway to get to the station."

Reagor said she is in hopes that the city will see the need for sidewalks and have them paved.

"In the evening it will be dangerous (for walking or riding bikes)," Clayton said. "People tend to drive like they are in the Indianapolis (racetrack)."

Glen Puett, president and general manager of the Bell Taxi Service, said because of the new location he anticipates a greater demand for the taxi service and additional cars may be needed.

"I am sorry to hear about it (bus depot) being in such an out-of-the-way place for a lot of people," Puett said. "I will do my best to absolutely have someone there waiting at night for the late buses."

Reagor said they have not publicized the move because the building completion date has been unstable due to poor weather. But the delay in publicity may be advantageous.

"We will be able to get moved in and settled before the students come back in the fall," Reagor said.

Reagor said she will probably publicize the move in September to make people aware of the new location.

The old bus depot building was built in 1946. The building has gradually deteriorated because there has been no renovation, Reagor said.

The total cost for the new building is $64,100. The building is expected to be 24,278 square feet in total land area, including 3,920 square feet floor space under a masonry frame.

"Sizewise the station will be about the same, but the way it is designed will be more efficient," Reagor said.

Reagor said they plan to have a canopy hang over the south end of the building where passengers board the bus.

Plans for the north side of the building include a separate area with 18 free parking spaces for customers.

"The two specific areas for people to enter the station and load on the bus will make it less complicated," Reagor said.

Reagor is anticipating lower utility bills with the new building.

"The upkeep will be easier in dealing with utilities," Reagor said. "The new air conditioner and furnace are designed and developed to be more efficient and cost less to run."

Reagor said the new building cost will not affect ticket prices because those prices are determined on a national level, and all services and hours should remain the same.

Clayton, who received the Touchstone award for poetry from the English department last spring, said the drunken men and loafers have been an inspiration to his poetry and the relocation leaves him with "bittersweet feelings."

"They can survive in a world that does not accept them," Clayton said. "My job has taught me to identify myself with those people...they are life and life is precious."

"I consider them family when they are sober," Clayton said. "They are just people like you and me."

Clayton said he anticipates a lack of inspiration from the new location because "...normal people are too ordinary."

Professor writes text to aid rookie writers

By ROB COE
Collegian Reporter

Donald C. Stewart, professor of English, is about to complete work on his new book tentatively titled, "The Versatile Writer" — a textbook for freshman composition writers.

Stewart, who has his bachelor's and master's degrees in English from the University of Kansas, and a doctorate in the same field from the University of Wisconsin, said he believed now is the time for a more progressive attitude toward writing.

"Good writing is writing adapted to its context. I try and tell kids you'll be writing in a lot of different contexts. I try and give them tools to handle those situations. I use a lot of the ideas in my book in my own classroom and the students seem to like it," he said.

Stewart wrote another book about writing which is titled "The Authentic Voice."

"It was commercially unsuccessful, but professionally successful," he said.

Stewart's new book will be more wide-reaching than his last. "It ('The Versatile Writer') will be a more comprehensive book. It covers a broader scope," he said.

Stewart, who labels himself as "the spokesman for fresher ideas," believes that most English composition textbooks have been dominated by 19th century ideas.

"In the last 20 years there has been an effect to the change the form of writing," he said.

Stewart has found it difficult on more than one occasion to find time to work on his latest book. He has worked on it for five years.

"I was very heavily involved as an officer in the CCCC — the Conference of College Composition and Communication — as an assistant chair, chair and now as immediate past chair," he said.

The completion of Stewart's book was also delayed when a new editor took over in the publishing company that is handling "The Versatile Writer."

So far, Stewart said the reviews concerning his second book have been favorable. When asked what he would do if the book becomes a commercial success, he replied, "If I got lucky and make a lot of money, I'd probably give it away."

Most of the work Stewart does now involves either the production or marketing aspects of the book.

Stewart doesn't think that future K-State students will be taught from "The Versatile Writer."

"If it were used at this school I would have no voice in that decision," he said.

Stewart predicts the book will become available to the public sometime around the summer of 1985. The manuscript began at 750 pages in length, but has been reduced to 500.

Officials dispute extent of damage

Ammunition blasts cripple Soviet fleet

By The Associated Press

LONDON — Explosions at a major Soviet ammunition depot crippled the fighting capacity of the Soviet Union's northern fleet and killed at least 200 navy personnel, Jane's Defense Weekly reported Tuesday.

The authoritative publication said the fleet would not be "a viable force for the next six months" because it lost two-thirds of its surface-to-air and ship-to-ship missiles in the May 13 explosions.

The blasts occurred at the Severomorsk base on the Kola Peninsula, about 60 miles from Norway. The peninsula is the site of depots, shipyards and base facilities supporting the northern fleet.

"The destruction represents the greatest disaster to occur in the Soviet navy since World War II," said Jane's. "It is conservatively estimated that it will be two years before the facility is fully operational again."

The Soviets have said nothing about the explosions, which were spotted by U.S. spy satellites and seismological facilities. Jane's spokesman Richard Coltart said the independent publication's information came from Western naval sources with access to intelligence material.

NATO naval sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said the report was "substantially correct." But some defense specialists and U.S. intelligence sources disagreed.

Maj. Bob Elliott of the London-based International Institute of Strategic Studies remarked: "Since it is the northern fleet involved, we have no doubt that every available piece of ordnance has been combed out of the system and has already been used to make up the losses."

He added: "An operational fleet of that nature would be given top priority. The losses were a setback, but it would have been more important if the northern fleet spent a lot of time at sea in confrontation with NATO."

In Washington, U.S. intelligence sources said there were no reliable estimates of casualties in the blasts. The sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said Soviet ships carry missiles and other ammunition, ensuring that the fleet would remain a formidable operating force.

The northern fleet, headquartered in Murmansk, is the most powerful fleet in the Soviet navy. It is believed to have an aircraft carrier, 148 cruisers, destroyers and other warships with 190 of the Soviets' 371 submarines, all carrying their full missile armament.

In wartime, it would be responsible for pushing into the Atlantic Ocean to attack NATO's supply line and launch assaults on Norway.

Jane's said the May 13 explosions apparently were triggered by "too many munitions...stored too close together" and that an initial explosion touched off "sympathetic detonations around the whole complex."

Western intelligence sources have ruled out sabotage and believe the most likely cause for the explosions was "carelessness," the publication said.

Committee picks top school programs

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Only 13 programs, out of 60 applications, on Tuesday were recommended for designation as Programs of Educational Excellence to the state Board of Education.

A committee of Department of Education staffers picked out the top 13 programs, in four categories, which it believes should be named as excellent and used as examples for other school districts around the state.

The Shawnee Mission School District scored the highest in the search for outstanding education programs, with three programs selected in the four categories.

Both Wichita and Topeka schools were cited in two categories each and programs in Manhattan, Newton, Garden City, Olathe, Blue Valley-Stanley and Tecumseh rounded out the field with one nomination each.

All of the state's 304 school districts were invited to apply for the excellent designation in the categories of library-media, mathematics, reading and science.

Four programs in both library-media and science were judged by the search committee to be excellent, while three in reading and two in mathematics were found to meet standards of excellence.

Here is a list of the classification and the programs nominated for commendation as excellent:

Library-media — Highland Park High School Library, Topeka; Shawnee Heights Library-media Program K-12, Tecumseh; Summer Reading Program, Shawnee Mission; Author Program, Shawnee Mission.

Science — Newton Elementary Science Program; Shawnee Mission Elementary Science Program; Environmental Education K-12, Topeka; Wichita Energy Education K-12.

Reading — The Procedure for Reviewing, Revising and Implementing Reading Curriculum, Blue Valley Elementary Program, Stanley; Gertrude Walker School Reading Program, Garden City; Reading in the Content Areas, Manhattan High School.

Mathematics — Olathe Elementary School Mathematics Program;

Wichita Elementary Mathematics Program.

The 10-member state board received the report Tuesday at its monthly meeting and it is expected to act on the recommendation at a later date, possibly Wednesday as it wraps up its July work.

The search committees read and discussed each application for the excellence designation and made visits to selected programs before making their recommendations.

In other work Tuesday, the board decided to research the issue of home schooling and take a position on the controversial subject and make a recommendation to the Legislature for possible bill introduction to the 1985 session.

The board also ran through a list of possible legislative recommendations and decided it would not ask for a bill to prevent anyone with a conviction for sexual offenses to be certified as a teacher in Kansas.

Instead, the board decided to handle it internally, through rules and regulations.

In addition, the board said it supported the idea of summer remedial programs in reading and mathematics, with funding from the state, as was considered by the 1984 Legislature. And the board liked the idea of a summer program for "high achieving students" in the areas of math and science.

The program, called an academy, would be aimed at spurring gifted students interested in the subjects and challenging them with college-type courses.

It also supported a proposal that 3 and 4-year-old special education students be included in the state's equalization act.

All topics will be covered at later meetings and possibly included in the list of recommendations finalized late in the year for submission to the 1985 Legislature.

Health officials stress seatbelts to increase safety

By KATHIE CORMACI
Collegian Reporter

Thousands of lives are lost each year in traffic accidents, and the K-State Health and Safety Department offers a suggestion to reduce the number of deaths: wear seat belts.

"We lose 50,000 people a year to traffic accidents and people don't even blink an eye. Seat belts can reduce these serious injuries by 70 percent," said Michael Bradshaw, K-State health and safety director. "It's just a matter of time before Kansas has a mandatory seat belt law."

On June 26 a law was passed making New York the first state to require drivers and front-seat passengers to buckle up. Children under 10 years of age must buckle up in any seat or be in special safety seats. Violation of the law means a fine of up to $50 plus court costs. Supporters say the law could save 400 lives a year in New York.

Other states are considering similar laws. The Illinois House has cleared seat belt legislation that is expected to go to the Senate. Michigan's Senate has approved a measure that is now in a House committee. Delaware's seat belt law is before its Senate.

Currently, the only seat belt law in effect in Kansas is the child restraint law.

"They (the Kansas Legislature) have amended the law and it went into effect July 1. The law states that children 4 years of age and under, while in the front seat, must be properly restrained in an approved restraining device. Violators face a $10 fine plus court costs," Bradshaw said.

Information pamphlets for the public available from the University Cooperative Extension Service, state that each year approximately 700 children under the age of 5 are killed in automobile accidents. These deaths may be avoided if parents would practice the precaution of buckling their children into a proper child safety seat, according to the pamphlets.

Some communities have programs from which people can rent an infant or child safety seat for a short period of time, instead of buying one. In other programs the outgrown safety seat can be recycled and rented for another young child to use.

The American Seat Belt Council gives answers and advice to questions and myths about seat belt safety. According to council statistics, approximately 14,000 to 18,000 lives could be saved annually if all passenger car occupants used safety belts at all times.

The National Highway Traffic Safety Administration estimates that safety belts reduce the chances of serious or fatal injury by 50 percent to 65 percent.

According to administration officials, it isn't enough to wear a safety belt only on long trips and expressways. Statistics show that over 80 percent of crashes occur at speeds under 40 mph. Approximately 70 percent of all accidents occur within 25 miles of home.

Both lap and shoulder safety belts are essential, according to administration officials. A lap belt is designed to protect a person from serious injury, while a shoulder belt is designed to keep the head and chest from striking the steering wheel, dashboard and/or windshield.

Administration officials recommend that people use both belts to help offer the best possible protection in the event of a collision.

Being thrown in an accident is not always safer than being left in the car, according to officials. It involves being thrown through the windshield or out the door. Once outside, additional dangers can be encountered. The safest place in the event of a crash, therefore, is inside the vehicle protected by a fastened safety belt.

A fastened safety belt doesn't delay attempt to escape from a submerged or burning car, administration officials said. In such situations, a person's first concern is to stay conscious, so that he can escape.

A fastened safety belt will greatly minimize or eliminate potential injuries so that the person is capable of escaping, administration officials said.

Since Kansas does not have a mandatory seat belt law, public awareness programs have been set up.

"It is pressure from the local level and the will of the people that brings on a law. Unfortunately, in a right to defend their freedom some people may inadvertently be giving it up," said Beverly Peaslee, department of transportation agent.

The University Extension of Home Economics has a three-year grant with the Department of Transportation to promote seat belt safety in the state.

"Our effort is a grassroots program about the importance of safety belts," Bradshaw said.

Kansas is combatting deaths from traffic accidents through a federally funded safety belt project called "Get It Together Kansas." The project represents a joint effort among county, state and federal government agencies to increase safety belt awareness and use at the grassroots level.

University Cooperative Extension Service operates statewide with a large network of volunteers such as clubs, media, businesses and the community.

According to the "Safety Belt Fact Book" put out by the U.S. Department of Transportation, "(People) take a tremendous risk every time they get into an automobile, unless they are also taking action to protect themselves."

Cocaine carries 'positive' image, connotes money, glamor, power

By LISA FORD and SHELLY GRINNELL
Collegian Reporters

The scene is a dimly lit bar. A young man makes his way through the crowd to a fairly open area. He stands there, listening to the band, but doesn't really seem to be focusing his full attention on it. His eyes are carefully scanning the area, hoping that soon someone will notice the tightly-rolled bill tucked behind his ear.

There are many who'll notice the bill, but won't know its reason for being there; then there are others who'll know exactly why the bill is there — it is a method used frequently to let certain people know that there is an interest to either buy or sell cocaine.

During the last 20 years, cocaine has become a popular drug, associated with the rich, glamorous and successful. Part of this popularity may be attributed to the star personalities who have been linked with it. Kansas City Royals outfielder, Willie Wilson, and actor/comedian, Richard Pryor, both made news when their mishaps with cocaine came to the public's attention.

Cocaine is one drug that usually carries a "positive" rather than "negative" image to it, according to John Uhlarik, professor of psychology, who teaches courses about drugs and behavior.

"The cocaine user feels in control," Uhlarik said. "There is an increase in personal power and energy. It's nature's way of telling people that they have too much money."

The extraction of cocaine comes from the coca plant that grows wild, predominately in South America. Growing to heights of 12 to 18 feet, the coca's productive life is usually around 50 years.

Cocaine is extracted from the leaves of the plant and is then crushed into powder form. Heating and cooling procedures follow, along with the addition of different substances and chemical additives. Finally, various solutions are added to solidify the liquid and it is then chilled. Sediment collects at the bottom, while the top layer contains "natural cocaine."

Ingested cocaine is the least toxic of the numerous ways to absorb cocaine into the body's system, while "free-basing" is the most potent. Free-basing is the transferring of cocaine into vapor form, which is then inhaled. It is instantly absorbed in the blood stream.

"Free-basing it, or smoking it, could get you messed up," John (not his real name) said. "If you snort it, it's better and safer."

According to John, free-basing is when ammonia is added to the cocaine, which is then heated up. The cocaine comes out in bulb form and this bulb is put into a pipe and smoked. The crystal-like particles from inside the bulb get into the person's lungs and will stick there, which is very hard on the lungs.

Uhlarik said users who absorb cocaine by nasal inhalation will also face physical problems. Tissues in the nasal passageway may become irritated, which can lead to ulcers in the nose. Sometimes a sore that doesn't heal, or a "cocaine window," will form.

Cocaine may also lead to more dangerous effects, including death. Lethal doses vary from person to person, depending on weight, age and health.

The most noticeable physical affect of cocaine is on the central nervous system, according to Joel Phillips and Ronald Wynnes in their book, "Cocaine: The Mystique and the Reality." The first attack is on the cortex of the brain.

Phillips and Wynnes also wrote that the cocaine craze became popular in the United States during the early 1980s. Cocaine was an ingredient in many tonics, medicines and carbonated drinks. The new stimulant was very likable and prevalent until the public began noticing negative results. It wasn't until 1931 that all of the existing states had laws restricting the sale of cocaine.

"Chronic repetitive use of cocaine results in a desired use to function normally," Uhlarik said. "In some cases cocaine is not addictive, while it may be just psychologically addictive in others. It is most addictive in the free-base, inhaling form."

The recent wide use of cocaine and other drugs may be attributed to the advent of the 1970s, when there was a cultural evolution toward illegal substances, according to Uhlarik.

People usually turn to the use of cocaine from peer pressure or because they have a desire to belong to a group. Many times alcohol is used to counteract the cocaine; this may lead to alcoholism.

"Alcohol and cocaine compliment each other," David, an ex-cocaine addict and staff member of a cocaine hotline, said. "Cocaine is a stimulant and alcohol acts as a depressant to bring a person down."

The cost of cocaine seems to be related to location, availability and potency.

The average price range for one gram of cocaine is about $110 to $120 in Manhattan or Kansas City, according to John. A cheaper grade can usually be purchased for about $90.

"In California the price could be hiked up to $150 or more," John said. "A friend of mine used to spend $350 to $400 a gram for the stuff, though. It more or less depends on how hooked you are on it (cocaine)."

Lt. James Tubach, investigator for the K-State Police, believes that there is no cocaine problem on campus.

"If there is a problem, we haven't been informed of it," Tubach said. "We've never had a cocaine arrest on campus as of yet."

For a person arrested on a cocaine charge, sentencing is based on whether the person charged is a first-time offender, if he/she is a dealer or supplier and if the quantities of cocaine obtained are substantial, Tubach said.

"Cocaine arrests are not treated differently than other controlled substances," Tubach said. "First, the person is taken to the county attorney's office, where he decides if charges will be pressed. If the person is charged with a crime, the case then goes through the Riley County court system."

According to a recent Newsweek magazine article on cocaine abuse, government surveys have shown that there has been a 600 percent increase in people who sought help from cocaine abuse between 1976 and 1981. These people were treated by publicly funded programs.

The cost of treatment for an average of 28 days is several thousand dollars, according to Marian Moore, substance abuse counselor at the Pawnee Mental Health Services.

"Usually there is some type of motivation for people to come in (for help)," Moore said. "Things like legal or family problems are usually good motivators. It doesn't usually happen with an abuse problem. Someone has to bring the problem to the individual's attention."

When dealing with an abuse problem, Moore said the counselors usually try to assess what the problem is. The treatment is whatever is feasible for the addict as an individual. If there is a physical dependency on the drug, the individual is sent to other various facilities in the area, such as St. Joseph's in Concordia, St. John's in Salina or Valley Hope in Atchison.

Moore also suggests Narcotics Anonymous, which meets in Manhattan at no cost to the individual, or Narca-non, which is an organization that holds meetings in Topeka. It meets primarily with the families of addicts and helps them to better cope with the problems they will eventually face.

"Many times family members help to perpetuate (the habit) the individual (has) without actually knowing it," Moore said. "They protect the individual, not intentionally, and try to ignore that there is a problem."

According to Greg Buell, a psychologist at the Wichita State University Mental Health Services, to his knowledge there has not been even one case of cocaine abuse reported.

"My hunch is that those persons (with a cocaine problem) would be showing up in other offices besides this one," Buell said. "If a case should occur, we would go ahead and address the problem no matter how serious. They would probably be referred later to the Alcohol and Drug Resources Center or to Parallax, a program which consists of a structured three- to six-month in-patient stay."

Buell also said that treatment would depend greatly on the individual and the substance being used or abused. It would also depend a great deal on the resources available to the individual and how supportive the family is.

For cocaine users seeking assistance in combating cocaine abuse, 1-800-Cocaine is a toll-free number for a cocaine hotline. The hotline also acts as a referral service to treatment centers nearest the cocaine abuser. The staff at the cocaine hotline consists of former cocaine addicts.

Some cocaine abusers come to the realization that their use of cocaine was not as beneficial as they had wished.

"I just realized that it wasn't worth it," Joe, an former cocaine user, said. "The cost and effect weren't worth the price. Also, I saw friends go down the tube because of it."

Cocaine is expensive, both physically and financially. At $2,250 an ounce, approximately 28 grams, it's more valuable than gold, which is currently priced $346 an ounce.

Wheat crop may be 4th largest

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Kansas' 1984 wheat crop was estimated at 418 million bushels by the state Crop and Livestock Reporting Service Tuesday, which would give the state its fourth largest crop on record if realized.

Based on the condition of the crop as of July 1, with the harvest about half completed, the service projected an average of 38 bushels per acre will be taken from 11 million acres being harvested. The crop now is about 80 percent harvested.

The total yield of the '84 crop was pegged 18.5 million bushels, or 4.6 percent, higher than a month earlier — when the estimate of 399.5 million bushels was based on the June 1 condition of the crop.

At that time, the service estimated that 11.1 million acres would be cut and the average yield per acre would be 36 bushels.

The record crop in the world's leading wheat producing state was 462 million bushels in 1982. The second biggest crop was 448.2 million bushels in 1983 and the third best crop on record was 420 million bushels in 1980.

The actual yield from the 1984 crop will be calculated by the Crop and Livestock Reporting Service in its next report on Aug. 10. At that time, the service also will estimate this year's state corn, sorghum and soybean crops, which are planted in the spring. The wheat crop was planted last fall.

The average yield expected from the wheat crop ranged from a low of 36.4 bushels per acre in the south-central district — the state's biggest producer of total bushels — to 41 per acre in the north-central district.

In between those extremes, the northwest, central and east-central districts all are expected to average 37 bushels, the west-central and northeast both 38 and the southeast and southwest both 39.

Bob Vossen, agricultural statistician with the reporting service, said the per-acre yields were raised since the June estimate in just about all the regions because moisture had improved and temperatures had not been unusually hot during the past month.

The 1984 crop made rapid strides after a slow start in late winter and early spring.

The crop was rated good to excellent during the spring in all regions except the west-central and northwest, and even those districts came in better than expected once the good weather set in.

Mondale defends campaign tactics despite criticism from competitors

By The Associated Press

Walter F. Mondale defended his search for a vice presidential running mate Tuesday as "exactly right," while the Rev. Jesse Jackson lambasted the process again and Sen. Gary Hart said, "I don't quit," and hinted at a selection process of his own.

With Hart vowing again to stay in the Democratic race and President Reagan campaigning for environmental support, Tuesday provided little of the harmony that Mondale wants the week before the Democratic National Convention that is sure to nominate him.

Jackson said Mondale was bowing to pressure from the Jewish community in not interviewing him for the running mate's slot.

Sen. Dale Bumpers of Arkansas, a never-interviewed but often-mentioned candidate for the Mondale ticket, said he notified Mondale that he did not wish to be considered.

Hart unveiled the beginning of his own list of possible running mates, including Mondale and former Texas Rep. Barbara Jordan on it. He said it would be "nonsense" to nominate a woman merely to seek political advantage, adding that he would consider several women for the slot.

With many Democratic leaders wondering if Mondale might name Hart to his ticket, Mondale said of Hart, "I like him, I think he likes me." In an ABC-TV interview, he added, "Gary Hart and I have real differences and I think those differences ought to be admitted. He's a person who feels strongly about his views; so do I. That doesn't diminish either of us."

His aides also announced a "homecoming reception" at Elmore, Minn., on Friday before Mondale flies to Lake Tahoe, Calif., for the weekend.

Despite criticism from some Democrats that his process of selecting a running mate has damaged him politically, Mondale said, "I'm doing exactly right and I'm going to be in a far better position to pick the best nominee."

Jackson met with aides in Washington, but in an interview with the Los Angeles Times, he said Mondale isn't seriously interested in a black running mate, offering as proof that he himself had not been interviewed.

Mondale has interviewed two blacks during his search for a running mate, Los Angeles Mayor Tom Bradley and Philadelphia Mayor Wilson Goode.

One of the reasons for Mondale's decision to ignore him, Jackson said, "is that threats to Mondale by a significant number of Jewish leaders are very evident."

This raises an issue — the division between some black and Jewish groups — that could damage the Democrat's presidential chances.

Jackson said there was a "struggle by Jewish leaders to make me a pariah." Many Jews regard Jackson with suspicion since he met and embraced Palestinian Liberation Organization Leader Yasser Arafat several years ago. Jackson's widely known description of New York as "hymietown" and his association with Black Muslim Minister Louis Farrakhan — who has disparaged Judaism in public speeches — also have damaged Jackson's relations with Jews.

Jackson said in a statement late Tuesday that he met Monday with Judy Goldsmith, president of the National Organization for Women, and Kathy Wilson, president of the National Women's Political Caucus. He said they "came away committed to pursuing a mutual beneficial strategy for the rainbow coalition and their organizations, including women of all races."

In the Times interview, Jackson also criticized "white women," particularly NOW, for what he called purloining one of the main issues of his campaign, the suggestion that a woman should be selected vice presidential nominee. He said that NOW made the question of a female vice presidential candidate a "litmus test" issue at its convention, "and did not even invite me to come there."

Hart traveled to Atlanta on Tuesday and insisted that he retains hopes of beating Mondale, saying, "I am in the race to stay. My name will be placed in nomination and I don't quit."

States should resolve death penalty conflict

The United States judicial system is guilty of inflicting cruel and unusual punishment. The problem is on death row. Last year 252 people were sentenced to death — five were executed. This year nine inmates have been executed. Prisoners remain on death row for long periods of time because of the lengthy appeals process. These prisoners exist in a limbo — unable to plan a future or make good use of the time remaining. When people face death, due to an illness or death sentence, they go through a number of stages. These include denial, a "why me" stage and, finally, acceptance. Because the appeals process drags on, inmates are unable to reach the acceptance stage and deal with their fate. Instead they die slowly — afraid to hope or to lose all hope. The agonizing appeals process is a harsher punishment than the penalty itself. The long appeals process can, in part, be attributed to disagreement about sentencing criminals to die. Capital punishment is a subject which draw strong reactions both for and against. Laws are made by politicians who must compromise to avoid alienating voters on either side of the issue. This debate has led many legislators to compromise on a death penalty with an extensive series of appeals. States should make an effort to resolve this conflict. The appeals process can be shortened. Reducing the number of appeals allowed and making appeals cases a top priority, to move through the court system more quickly, are possible ways to do this. Or the death penalty can be abolished. The death penalty currently does not deter criminals because they know they are unlikely to be executed, but not knowing is a cruel form of punishment for those on death row. The states have made death penalty laws a political game, but there is no winner.

Soviet snub opens door to Chinese relations

Reports from Peking this week indicate that China and the Soviet Union are experiencing a cooling in relations. After two years of efforts to improve dialogue, Chinese officials reported Monday that no progress had been made between the two countries and expressed doubt that any would be made in the near future. With this report, another incident of the Soviet government retreating from world relations has surfaced. Stunned by unstable leadership that has seen three government changes so far in this decade, the Soviets seem clearly unsure of their path in foreign relations. In shunning Chinese efforts to improve relations, the Soviets have made a serious miscalculation in world affairs. China boasts the world's most populous country, full of untapped resources capable of utilization with proper technology. Since the death of Mao Tse-tung, Chinese society had made an effort to catch up to advance made in 20th century life by Western countries, and in turn has established itself firmly as a world power. Yet the Soviets, by canceling a scheduled state visit Ivan Arkhipov, a first deputy premier, less than 24 hours before his assumed arrival, have turned their back on the Chinese. A visit from the highest-ranking Soviet official in 15 years would have been a great catalyst toward improved relations between the two powers, but instead, the cancellation has snuffed out any attempt of improved Sino-Soviet cooperation. With the Soviet rift freshly reopened, the United States should continue its attempts to open contacts with China. A certain sourness has characterized Sino-Soviet relations since the early 1960s, and after an apparent upswing in dialogue during the past two years, Chinese officials stated Monday that relations with the Soviets probably will never be anything but adversarial. President Reagan's spring visit to China may have been nothing more than a glorified attempt to gain political exposure to some, but his trip may, in any event, have done what the Soviets failed to do — open the pathway to better relations. Improved American relations with China would be an asset to both countries. Increased trade between the two countries would be a plus for both economies and would be improve world peace. The Soviet mishap may have improved conditions for better relations between the two superpowers. In the midst of an election year, it can only be hoped this Soviet-created golden opportunity does not slip through American hands. Tim Filby, editorial page editor

Tobacco merits same handling as other drugs

Last spring, the Union Governing Board considered a proposal to ban the sale of cigarettes in the Union. After hearing that smoking is the number one cause of preventable death in the country and that the Union has a responsibility to protect the health of students, the UGB unfortunately allowed the motion to die because of the lack of a second. It appears that the UGB has completely bought the cigarette industry's alibi when it comes to selling cigarettes. When the industry is pressed to the wall, it simply says that the cigarette companies are providing a service to a particular group of people — smokers. The UGB version of this line is to say something like, "Well, if we don't sell cigarettes to smokers, someone else will." But that misses the point completely. The real question is whether it is ethical for the Union to continue to sell this dangerous commodity. Under the same logic, wouldn't the Union be justified in selling handguns, which kill 23,000 Americans a year. At least some handguns kill accidentally; cigarettes take their toll every time one lights up. Or why not sell alcohol at the Union, too? Both are drugs, both can be addictive, both are legal, both are certainly in demand, and both kill thousands of people each year. What makes tobacco a better killer than booze? To sell cigarettes and not alcohol is a hypocritical double standard. The UGB says it is simply providing a "customer service." I think it is more aptly termed a "funeral service." The members of the UGB are simply underestimating the symbolic impact of their decision. By selling tobacco, they are tacitly supporting its use. If they were to discontinue this policy, some individuals might begin to realize the dangerous nature of their habit. By banning the sale of this drug, the Union would be helping to create a climate in which it is easier for smokers to stop. I'm not saying that such a move would be a savior, but it would at least be a signal. But without question, the most ill-founded, repugnant argument of all is that smokers do so out of free choice. This is simply preposterous. As Eric Eckholm, researcher at Worldwatch Institute, observed, "...the individual's decision to smoke does not take place in an ideal world of free, informed choice. Personal behavior is heavily influenced by the political and social environment, and from infancy onward, people are bombarded constantly with subtle enticements to smoke. Powerful advertisements associate cigarettes with liberation and sexual success." Other factors that inhibit a smoker's "free choice" include the fact that tobacco additives, especially nicotine, are addictive. "Research indicates that cigarette smoking is a dependence process; the most widespread example of drug dependence in this country," says Dr. William Pollin. A smoker can hardly be considered to have free choice, because once he or she starts, it becomes very difficult to quit. Freedom of choice would require both ends of the equation to be equal — freedom to smoke and freedom to stop. Clearly, they are not. Just think about it logically. Why would anyone freely choose to smoke if he knew that it was really slow-motion suicide? Furthermore, it is ironic that the No. 1 cause of death in America is also the No. 1 advertiser. And according to journalist R.C. Smith, the effect of these ads not only entice many people into smoking, but they also tend to silence the editors of the magazines in which they are published. The American Council on Science and Health reported in 1982 that Cosmopolitan magazine, which gets 10 percent of its revenue from cigarette advertising, published just eight articles on smoking from 1971 to 1981. During that same period, it published 155 articles on dieting. It even refused to run an ad for a national chain of anti-smoking clinics. Obviously, Cosmopolitan thinks it is OK if women die of lung cancer, as long as they die thin. This paucity of reporting on the health effects of smoking is no accident. Those "who write health articles for these magazines have been told repeatedly by editors to stay away from the subject of tobacco," the ACSH study revealed. The major magazines which do frequently run articles on smoking and health, including Science Digest, Science, The New Yorker and The Washington Monthly, all have one thing in common — none accept tobacco advertisements. These cigarette advertisements not only mesmerize magazine and newspaper editors, they also tends to create misleading images in consumers' minds. John Banzhaf, of National Public Radio, commented that, "They (the tobacco companies) have been found by the Federal Trade Commission to engage in unfair and deceptive trade practices. They have even been found guilty of lying to Congress." Apparently honesty is the best policy, but it doesn't sell cigarettes. Even Timothy Morris, Ronald Reagan's chief consumer protector in the FTC, concluded that, "...the cigarette market has failed to provide essential information to the cigarette consumer — a failure that has limited the consumer's freedom to make a fully informed choice." So much for "free choice." True freedom operates best when we set up safeguards against the destructive nature of those who really don't care about freedom, but advocate freedom so they can exploit it. And to exploit freedom in order to simply make higher profits is perhaps the most insipid part of all. Our University, and particularly the Union, have a special obligation to protect its primary customers, the students. Only 60 percent of high school seniors have reported believing that there is a great risk in smoking one or more packs of cigarettes per day. Unfortunately, this sort of misconception is rarely challenged at K-State, since we have no real anti-smoking campaign. So the final question becomes a matter of whether we are willing to continue as silent accomplices in this crime, or begin dismantling this monstrous process of misinformation. As Emerson Foote of the American Cancer Society once said, "...we must keep in mind that the cigarette industry produces not only cigarettes; it has another product — the annual production of 250,000 dead bodies."

Jackson receives lift from janitor

DALLAS — An airline maintenance manager gave superstar Michael Jackson a ride to his hotel after the singer's limousine failed to meet his family's jet. "I really can't understand why people get excited," Robert King, 47, maintenance manager for Dallas-based Muse Air, said later. Jackson and his brothers arrived at Love Field aboard their private Boeing 707 jet about 2 p.m. Monday. The word went out that the Jacksons needed a ride and King's Ford van was recruited. "They were looking anywhere for a ride," King said. "They needed some help and I was there, so I helped." King said he loaded five people, including Jackson and his mother, into his van and whisked them to the Loews Anatole. "They didn't talk very much," King said. "In fact the only thing they were doing was complaining about how hot it was in Texas."

Feminist relates to rape victims

LOS ANGELES — Feminist lawyer Gloria Allred, who has grabbed headlines as a crusader for equality, says her support of rape victims stems partly from the fact that she was raped and had an illegal abortion. "That's one of the reasons I can listen to women. I can believe what they say," Allred, 42, said in a telephone interview Monday. She said although she had previously admitted having the abortion many years ago, she had not even told her husband, Bill Allred, that it was because of a rape at gunpoint that occurred when she was on vacation in Acapulco. She didn't tell Mexican authorities, she said, because she felt no one would believe her since the rapist was a Mexican physician. But she decided after much thought to publicize the incident in an interview published in Monday's Los Angeles Times. "Now that it's out, at least those women will know they have a friend in court...one person who will believe them," she said.

Prince considers self 'a recluse'

LONDON — Prince Andrew says that despite his boisterous and well-documented social life he considers himself "something of a recluse." In an interview aired on the British Broadcasting Corp. television network Tuesday, the younger brother of Prince Charles said he discovered this trait in himself through his photography, which he said seeks out themes of loneliness. The 24-year-old prince, a naval officer and Queen Elizabeth II's second son, said he liked the sea because of its "appeal of getting away. There is no telephone, mail is infrequent, and there are no newspapers, which is a great advantage." The British press portrays Andrew as a man with numerous amorous entanglements and sometimes calls him "the playboy prince," contrasting him with the staid image of his older brother.

Hurlers set strikeout mark as Nationals post 3-1 win

By The Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — Six straight strikeouts by Fernando Valenzuela and Dwight Gooden broke the 50-year-old record of Carl Hubbell and led the National League to a 3-1 victory over the American League Tuesday night in the 55th All-Star Game.

The performance by Valenzuela and Gooden highlighted the greatest strikeout duel in All-Star history. Rickey Henderson of Oakland went down looking at a curveball from Rich Gossage of San Diego for the final out and 21st strikeout of the game, breaking the record for a nine-inning contest of 20 set in 1968.

Valenzuela struck out the side in the fourth inning, and Gooden, at 19 the youngest player to appear in an All-Star Game, fanned all three in the fifth.

In 1934, in baseball's second All-Star Game, Hubbell, a screwballer, fanned five consecutive batters — Babe Ruth, Lou Gehrig, Jimmy Foxx, Al Simmons and Joe Cronin, all future Hall of Famers. Hubbell, who set his record 50 years ago to the day, threw out the ceremonial first pitch.

Protecting a 2-1 lead, Valenzuela of the Los Angeles Dodgers, a screwballer himself, felled Dave Winfield of the New York Yankees on a 2-2 pitch, took out Reggie Jackson of California on an 0-2 count and got George Brett looking at a 1-2 pitch.

Gooden, a hard-throwing rookie right-hander from the New York Mets, set down Lance Parrish of Detroit, Chet Lemon of the Tigers and pinch-hitter Alvin Davis of Seattle, another rookie, all swinging at 2-2 pitches.

Lou Whitaker of the Tigers broke the spell against Gooden when he grounded out to the pitcher to lead off the sixth inning.

Gary Carter of the Montreal

Expos gave the Nationals a 2-1 lead in the second inning with his third All-Star homer. Carter was Most Valuable Player of the 1981 All-Star contest when he homered twice.

In 1983, the American League broke an 11-game losing streak using power as Fred Lynn hit the first grand slam homer in All-Star history for a 13-3 victory.

Dale Murphy of the Atlanta Braves accounted for the final margin with an eighth-inning home run, his first in All-Star competition.

The National League, which leads the series 35-19-1 overall and has won 20 of the past 22 games, got back on the winning side with pitching and the help of some shoddy defense by the Americans, who committed two first-inning errors leading to a run.

The only other time the All-Star Game was played here, the Nationals won 5-4 in 10 innings despite near gale force winds that caused a record seven errors, five by the winners.

With some wind, but not enough to explain away the miscues, the AL let the Nationals get started in the first inning on errors by right fielder Reggie Jackson, who had not appeared in the field this season while being the designated hitter for the Angels, and Parrish.

With two out, Steve Garvey of the San Diego Padres singled to right off Toronto's Dave Stieb, the AL starter for the second straight season, and Garvey went to second when the ball short-hopped Jackson and bounded off his leg.

Murphy then singled between third and shortstop, with left fielder Winfield charging. Winfield fired a one-hop strike to the plate, the throw easily beating Garvey, but Parrish couldn't hang onto the ball.

K-State professor flips for gymnastics

The gymnast flips backward into the air, gliding with precision movements until he lands in an erect, upright position on the mat below him.

This gymnast could be a world-famous Kurt Thomas or an upcoming 1984 Olympic competitor. Or it could have been Louis Fina 22 years ago.

Fina, professor of biology at K-State, came to the University in 1964 carrying more than his doctoral credentials behind him. The native Cleveland man brought a long list of accomplishments from the world of gymnastics, too.

That list included three state championships in the rings, horizontal bar and vault while attending East Technical High School; the national AAU title in rings competition while attending the University of Illinois; and the honor of being one of eight competitors to qualify for the 1940 Olympics. The Olympics were cancelled that year because of World War II.

Perhaps Fina's most celebrated accomplishment was his recent induction into the Greater Cleveland Sports Hall of Fame on June 22. Fina, who was one of only two men and two women gymnasts inducted, had his name submitted for the honor about two years ago and admits he almost forgot about it until receiving his notice of induction this spring.

"I was both excited and pleased," Fina said of the induction. "It was probably as exciting to me as when I earned my doctorate."

It was an excitement to perhaps make up for the frustration of not being able to compete in the 1940 Olympics.

"Make no mistake, I was disappointed (by not being able to compete in the Olympics)," said Fina, who comes from an athletic group of brothers, including one who also was an Olympic qualifier, "but not as disappointed as the people were in 1980 when the U.S. boycotted Moscow."

"I wasn't crushed. I thought, 'What the heck, that's the way it goes.' I took it as a matter of fact because I knew in the spring of '39 that the chances of an Olympics were very dismal."

Not being able to participate in the Olympics didn't stop Fina from representing Illinois in collegiate competition, taking the Big Ten championship in the rings and vault and placing second in NCAA all-around competition in 1938-42. Fina collected approximately 75 medals in college competition, including about 25 which were gold.

The ability to win gold medals soon became a family affair. Fina's son, Gary, also captured a gold medal in Kansas state high school gymnastics competition in 1969. The medal-winning success was only one of the aspects in participating in the sport, Fina said.

"It was just fun and I went there (University of Illinois, which was noted for its gymnastic program) for the pure joy of it," Fina said.

"(Gymnastics) never had the popularity of basketball, football or even track and baseball (but) it never seemed to make any difference to us (the team members)."

When it does come to differences in the sport, then and now, Fina definitely notices it in the quality of gymnastic competition displayed today. It was something he and his teammates would never thought of equaling, he said.

"I'm afraid that in most instances we used to dream of the things they do," Fina said. "Some of the vaults the women do would have put us to shame (but) we did what we had to at the time."

Even upon arriving at K-State Fina still kept active in the world of gymnastics — serving on the University's athletic council, judging Big Eight Conference and high school meets and also offering his moral support to members of K-State's gymnastics squad. The gymnastics team has since disbanded. He admits now, however, his own athletic involvement is slight.

"I haven't been active," Fina said. "I almost forgot I was a gymnast. When you're at my age, to be reminded of it is quite a thrill."

"I can still hold a handstand," he said.

NCAA members end arrangement

By The Associated Press

CHICAGO — Members of the National Collegiate Athletic Association on Tuesday drummed the organization out of the college football television business for 1984, ending a 32-year arrangement by voting not to participate in the NCAA's hastily arranged TV package.

By a vote of 66-44, the athletic directors of the football-playing universities of Division I-A voted down an NCAA plan that would have replaced the one killed by the U.S. Supreme Court several weeks ago.

In that decision, the high court ruled that the NCAA could not continue as the sole bargaining agent for its members, terminating a four-year, $263.5 million deal between the NCAA and the CBS and ABC networks, as well as another two-year, $11.1 million package with ESPN, a national cable network.

The vote left the door open for the College Football Association, which has 63 members, or the Football Television Planning Committee, a coalition that includes the CFA as well as the Big Ten and Pac-10 conferences, to become the dominant bargaining agent for such television packages.

NCAA Executive Director Walter Byers conceded the vote was "a short-term repudiation" of the organization, but added, "if you took a poll, the votes would be overwhelmingly in favor of the NCAA plan that was struck down by the court."

"But the difficulty is the extreme lateness," Byers added. "There was just too much uncertainty."

Had its proposal succeeded, the NCAA plan still would have required approval from U.S. District Judge Juan Burciaga, who originally ruled the organization had violated federal antitrust laws.

That ruling came in a lawsuit brought by the universities of Georgia and Oklahoma, two members of the CFA. The suit was the outgrowth of a two-year dispute between the NCAA and CFA, whose members negotiated a $180 million contract with NBC only to be forced to rescind the pact under threat of stiff NCAA penalties.

"You don't want to misread the vote. It's not anti-NCAA," said Otis Sunkety, chairman of the CFA's television committee. "What it shows is that there was uncertainty and pressure because they (the NCAA) would have had to go back to court to get it approved and the opening game is only six weeks off."

Shoplifting plagues Manhattan shop owners

By STEVE ONKEN
and LORI WONG
Collegian Reporters

It could be happening right now. As merchants open their doors daily to consumers, they also open the chance for the possible theft of their merchandise. And no matter how many precautions are taken by the store, there will always be those few who will get away with it. The theft is called shoplifting.

Shoplifting is the single largest monetary crime in the nation with losses of approximately $20 million daily or about $8 billion annually, according to the Riley County Police Department.

An RCPD informational pamphlet stated that "if the nation could get only a 10 percent reduction in the amount of shoplifting, it would have the same economic effect as total elimination of bank robbery."

The incidence of shoplifting in Manhattan is average in comparison to cities of similar size, according to Sgt. Stephen Cuttler of the RCPD.

"In Manhattan, we have a younger community due to the Fort (Riley) and the University," Cuttler said. "This affects the pattern of shoplifting. Christmas time is big time for increased shoplifting, as is the start of school. With the start of school there are new fashions and other things people want. Usually money is tight right after school starts. These are probably the bigger times for shoplifting in Manhattan."

Jim Meyers, manager of Calhoun's clothing store, agreed that shoplifting in Manhattan increases during the holiday season.

"Christmas is the worst time for shoplifters, and shoplifting goes up because you (store clerks) are busier. All of the customers are not getting the individual attention from the clerks, so you leave that shoplifter alone," Meyers said.

"My worst time of the year seems to be at the end of the semester when people seem to be broke," said Jim Schottler, owner and manager of the Casual Encounter clothing store.

Shoplifting not only hurts the Manhattan merchants, but eventually hurts every member of the community, Cuttler said. He added that merchants who suffer losses from shoplifting make up for those losses by increasing security and prices.

Furthermore, because of the domino effect that shoplifting has on the community, shoplifting is increasingly being treated as a serious crime. According to Cuttler, the courts are handing down harsher sentences for convicted shoplifters, and merchants are being less hesitant to question suspicious customers and press charges against them.

"Most of the stores here do press charges," Cuttler said. "The decision to prosecute is made by the stores, but we do recommend that they prosecute."

"I always press charges," Schottler said. "I think most of the stores do. I would hope that they do."

Rocky Masters, an assistant manager at Wal-Mart, agreed with Schottler.

"Absolutely. Always. We always press charges against shoplifters," Masters said.

"If the suspect is 18 or older and the amount of the stolen merchandise is over $100, the suspect is brought down to the station and is issued a notice to appear in municipal court," Cuttler said. "If the suspect was caught in a store outside of the city of Manhattan, he is arrested, brought down to the station, and bond is posted."

"If the property taken is valued at over $100, it is considered a felony. If it is under $100, it is considered as a misdemeanor," he said.

The most common items stolen by shoplifters are food, liquor or beer, clothing and footwear, and miscellaneous small items worth less than $10.

"The things taken (at Wal-Mart) vary from a stick of gum to a whole stereo," Masters said. "There isn't really one particular item that shoplifters take."

"Temptation is great for shoplifters to take the really big items, but getting them out of the store is too difficult," Meyers said.

Myers said popular items for shoplifters in the summer are swimwear and jewelry, while gloves and scarves are items are popular during the winter.

"Most of the cases we see are those involving stolen goods from the discount stores. We get some from the more expensive clothing stores downtown and in Aggieville, but not as much as from the discount stores. The merchandise taken is often cosmetics, or some other fairly inexpensive item," Cuttler said.

Shoplifters resort to a variety of methods to carry out their crime. Some shoplifters use bulky packages called "booster boxes" by the RCPD, knitting or shopping bags and umbrellas to hide and sneak merchandise out of stores.

Dean Taylor, owner of The Palace in Aggieville, noted that most of the merchandise taken from his store is usually small enough to be thrown into a purse, handbag or umbrella.

Schottler said most of the shoplifters he detects are trying to steal single items, such as a shirt. He noted that girls' jeans are the most shoplifted item in his store.

"Sometimes they just shove it (item) under a jacket," Schottler said. "One of the favorite tricks is to take three items into a dressing room, leave two items there and take the third."

Other related methods of shoplifting, Cuttler said, include price switching, when the shoplifter will switch the price label of a lower-priced item onto a higher priced item; exchanging items, when the shoplifter will place a higher-priced item into a less-expensive marked box; and box stuffing, when the shoplifter will place merchandise into the box of an item which he will pay for.

"Concealment seems to be the method that most shoplifters use. And price switching," Masters said. We see both methods quite frequently."

According to the RCPD, the shoplifter's description varies as much as the methods he uses. In the RCPD shoplifting pamphlet it is noted that "if you want to see the profile of a would-be shoplifter, just look in the mirror. Shoplifters come from all walks of life. All ages. All professions. And all family backgrounds."

"A large majority of the shoplifters we see are in their late teens — around 15, 16 or 17," Cuttler said. "We see a few of the even younger ones, but not much. A good number of the shoplifters we get are juveniles."

"There are some 30- and 40-year-olds and these are predominantly females. With the teens it's a mixture of both males and females," Cuttler said.

"We catch people in all age groups — from young kids to older retired people," said Ed Freshnock, manager of Alco department store. "It (shoplifting) really traverses all age groups. But, we do catch more teens than any other age group."

Shoplifters commit their crime for several reasons. According to Cuttler, there are six basic types of shoplifters:

— The amateur is one who steals on impulse. Usually he takes food, clothing or other merchandise which he could afford to pay for.

— The kleptomaniac is one who steals compulsively. The RCPD points out that there are few genuine kleptomaniacs.

— The juvenile steals for thrills or to gain acceptance and status among his peer group.

— The professional often steals for a living. This type of shoplifter often looks for small, high-value items which can be resold easily.

"We do get professionals in here, but that's not often," Freshnock said. "We had an incident recently where they were trying to take name-brand clothing, such as Levi's, Lee's and Wrangler items. They usually go for bigger ticket items."

— The narcotics addict steals merchandise which he will eventually resell in order to support his habit.

— The vagrant is one who steals out of need. The merchandise he steals is often food and clothing for personal use.

Arthur Kaufmann, author of "Combating Shoplifting" outlines four categories of protection against shoplifting. Property-line protection provides the store with a first line of defense, such as fencing or guards; entry protection, such as alarms or metal bars on doors and windows; internal or space protection, including employee training, cameras and lighting; and point protection, such as merchandise anchors and locks.

"In our store, we curb the situation by being able to help each customer on a more personalized basis," Alan Parker, manager of Borch Brothers, said. "I'm sure in major department stores it might be more of a problem with the less-personalized service. Shoplifting is a threat, but not a major threat, to our store."

"Our store uses cameras, video surveillance, and physical contact between employees and customers," Masters of Wal-Mart said. "The cameras are monitored at all times. They are on a 360 degree mount so they can be positioned to see at all angles. They are a super deterrent to shoplifting."

Through customer service, Alco's Freshnock believes that shoplifting can be deterred.

"We stress customer service," Freshnock said. "Not to see if they're shoplifting, but if you acknowledge people, talk to them, you almost develop a sixth sense. I mean, if you say 'hi' to a customer and he takes off, you automatically get suspicious."

"We depend on honesty, honesty of people," Taylor of The Palace said. "If they (customers) aren't honest with us, they have to live with themselves."

Team rows to raise equipment funds

Mike Gilmartin, senior in accounting, gives Melissa Porter, junior in graphic design, a drink of water as she takes part in an ergathon on the Union island Wednesday morning.

The K-State crew team earned approximately $530 Wednesday in an ergathon fund-raiser held in front of the Union.

"The ergathon is much like a marathon, in which each crew member rows so many miles on an ergometer (a simulated rowing apparatus) in a 20-minute period of time," Head Coach Don Rose said. "We had both the men's and women's varsity crew rowing, along with a few of the novice members. The team averaged around 13 miles for each 20 minutes on the machine."

Each crew member will earn money for the team through sponsored pledges for each mile rowed. "The rowing was tough but I enjoyed it," Mike Gilmartin, K-State novice crew member and senior in accounting, said. "The ergathon was a morale builder for the team and it will help us pay off some debts."

The money raised by the ergathon will be used for summer rowing expenses, Rose said. New equipment is needed by the team along with funds to sponsor two home regattas. The rest of the money is to be used to promote K-State crew.

"We're in our 21st year of rowing at K-State. Rowing has become a orphan sport, not being supported by the Intercollegiate Athletic Department," Rose said. "We do have a nice rowing program during the regular season, with practices in the fall and competition in the spring."

To keep K-State crew competitive, Rose said funds are needed for the team to remain current with technological changes in rowing.

"The technical aspect of rowing has changed over the years with boats and oars being made out of carbon fiber," Rose said. "The shells and oars are so much lighter, faster and much easier to keep up than the old wooden boats. With the old wooden boats, you have to sand and varnish them to keep them in good rowing condition."

The team currently has one set of carbon fiber oars and a carbon shell.

The crew team has a race scheduled against the Wichita Rowing Association July 21, and on July 23, the team will take on the Topeka Washburn Rowing Association. These races will be held at Tuttle Creek Reservoir.

Mahaffey's resignation costs K-State $111,000

The Ben Mahaffey saga is coming to a close.

On Wednesday it was announced that Mahaffey, assistant professor of forestry, will receive $111,000 from the University in exchange for his resignation.

By closing the last chapter in a controversy that spans seven years, the settlement prevents Mahaffey and the University administration from initiating any future litigation concerning the matter, a joint statement from the University and Mahaffey read.

The statement also said that the parties have also contractually agreed not to make any further public comment on the agreement. "About all I can say is, I'm glad it's over," Charles Hein, director of communications, said.

Hein refused to disclose where the funds for the payment came from and how the $111,000 figure was derived.

"This is a personnel matter, and as such, the terms of the agreement will not be released. The University is not obligated by law to release information of this kind," Hein said.

The statement went on to add that "both parties believe that this agreement best serves their separate interests and that the University can and will continue to afford quality education for its students and to guarantee the protections of the tenure system for the academic freedom of its faculty."

On Wednesday, Mahaffey told an Associated Press reporter that his resignation is effective Aug. 18 and he would not comment on why he decided to leave the University at that time.

Mahaffey also said that he now works for a private computer information science firm in Manhattan.

The main part of the case began Aug. 18, 1983, when Mahaffey was notified by letter that he was recommended for dismissal and suspended from University duties as of Sept. 1, 1983. The letter — stating Mahaffey's dismissal was based on "professional incompetence" — was signed by Jay Schultz, head of the Department of Forestry; David Mugler, assistant dean of instruction in the College of Agriculture; John Dunbar, dean of the College of Agriculture, and Owen Koeppel, University provost.

With this action, Mahaffey became the first tenured professor suspended since the University adopted the American Association of University Professors' tenure guidelines in 1947. If he would have been actually terminated from the University, he also would have become the first tenured faculty member in the University's 120-year history to have such actions taken against him.

After receiving the letter, Mahaffey appealed to Faculty Senate which established a special committee to hear the case. The appeal proceedings began Jan. 17 and ended Jan. 27. On March 12 the special committee recommended in a report to President Duane Acker that Mahaffey be reinstated.

Lebanese Shiite group bombs Libyan building

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT — A Shiite Moslem group that blames Libya for the disappearance of its spiritual leader blew up that country's embassy Wednesday, the day before a scheduled visit by the Libyan foreign minister.

A band of gunmen overpowered the embassy's five guards before dawn, evacuated the building's only occupant, a woman on the fourth floor, and detonated a 55-pound bomb. Damage was extensive but there were no casualties, said witnesses and the military prosecutor, Gen. Jamil Bairam.

The embassy is in a four-story apartment building in the Jnah neighborhood of southern Beirut.

Libyan Foreign Minister Ali Abdussalam Treiki, visiting the Syrian capital Damascus, told reporters he would go to Beirut Thursday as planned. Treiki met Wednesday with Palestinian and Lebanese leftist leaders.

Lebanese media reports had said Treiki was expected here Wednesday, but Libyan sources said the visit had always been set for Thursday.

A group calling itself the "Sadr Brigades" claimed responsibility for the bombing and demanded the "immediate release" of Imam Moussa Sadr, spiritual leader of Lebanon's one million Shiite Moslems. Sadr disappeared during an August 1978 trip to Libya.

The Sadr Brigades claimed responsibility for the June 23 abduction and release of the No. 2 Libyan diplomat in Beirut, and for last Monday's kidnapping of Libya's top diplomat in Beirut who also was released unharmed. The embassy staff has since left the capital.

Bairam said the bomb was placed on the bottom steps of the building. The gunmen blindfolded the woman resident, three security guards and two soldiers at the embassy's gate, he said.

Meanwhile, the Lebanese Cabinet formed a committee of army and police officers headed by retired Beirut police Chief Col. Hisham Koreitem to determine the fate of the hundreds of people believed kidnapped by militias during civil war fighting, and arrange for the release of survivors.

Prime Minister Rashid Karami said the Cabinet had agreed on a "working program" for the release of the hostages, and they would be freed "soonest, God willing."

Mondale 'very, very close' to decision

By The Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — Walter F. Mondale, "very, very close" to settling on his vice presidential choice, is considering a short list of prospects that includes Rep. Geraldine Ferraro and San Francisco Mayor Dianne Feinstein, sources said Wednesday. Gary Hart said he would take the spot, if asked.

The name of Massachusetts Gov. Michael Dukakis cropped up, and San Antonio Mayor Henry Cisneros and Los Angeles Mayor Tom Bradley remained under review, a variety of sources reported.

Mondale aides said Hart remained a possibility, but his spokesman said Hart had no indication of that.

"I would do it if asked, not because it would make political sense, but because it would be the nominee's judgment and, hopefully, that of the party that I would add something to the ticket and, hopefully, beat President Reagan," Hart told ABC News.

It was his most positive statement on the subject to date, coming just 24 hours after he vowed not to quit his challenge to Mondale for the nomination.

Cisneros, the 37-year-old mayor of the nation's 11th largest city, impressed Mondale in a meeting last week. Sources said Cisneros' youth was working against him, but the mayor was asked for personal information on finances and health and shipped it to Mondale during the day.

Aides said a decision could come before the Democratic National Convention opens next week; perhaps as soon as Thursday. But Mondale did nothing to tip his hand in an interview, except to announce that campaign rival Jesse Jackson was not in the running.

"I intend to pick the best person I can find, who's compatible, whose selection speaks for my vision of our future, and there are sufficient differences between the Rev. Jackson and myself that I can't do that," Mondale told CBS News.

An aide, Maxine Isaacs, said the differences include Jackson's call for a Palestinian homeland and a reduction in the defense budget.

The aide also said Mondale considers some of Jackson's recent statements to be "quite offensive," an apparent reference to his complaints that Mondale was bowing to pressure from Jewish leaders in not

Community watches lessen danger of crime

By TIM CARPENTER
Collegian Reporter

In years past, people confidently left their homes and businesses unlocked and unattended. The belief was that no one in the community would dare rob them.

Recent crime trends indicate that individuals can no longer afford this luxury.

"It would be nice to return to the old days, but we can't. The crime problem will always be with us," said Ralph Utermohlen, area extension specialist for community development.

Although no one can turn back the clock, community action can help to prevent crime, Utermohlen said.

"The main thing people must do, is be alert and observe what they see. People must look out for each other," Utermohlen said.

Observant individuals can do much to prevent crime, but a coordinated effort between concerned citizens and law enforcement officials is a stronger deterrent, said Scott Teeslink, special agent for the Kansas Bureau of Investigation (KBI).

Two crime prevention programs of this type exist in Riley County.

The Neighborhood Watch program, in effect for three years, places emphasis on preventing crime in residential neighborhoods. Neighborhood residents are asked to be aware of any suspicious activity taking place in their area.

A new program, which the Riley County Police Department (RCPD) set in motion this summer, is called Business Watch, and closely resembles the Neighborhood Watch program, except it will help the business community reduce its vulnerability to crime.

Lt. Harold Sylvis is the educational coordinator for the RCPD and the promoter for the Riley County Neighborhood Watch program.

"Law enforcement officials often sponsor Neighborhood Watch programs. These programs are effective because they heighten the awareness of people so they are more apt to report suspicious activities to us," Sylvis said.

Numerous neighborhoods are involved in the watch program.

Watch areas include the 800 and 1000 blocks of Bertrand Street and the 1100 and 1200 blocks on Bertrand and Thurston streets. A neighborhood that encompasses the area including Summit Avenue, Ridge Drive, Oak Street and Westwood Road, near the Sunset Park and Zoo, has a well-established watch program. A few smaller watch areas exist, and a dozen more areas are still pending, Sgt. Stephen Cutler, special projects officer for RCPD, said.

To organize a watch program, concerned citizens should first determine the extent of crime in their area. If the need for a program is evident, the next step is to contact a few potential members and organize a meeting with a local law enforcement agency.

Neighborhood and business watch programs should not be organized without the assistance of law enforcement officials, Cutler said.

After securing the aid of police officials, a meeting with the residents in the watch area can be organized.

A Cooperative Extension Service publication advises organizers to get a complete listing of the names, addresses and phone numbers of everyone participating in the program. The extension service also encourages organizers to plan future meetings and select a block coordinator to serve as a liaison between law enforcement officials and the group.

The extension service further advises the watch groups to ask a police officer to speak at the first meeting. He can explain the limits of a citizen's role in a watch program and advise members as to the proper way to report suspicious activity.

"Eyewitness accounts of wrongdoing are essential if an officer is to do his job," Teeslink said.

To get a good description of a person an eyewitness should note unique physical features and mannerisms or unusual markings, Teeslink said.

The suspect's color of hair, skin, eyes, approximate age, height and body build are also important.

"Once participants are trained to react to suspicious activity, the program must then be well-publicized. This is important. Once known to the public, the program can become a crime deterrent, because criminals will be less likely to venture into that neighborhood," Sylvis said.

Participants in the programs can place bumper and window stickers and crime watch signs in places where they are highly visible. Newspaper advertisements can be taken out to announce to readers the establishment of a new watch area.

The Business Watch program is similar to the Neighborhood Watch program. Both programs are based on the theory that once individuals, merchants and their employees are educated in the methods of criminals, they can, if not prevent a crime, help to solve one.

Currently, two business groups are participating in the new Business Watch program. One of the groups is in the Westloop shopping area and the other is in the Village Plaza shopping center, Cutler said.

The Business Watch program is starting to get response in the downtown area.

"The downtown businesses will probably start in the next month or two. They are excited. It's just a matter of knocking on more doors," Cutler said.

The Business Watch program provides tips on protecting employees during a robbery. Business owners can also gain useful information that can help them prevent theft by employees, and reduce robbery and shoplifting.

The program is having an impact on Manhattan, although its influence is impossible to measure because it is hard to ascertain how many crimes are being prevented by the programs, Cutler said.

"The only success we can directly attribute to the Business Watch program is an incident in the Village Plaza shopping area. It was a shoplifting case in which quick reporting of the get-away car's license number, by an employee, allowed police officers to find the suspect and initiate prosecution," Cutler said.

However, one or two passive meetings and a sign in a front yard or store-front window won't deter crime, Sylvis said.

"Leaders of the groups should schedule meetings and gatherings so participants can share information and remain involved," he said.

This doesn't mean groups have to schedule monthly meetings.

"A group of neighbors can get together for a cup of coffee. Some of the Manhattan groups are having block parties. The watch groups are unifying people. The groups allow people to feel more secure, because they know a neighbor is watching out for them," Cutler said.

Three things must be present before a crime can take place: a criminal, an opportunity and time to perpetrate the crime.

"Make it cost more for the criminal than it is really worth to him. Eliminate one or two of the three things that it takes for a crime to occur, and then it will become too costly for the criminal to risk," Utermohlen said.

If maintained, the neighborhood and business watch programs can help solve crime in Manhattan, Cutler said.

"These programs are a big part of the answer to crime, but I don't think anyone will ever find the whole answer. I do think this is one of the best ways to protect ourselves from crime. Police can't be everywhere. The citizens' best alternative is to protect themselves," Cutler said.

considering him for the vice presidential post.

Sources said Sen. Lloyd Bentsen of Texas was dropped from consideration, but Mondale's spokesman, Maxine Isaacs, said no one other than Jackson was eliminated.

She added Mondale was "very, very close" to making up his mind, though — "closing in" on a decision.

The women at the center of the speculation said nothing.

Not Feinstein, the mayor of the convention city who was working to settle a department store strike.

And not Ferraro, although her husband, John Zaccaro, said he was asked whether he would supply detailed financial information on short notice.

The moment of Mondale's nomination for president was one week away, and he secluded himself in his home in suburban St. Paul, Minn., disclosing nothing of his thoughts on a running mate. President Reagan was campaigning as an environmentalist on Roosevelt Island in the Potomac River.

This drew a caustic response from Hart: "If Teddy Roosevelt were alive today, he'd strongly object to having his name linked with Ronald Reagan's policies of protecting polluters instead of the environment."

The timing of Mondale's announcement remained in doubt, with some sources reporting he would disclose his choice before flying to Lake Tahoe, Calif., for the weekend, others speculating he would present the ticket at the resort, and still others saying he would wait until arriving here for next week's convention.

One source said, "we're back up to 50-50 for a woman vice president," as Mondale dispatched a key aide, John Reilly, to this convention city to meet with Ferraro.

"Reilly's visit with Ferraro was not cosmetic," said one source, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "It was very detailed. I get the feeling Mondale is in a gambling mood."

In addition, sources disclosed that another top Mondale aide, Michael Berman, met recently with Ferraro's husband, developer John Zaccaro.

Yet a third aide, James Johnson, held a meeting with Feinstein's husband, investment banker Richard Blum.

Cisneros, the 37-year-old mayor of the nation's 11th largest city, was said to be somewhat less likely to be picked, but still a possibility after he impressed Mondale in their interview several days ago.

Client relationship spawns scholarships, creates local financial marketing studies

By T. RUSSELL LORETZ
Collegian Reporter

Five K-State marketing students have benefited from scholarship money which was an "extra" which grew out of a client relationship with Manhattan Federal Savings and Loan Association.

David Andrus, assistant professor of marketing, said Manhattan Federal requested K-State's marketing department set up a marketing research study for the local financial institution.

The only stipulation placed on the $1,250 gift was that the money be used for scholarships to marketing majors. A faculty committee in the Department of Marketing determined the number and amount of awards. The committee selected five seniors in marketing based on scholastic average and demonstration of marketing performance.

The recipients are: Deann J. Collins of Overbrook; Pele Ann Lambers of Wichita; Shawna L. Lawrence of Norton; Stuart D. Leighty of Tecumseh; and Kenneth R. Rock of Herington. They will be seniors in marketing this fall and will receive $250 each.

Andrus is teaching a marketing research class this summer involved with three projects for Manhattan Federal. The projects include a consumer satisfaction study, estimating demand for telephone bill paying and attracting K-State faculty and staff to Manhattan Federal.

Andrus said the relationship with local businesses is not new. Since his arrival at K-State in June 1983, he said he has used real clients in all his marketing research classes.

Richard Coleman, professor of marketing, also conducts a marketing research course during the fall and spring semesters using real clients.

"What we're trying to do here is have students involved in real-world applications of marketing problems," Andrus said. "It's one thing to read about it (marketing research or consumer behavior problems) in the textbook. It's a whole different kind of learning experience when they actually have to get out and deal with a real client."

As well as dealing with the real world, Andrus said the University/local business relationship was beneficial to students in other ways.

Students face real decisions, problems, frustrations and compromises which will help them prepare for a career in marketing.

At the same time, Andrus added, the Manhattan community benefits in two ways.

"We are giving them (the clients) scientific marketing information to base management decisions on," Andrus said. "The community is getting good-quality marketing research at a very inexpensive price."

The Manhattan residents benefit because from these studies local businesses can improve their products and services.

Andrus said an atmosphere of cooperation prevails in working with the Manhattan community. A consumer satisfaction study, currently underway for Dental Associates, resulted in a $500 donation toward computer laboratory equipment for the marketing research laboratory which will open in the fall of 1984.

Soviet harvest predictions increase

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Soviet Union's grain harvest, shaping up as the second largest in six years, could produce more wheat and less coarse grains than indicated previously, the Agriculture Department said Wednesday.

A monthly review said the Soviet harvest, forecast at 190 million metric tons, is expected to include 86 million tons of wheat, 92.5 million tons of corn and other coarse grain, and 11.5 million tons of miscellaneous grains and pulses, which include legume crops.

Previously, production was indicated at 85 million tons of wheat, 94 million tons of coarse grains, and 11 million tons of other grains and pulses.

Soviet imports in the 1984-85 international year that began July 1 were estimated at 38 million tons, up 3 million tons from last month's forecast and the second largest on record. Imports in 1983-84 were 33 million tons. The record was 46 million tons in 1981-82.

Strike undermines U.S.-Greek relations

By The Associated Press

ATHENS, Greece — Almost three years after Socialists gained control of the Greek government, Premier Andreas Papandreu's persistent opposition to Turkey's role in NATO and the deployment of nuclear missiles in Europe has caused a deterioration in relations with the United States.

The latest irritations include a dispute over dealing with international terrorism and a strike, now in its second week, by 1,800 Greek workers at four U.S. military bases.

The United States has blocked the sale to Greece of used American fighter jets, and Greece has made veiled threats about the future of the bases and two Voice of America relay stations.

Papandreu, a 64-year-old former economics professor at the University of California in Berkeley and an American citizen for 20 years, came to power pledging that Greece would assert its independence under socialism, after 30 years "as an American satellite."

Until recently, the United States appeared willing to put up with Papandreu's anti-American rhetoric, mainly to placate Greek leftists who objected to last year's approval of a defense accord that will permit four U.S. bases in Greece at least until 1990.

Although Papandreu signed the pact, he also has said he will close the bases if he is still in power when the accord runs out.

But now the United States apparently has chosen to demonstrate its displeasure. It has decided to veto a planned deal to allow Greece to buy 15 F-5 jet fighters from Norway, a U.S. Embassy official in Athens said that Turkey may get them instead.

That would be an especially painful message to the Greek government. Relations with Turkey, from which Greece won its independence in the 19th century, have dominated Greek foreign policy since the Turkish invasion of Cyprus in 1974.

Turkey claims military control over half of the Aegean Sea and half of any minerals on the seabed; Greece has claimed that NATO and the United States favor Turkey in disputes over Cyprus and the Aegean.

Citing its belief that Turkey has expansionist designs on Greek islands lying close to the Turkish Aegean coast, Greece has refused to take part in NATO exercises in the Aegean Sea region.

Greek officials react angrily to what they see as unwarranted pressure from the United States to make Greece toe the NATO line.

"Greece isn't an American colony," government spokesman Dimitri Maroudas said. "We base our foreign policy on national interests."

State Department officials have spoken openly of the problems of dealing with a friendly country whose premier recently described the United States as "the Mecca of imperialism" and takes a pro-Soviet line on nuclear issues.

"It's often very frustrating to deal with an allied government that defends the Soviet Union and criticizes the United States," Assistant Secretary of State Richard Burt told a House foreign affairs subcommittee last month.

On Wednesday, Papandreu met with American Ambassador Monteagle Stearns and said he was "optimistic" tensions would ease between the two governments.

The 90-minute discussion, he said, focused on the "entire spectrum" of U.S.-Greek relations, including the sale of the used jet fighters.

Papandreu's campaign against deployment of new nuclear missiles in Europe, which American officials say undermines the Western alliance's joint stand, also has sent Greek-American relations plummeting.

The United States remonstrated with Greece over Papandreu's project to set up a nuclear-free zone in the Balkans, an idea welcomed by the Soviet Union. It joined Greece's other NATO and European Common Market partners in rejecting a Greek plan to postpone deployment of new Cruise and Pershing 2 missiles in Western Europe.

In a meeting with Greece's ambassador to Washington last month, Burt cited a list of grievances that included Greece's refusal to condemn the Soviet Union for shooting down a South Korean jetliner, diplomatic sources here said.

But the protests appear to have had little effect.

Costello's latest lyrics lack universality

By GARY JOHNSON
Contributing Writer

Not too long ago, Elvis Costello was the spokesman for those people who wanted to exorcise their frustrations, instead of pretending they didn't exist. At his concerts, his fans seemed to have memorized virtually every word he'd written.

Review

While most financially successful rock stars offered only a success-by-conquest approach, Costello was singing about the frustrations of love and the awkwardness of sex.

In 1979 he had reached an artistic highpoint with the release of his "Armed Forces" album. His lyrics were striking a nerve felt on both sides of the Atlantic, becoming the first album associated with the new wave to go top 10.

During the past five years, though, his music has undergone many changes. He no longer wants to be the everyman through whom his audience can express its anxieties. Costello was gradually leaving far behind the tension and passion in his music, opting for a slicker approach in which he wanted nothing more than to become the Frank Sinatra of his generation. With that change in format, though, comes a distortion in his perspective that leads to self-indulgence.

On his new album, "Goodbye Cruel World," the lyrics are restricted in range until everything is seen only in terms of how it affects Costello. The material is ultimately so introspective that it can only be of value to avowed fans still hanging on from the promise he supplied with his first three albums.

While "Punch the Clock" and "Imperial Bedroom" revealed there was hope for Costello to succeed within his restricted viewpoint, "Goodbye Cruel World" finds him at almost a complete loss in creating tightly structured pop songs. The lyrics seldom sink in because the hooks aren't strong enough to hold the listener.

Costello has largely taken the hostility, passion and romance out of his lyrics and replaced it with a passiveness that makes his music virtually tensionless. Most of the music on this album can't really be called rock'n'roll; it's more like the pub rock of a lounge singer.

Whenever Costello slowed down his music in the past, as in "Accidents Will Happen" and "Allison," he was still able to supply tension through the desperation in his voice. Even as late as "Shipbuilding" from "Punch the Clock" he was adept at playing slow-tempoed songs.

On "Goodbye Cruel World" such material is turned into just so much fluff. "Love Field" shows Costello at a loss in supplying his music with slight twists. Nearly everything on this record can be predicted far before it happens. One of the exceptions is the album's strongest song, "Inch by Inch." The arrangement starts out very bare, propelled by a strong bass line around which swirl spare whiffs of saxophone organ, and guitar. Just when the song seems inevitably headed into the chorus, Costello backs off briefly and allows the arrangement to build further.

The do-wop attempted in "The Only Flame in Town," complete with backing vocals by Daryl Hall, is only moderately successful because of a timid musical arrangement. When Costello does attempt rock'n'roll, the results sound like something we have all heard him do before — and heard him do better. "The Deportees Club" finds Costello singing with renewed anger, but it sounds like little more than a speeded up and more frantic version of "You Belong to Me" (with a touch of the screams and guitar riffing from "Man Out of Time").

"Goodbye Cruel World" reveals an artist struggling against his own success. He no longer has any sense of the immediacy that characterized his earlier work and made him so popular. He seems to be begging for acceptance, even from those who once saw his stance as being threatening or distasteful. He even sings a song titled "I Wanna Be Loved."

It's sad to think that one of the most passionate rock'n'roll performers to emerge in the '70s has been reduced to doing little more than groveling at the feet of his listeners. In the past, his self-pity was conveyed with a universality that made it everyone's self-pity, but now it is only his own.

Airbrush work requires creativity

Class teaches students technical skills

By KRISTIE CRABTREE
Collegian Reporter

Two years ago, a new media class involving airbrushing, was added to the K-State art department's curriculum. Since its beginning, interest in the class has been high. David Harmes, professor of art, said.

"I was so interested in airbrush as a resource media when I came to the art department, I inserted projects in the regular classes," he said.

An airbrush, Harmes explained, has a cylinder-like assembly with a needle-like apparatus inside of it that controls the compressed air, spray and brush. It can be brass, aluminum or steel. The amount of air pressure determines how much ink is released.

Harmes said K-State has several air terminals which can accommodate 30 people. Each student has an individual air source which he can regulate from 80 to 100 pounds of air.

Airbrush has been an art medium for a long time, Harmes said, and is widely used on the West Coast. This medium compliments existing art by refining or polishing up art pieces in portfolios.

It is also used extensively in graphics, to polish out or glamorize an item, Harmes added. Airbrush is very lucrative in medical illustration for toning muscle, also — giving a modeled effect.

Architecture, metals, jewelry and ceramics are other areas in which the airbrush technique is used.

The class Harmes is teaching this summer has 30 people, from beginners to advanced. Harmes said he tries to keep the class accommodating to people who don't have much art background.

In class, Harmes gives his students three items to interpret and to combine in a composition.

"It might be something off-the-wall like a bumblebee, wall paper print (or) something man-made. Then they have to come up with a logical one-statement idea or theme."

"They have to arrange these items in a meaningful way and give the composition credibility," Harmes said.

The students, he said, find encouragement from art directors when they show their work that includes airbrushing.

"Art directors perk up," Harmes said. "That's why it is going as well as it is. They're starting to see a lot of craftsmanship involved — a lot of dexterity."

Airbrushing not only involves thinking, Harmes said, but dexterity and technical ability go along with it.

Vicki Winkler, senior in graphic design from Overland Park, is taking the airbrush class this summer. As she worked on one of her projects, classical music played in the background, helping to set the mood for the students.

Winkler explained that she became interested in the airbrush class from Harmes when she had him for a graphic design class. She plans to use the airbrush techniques she's learning this summer with fashion illustration, the field she plans to pursue.

Winkler said that since the class ends this week, Harmes will critique each individual and also the class as a whole. Final grades will be determined by how each student worked during the class and how much each student improved.

Man dressed in gorilla outfit frightens children, gets cited

By The Associated Press

NORTH WALES, Pa. — A man who celebrated his 20th birthday by dressing up in a gorilla costume was arrested after he frightened some children on their way to a swimming pool.

"I guess he was just out to get his money's worth," Wayne Cassel, deputy chief of Upper Gwynedd Township police, said after Jerry L. McGaghey was taken into custody.

Police said McGaghey, who had turned 20 the day before, was celebrating in his costume Tuesday when he took to the trees.

"He bought the costume at a Halloween shop," said Cassel. "There were a few kids down there

There were no reports that he scared anyone to death.

"Of course, we didn't know whether it was being done maliciously or out of fun. At this point, it seems it was more out of fun," he said. "We didn't get any calls from parents."

Cassel said the arresting officer, Sgt. Robert Freed, found McGaghey mimicking a gorilla while swinging in a tree next to a narrow private road.

"First, he (Freed) heard someone yelling. Then, he heard grunting. Then, he spotted the alleged gorilla. At that point he (McGaghey) was taken into custody," Cassel said.

McGaghey was given a non-traffic citation and released, Cassel said.

Economic boom encourages European trips

By The Associated Press

There are so many Americans in Europe this year that they're bumping into each other in the Paris subways, asking each other for directions in London and sitting shoulder-to-shoulder in Italian cafes.

The booming U.S. economy, the strong dollar, the 40th anniversary of D-day and many Americans' desire to see the old country have combined to produce the biggest-ever tourist invasion of Europe.

President Reagan set the pace last month, seeking his ancestral roots in Ireland, touring the Normandy beaches in France and attending an economic summit in London.

He was just one of roughly 5.5 million Americans — more than Ireland's population — expected to visit Europe in 1984.

Trans-Atlantic flights are booked solid, travel agents are doing a brisk business, and State Department officials are working furiously to keep up with the crush of passport applications.

Americans — from college backpackers to retired people — seem to be everywhere in Europe.

"Europe's a bargain because, obviously, the dollar is buying more," said Vivian Deuschl, an official at the Commerce Department's travel and tourism division.

One gauge of European travel is passport applications, which the State Department says have jumped 50 percent so far in 1984. Some 600,000 passports were issued in May, up 53 percent from the same month the year before.

Bill Jackman of the Air Transport Association in Washington said most air carriers are booked this summer, and international traffic was up 14 percent in May.

At the European Travel Commission in New York, spokesman Hans Friis said the commission is looking for a 15 percent increase over the record 4.8 million Americans who went to Europe last year.

"Everybody is pleased with the great influx," Friis said. "The hoteliers are doing very well," he said, adding Europe can easily handle the crowds because "the infrastructure is so good."

In major cities, London, Paris and Rome for example, hotels are packed. On Paris' trendy Left Bank, it's almost impossible to find a hotel, regardless of price, which doesn't have a "complet" sign out front.

Even in smaller places, such as Lucerne — the charming Swiss town surrounded by snow-covered Alps — there are lines at the hotel reservation office at the station. On one week night, the clerk said there was one double room available in the city.

Obviously, Americans aren't the only travelers in Europe, but they make up a hefty share. Because the dollar has appreciated against all European currencies, Americans find their money buys more.

The British pound, for example, fell to an all-time low of $1.3090 in early trading Monday in London. On Friday, it cost $1.32 to buy one pound.

The traditional sights, like Windsor Palace, the Tower of London, the Eiffel Tower and Arc de Triomphe, are packed with Americans. "Do you speak English?" one young tourist asked another on Paris' Champs Elysees. "Yes, very well," laughingly responded the other in a thick Southern drawl.

In Paris' department store,

Galleries Lafayette, English seems to be heard almost as frequently as French under the huge dome. Harrods, London's famous department store, has enticed thousands of consumer-oriented Americans hoping to pick up that real Shetland sweater or English china.

Mary Patterson, a travel agent in White Bear Lake, Minn., said this year she's noticed more "younger, junior executive" types heading for Europe. "They're just letting loose," she said, noting that the recession a few years ago put the crimp on overseas travel.

At the American Society of Travel Agents, Dee Minnick said, "Student activity appears to have really picked up this year."

College students, many with Eurail passes that allow unlimited train travel for a period, pop up everywhere. Two groups — one from Pennsylvania State University, the other from Illinois — crowded into an automatic laundry in Baden-Baden, the German resort town on the edge of the Black Forest. They swapped stories and caught up on their diaries.

Big cities are the major draws, particularly London, according to Deuschl. The Cabinet War Rooms — the new museum that displays where Winston Churchill directed his country's effort against Nazis — is more popular with Americans than the British, one guide said.

While many Europeans welcome the tourist onslaught for the foreign exchange it brings, some Americans aren't so pleased.

"I think I'm going to try to go home," said one elderly Beverly, Mass., woman at a Paris hotel. "I'm supposed to go to Rome and Athens, but I'm tired of standing in lines."

Reversed stars mar flag; flaw receives little notice

By The Associated Press

GREAT FALLS, Mont. — A 50-foot-long American flag that was hoisted above Overlook Park on the Fourth of July was taken down after someone noticed its 50 stars were upside down.

The flaw wasn't exactly obvious: Officials didn't even notice until the Great Falls Board of Realtors received an anonymous call, said Ernie Peters, chairman of Project Patriotism, the group that raised the flag.

"You just don't notice things like that," he said.

The flag, 50 feet long and 30 feet wide and costing $1,100, was taken down Tuesday.

Federal law prohibits flying a U.S. flag with any flaw.

Woman burns self in protest of sexism

By The Associated Press

MINNEAPOLIS (AP) — An outspoken foe of pornography who was in critical condition after setting herself afire in a bookstore had written to city officials that she could no longer live in a society that degraded her as "a piece of meat."

"I have chosen to take my life and to destroy the persons who have destroyed me," said identical letters received in the mail Wednesday by Mayor Don Fraser and Charlee Hoyt, Minneapolis council member.

Christenson was in critical condition, said Dr. John Toomey, director of the burn unit at Hennepin County Medical Center. Only her lower legs escaped serious burns, he said.

Christenson had been described as angry when she testified at a city council hearing last month on a proposed city ordinance to restrict pornography.

She carried a backpack containing "literature denouncing pornography and some BBs from a BB gun" when she poured fuel from a small can labeled "Gasoline" and set herself afire in Shinder's bookstore in downtown Minneapolis, said Ron Hagen, chief arson investigator for the Minneapolis Fire Department.

"The burns appear very deep," said Toomey. "We fully expect her to recover, but she will require a lot of additional surgery."

Her hand-printed letter said she felt her life had been degraded by pornography, but she did not elaborate on specific experiences.

"I feel that the pornographers and the values they represent have ruined my life," the young woman wrote. "Sexism has affected my life in a myriad of negative ways."

"To me, pornography represents not only the economic exploitation and advantage gained through the degradation of women but absolute spiritual and moral bankruptcy in our society," the letter continued.

University settlement raises more questions

Wednesday an announcement was made of a settlement between the University and Ben Mahaffey, resolving a conflict between the two parties over the issue of tenure. Through an agreement, Mahaffey agreed to resign his position as associate professor of forestry and was, in turn, given a negotiated payment of $111,000 by the University.

With this announcement, the University has put a price tag on a method of ensuring a level of competence within its faculty. The Mahaffey settlement appears to be nothing more than a University payoff to rid itself of a challenge to a system that should be seriously studied by all concerned.

The tenure system is idealistically designed to protect academic freedom of University faculty. Academic freedom is certainly a vital part of any collegiate community, but to what expense should the University protect the freedom of its faculty at the expense of its students?

Mahaffey's career at K-State was filled with controversy — the University and Mahaffey had been in a dispute since 1978. In August 1983, Mahaffey was suspended from his duties as associate professor by University officials and recommended for dismissal — professional incompetence was the basis for the decision.

Mahaffey, in response, took his case to a committee of tenured University professors and after nine days of testimony earlier this year, was saved from termination by a unanimous decision of the committee.

Was the committee's decision based on Mahaffey's professionalism or due to an attempt to save a system that has been a standard during the University's 120-year tradition?

Professional incompetence should not be protected by a tenure system that paradoxically is designed to ensure the level of excellence in the faculty. Although no attempt will be made here to debate Mahaffey's professional competence, a system that forces the University to make payment to a professor to secure his resignation is a system that should be seriously considered for reform.

Another aspect of the Mahaffey settlement also raises serious questions. The University has allocated $111,000 to obtain Mahaffey's resignation. Members of the University community have a right to know the source of that large settlement, yet both parties are hiding under a convenient agreement which forbids either party to discuss terms of the arrangement under violation of a contractual agreement.

This arrangement fails to take into account the thousands of people University administrators are appointed to serve. If the student fees or funds that could be used to better students' education on this campus are being used for this settlement, the students and the rest of the University community have a right to this knowledge. No cloak of secrecy should cloud the open administration-student relationship that should exist in a proper learning environment.

The Ben Mahaffey case is now history. But with its resolution remain new questions that should not remain unanswered or go unstudied.

Sinatra goes afloat in Connecticut

GREENWICH, Conn. — Singer Frank Sinatra has taken up a floating residence in Greenwich Harbor in his new yacht, "My Way Again," an innkeeper says.

The $2.7 million, 96-foot-long yacht is docked at the Showboat Inn, and Sinatra often stays on board, said Joseph Keating, the inn's owner. The yacht is two weeks old and sleeps 14 people.

Keating said Sinatra probably would use Greenwich as the yacht's home port while the singer and his entourage cruise to Newport, R.I.; Atlantic City, N.J.; Long Island, N.Y., and eventually to Europe.

Ex-governor denies appeal report

ANNAPOLIS, Md. — Former Gov. Marvin Mandel, who was disbarred after his conviction on political corruption charges, said Wednesday he is not seeking reinstatement as a lawyer — at least not for now.

Mandel denied a published report saying he was expected to ask the Court of Appeals this week for readmission to the bar, saying, "I'm not doing a thing and I don't know where that came from."

When asked if he planned to seek reinstatement soon, Mandel refused to comment.

Mandel, 64, spent 19 months in a federal prison after being convicted of mail fraud and racketeering. He was released in December 1981, and since has worked as a consultant for a construction company and as a radio talk-show host.

German police detain faith healer

MUNICH, West Germany — American television evangelist and faith healer Ernest Angley was detained on suspicion of practicing healing without a license, the city prosecutor's office said Wednesday.

Angley and two assistants were taken into custody Tuesday night after the evangelist allegedly tried to perform faith-healing on several people at a meeting in a Munich hotel, prosecutor's spokesman Hubert Vollman said.

The assistants were released after identity checks, Vollman said, without giving their names or nationalities.

Under West German law, "healers" must be certified and registered before they may practice, and Angley lacked proper credentials, Vollman said.

Political science teacher splits job

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. — Political scientist James Q. Wilson plans to "have the best of both worlds" for the next three years by splitting his teaching time between Harvard University and the University of California at Los Angeles.

Wilson, an authority on crime, urban politics and law enforcement, will teach one semester at Harvard and one at UCLA before deciding where to stay permanently. He will retain his endowed chair at Harvard and hold a tenured position at UCLA, a Harvard spokesman said.

A Harvard professor since 1961, Wilson, 53, said he was happy there.

Upcoming decision could limit judicial power

It is both an advantage and a bane of our justice system that private citizens are allowed to sue private companies, public institutions and other citizens in order to compensate for some injustice done to them, both real and imagined. It is an advantage for the obvious reason — justice is achieved by either monetary compensation or precedent-setting law decisions, or both.

It is also an impediment to our justice system that private citizens can fight their personal battles in court, using valuable court time and money; that advancements in medicine and science are slowed because professionals in those fields fear malpractice suits, and that those with opinions cannot responsibly voice their beliefs, no matter how true, without the fear of a costly and damaging libel suit.

This disadvantage of the justice system is obvious as national attention is focused on a federal appeals court in St. Paul, Minn.

The Federal Court of Appeals heard arguments Monday and Tuesday both for and against U.S. District Court Judge Miles Lord. The judge has been accused of abus-

KAREN BELLUS
Collegian Columnist

ing his judicial powers when he reprimanded executives of a pharmaceutical company for "corporate irresponsibility at its meanest."

The plaintiffs are executives of the Virginia-based pharmaceutical company A.H. Robins Co., makers of an intrauterine device, the Dalkon Shield. The manufacturer pulled the contraceptive off the market in 1974 because of evidence that it caused infections and other problems in the women who used the product. More than 9,000 women claimed that they suffered from direct use of the device.

Lord made his reprimand to the executives after several Dalkon

Shield cases were settled out of court for a reported $4.6 million.

He charged the executives had not "faced up to the fact that more than 9,000 women have made claims that they gave up part of their womanhood so that your company might prosper."

"Your company...denies its guilt and continues its monstrous mischief," Lord said later. There are still about 4,000 unresolved claims and A.H. Robins is concerned that Lord's comments could cause "immeasurable harm."

If the judge is found guilty by the five-judge panel reviewing the case, he could be asked to retire or be reprimanded and his comments would be struck from the record.

Worse than that though, is the affect a guilty decision could have on other judges and decisions.

In our justice system, the American public has entrusted judges with the responsibility to make considered, accountable and dutiful conclusions about the everyday and not-so-ordinary conflicts of life. We have already seen the harm the barrage of malpractice suits has had on the medical system; all of us have heard the stories of hospitals and doctors afraid to treat patients for fear of a civil suit. It is unthinkable that consideration for monetary and private welfare should dominate judicial decision-making. Is the justice system to be faced with a multitude of civil suits from defendants unhappy with the verdict of their cases? One can only hope not.

Judges are not above the scrutiny of their peers and the public. There are several checks already in place that monitor the behavior of those with judicial power. Indeed, there are many who criticize American courts for having too many checks on itself, thus slowing the justice process.

A decision in favor of the A.H. Robins Co. would severely limit the power and freedom of judges to decide cases as they have been trained to do. Most judges are aware of their responsibility to the justice system and how their decisions could affect the law process of the future. Decisions, for the most part, are not made frivolously, but with careful deliberation. One can only hope that the decisions of the five-judge panel will realize the importance on its conclusion and will allow judges to continue to do the duty they have been assigned to do.

Newspaper offers insight into Moral Majority

The headline read "Falwell carries 12 pro-family resolutions to Demos, GOP." Though I scantily read the front page story of the July 1984 issue of the "Moral Majority Report," I knew one of those resolutions must have said not to watch the sequel of "The Day After." I also knew it must be election time because Falwell was beginning to make the big pitch for his self-righteous and truly virtuous "Moral Majority."

I can remember way back to when I used to visit my grandparents. The Sunday morning ritual consisted of my grandpa getting ready for church, and somebody asking my grandpa if he was planning to go. His reply was the same: He said he was going to watch Jerry Falwell on TV. Of course he never did, passing up the "Old Time Gospel Hour," to watch Friendly Freddy read the comics or catch the latest NFL highlights.

Because of that, I never thought people took religious fundamentalists seriously. Who would pay attention to a guy telling his audience to help the poor as he stood behind the pulpit in a expensive pin-striped suit and lived in a mansion? At least my grandpa didn't subscribe to the "Moral Majority Report."

WAYNE PRICE
Arts and Features Editor

Apparently people do take the Moral Majority and its publication serious. Falwell claims there are millions of people reading his "Moral Majority Report," which, if they are half as dedicated as he boasts them to be, represents a viable force in the religious arena, uh, political arena — better yet, the political-religious arena.

The Moral Majority must consist of some rather wealthy people who enjoy expensive vacations in addition to their expensive morals. One of the ads in the "Report" tells about the "Old Time Gospel Hour Trio Cruise." The guest speaker is, naturally, Falwell himself. Now how is the average above-average moralist supposed to finance a trip to the Caribbean, or still yet, how is it justified — putting all that money into "an exciting week of inspiration and fellowship" with all the starvation and poverty in the world? If a person wants more information he's to write to Christian Cruise Conferences.

Hey, wait a minute. A church having its own cruise line? Just where do all those donations go anyway? Oh, I guess it means that kind of "love" on the "Love Boat."

Another ad tells readers to become "Part of the Master Plan." A section of it reads, "As private citizens, we have established an organization that has 50 state chairmen and millions of active Americans committed to returning America to moral sanity." Just when did America's porch light burn out? First these guys kick and holler for nuclear buildup to protect this great country of ours and now the 50 states are insane? Schizo maybe?

Can something be great and morally insane at the same time? The only example I could think of for this situation was Marilyn Monroe.

I'll decline mentioning anything substantial about the paper's editorials, as one might imagine which direction they lean, but the general synopsis is that all Democratic liberals are Communist liars. A special section on the opinions page has "Opinions from America." How nicely every letter sent in commended the moral majority.

The paper says that all mayors of cities which have a population greater than 50,000, President Reagan and even all nine justices of the Supreme Court are all readers of the Moral Majority Report. I did notice that nowhere on the cover or on the inside was any mention of the paper's cost. I even wonder how I got hold of this copy. I haven't seen any mayors cities which have a population of 50,000 or more, Ronald Reagan or any members of the Supreme Court lately. Divine intervention probably.

I read the paper from front to back. Stories about prayer in school, child abuse and gay rights. And all so politically unbiased that the most important item I caught in the paper was that Falwell wore the same tie in every picture except one.

Manhattan City Pool lifeguards Rab Clarke, senior in industrial engineering, and Ron Nolder, senior in management, keep a close eye on swimmers to ensure their safety Wednesday afternoon.

Lifeguarding is work, not playtime

By VIKKI WATSON
Staff Writer

It's 105 degrees — no wind, a scorching sun. The noses and shoulders of hundreds of water-worshippers will crack and burn sending them scurrying home for cool relief. And they can go home. One lone figure can't.

That lone figure is a lifeguard — the guard of young and old in the not-so-glamorous, somewhat fatiguing world of water fun.

It's a world filled with long hours, little pay and even less thanks when these guardians of the water take the stand. A typical day could begin at 8:20 a.m. and end at 9 p.m. for those who do double duty with teaching lessons in the morning and guarding in the afternoon.

K-State student Betsy Bachofer, junior in sociology, does just that, spending an eight-hour, 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. day in the sun before heading off to another part-time job. That eight-hour shift is far from all fun and games, Bachofer said.

"When you have 1,100 kids yelling at you all day it takes a toll," she said. "You're really tired by the end of the day."

Acquiring a watchful eye comes from the instruction of the advanced lifesaving program — the instruction that the Manhattan Municipal City Pool requires all its guards to have.

Patty Johnson, head Water Safety Instruction (WSI) teacher, insures the safety of swimmers by putting those in her advanced lifesaving class through a variety of demanding skill tests. They're tests that many fail to pass.

"It's a hard class," Bachofer said. "The instructor always makes it harder than it is so you're prepared for it."

"Probably 40 percent of my students don't pass the first time," Johnson said. "You've got to be a strong swimmer."

A strong swimmer, indeed, as each potential guard is required to save a pre-selected "victim" during class time. The victims are not always cooperative or easy to handle, Johnson said.

"A good victim doesn't help them kick in," she said. "I try to make it realistic. If they've got somebody they don't think they can handle then that's what (water safety) equipment is for."

The actual rescue sequences of the course are only one of several areas touched on during the class's six-week period. First aid is an area that Johnson heavily emphasizes during the instruction.

"I really concentrate a lot on the first aid part of it," she said. "One-third (of the course) is on personal safety, one-third on rescue and one-third on first aid."

Once past the rigorous demands of advanced lifesaving, the student is then qualified to tackle the responsibilities of lifeguarding—at least at the city pool, where advanced lifesaving is required of each guard and WSI certification is required in order to teach lessons.

If selected for the job, the soon-to-be guard will be one of 40 to 50 guards that work either Manhattan's city pool or one of the city's two neighborhood swimming spots. It will most likely be the beginning of a long, sun-soaked summer, said Bill Sanderson, assistant manager at the city pool.

"It can be very boring," Sanderson said. "You sit up there, it's 110 degrees and from 1 to 4 in the afternoon we probably have 300 to 400 kids in this pool under the age of 12. It's not as glamorous as you think."

Sun burnout is not uncommon, said Johnson, who took a break from a five-year stint of lifeguarding to concentrate solely on teaching. Those who both teach and guard are especially susceptible, she said.

"I had burnout," she said. "It's long days in hot sun and you can't do a quality job for four or five summers if you start out early in the morning and are here until 9 at night. It shows."

To combat that burnout and to keep a high level of concentration while working, each guard maintains a cautious eye on only one area of the pool for 20 minutes at a time, Sanderson said. The frequent breaks are necessary for optimum safety.

"We try to divide the pool into fourths so each guard watches their area. A guard won't stay in one area of the pool longer than 20 minutes and that keeps them fresh. They watch the pool at all times and keep their heads moving."

That constant eye movement could mean the difference between preventing a life-endangering event and having to apply life-saving techniques to save one's life.

"Most of their work is preventive and disciplinary," Sanderson said, "but we had to once save a little boy who was by the rope and couldn't touch (the pool bottom). He panicked and the guard went in after him."

It's this literal lifesaving responsibility that keeps guards coming back year after year, said Bruce Bingham, head lifeguard at the city pool, who has been guarding for four years. Bingham has found it necessary to save five children during his guarding experience.

"One kid went off the diving board and his two brothers swam away," Bingham said. "I went in, talked to him, grabbed hold and pulled him in. He was relatively calm."

Staying calm isn't always the easiest thing to do when one's life is hanging on your actions, said Bachofer, who was forced to do some lifesaving of her own while working in Salina.

"We'd have little kids going in and they'd go down," she said. "It's really scary. It scares you more than the kid because it's your responsibility."

That responsibility could include helping one or more of the 44 swimming classes offered at the city pool each morning as well as guarding during the afternoons. Such long hours can take their toll when it comes to skin care, said Bachofer, who makes it a point to protect her skin when facing a long workday in the sun.

"My skin gets real dry," Bachofer said. "I wear a lot of sunscreen and I wear a hat."

While many people think a lifeguard's job is an easy one, the guard sees it differently.

"Some people don't take this as a very serious job," Bingham said. "They think all we do is come out here and sit in the lifeguard stand and get a tan."

"Sitting up there in that chair is a job, not playtime," Johnson said.

IOC president warns of '88 Games boycott

By The Associated Press

PARIS — Juan Antonio Samaranch, president of the International Olympic Committee, said the Olympic movement may not survive a possible Soviet-bloc boycott of the 1988 Summer Games scheduled in Seoul, South Korea.

"The Olympic Games would not get over it," Samaranch said in an interview with the Paris sports daily L'Equipe. "In fact, the prospects for 1988 depend, above all, on a relaxation of tension between East and West."

"If the situation remains as it is at present, or if we go through still greater crises, we would have to fear the worst," he said from IOC headquarters in Lausanne, Switzerland.

Samaranch declined to indicate whether he might ask South Korea to forgo the 1988 Games in favor of a less controversial site.

"For the moment, Los Angeles is our principal concern," he said in the interview, published Monday. "On the evening of Aug. 12, following the closure of the (Los Angeles) Games, we will turn our attention to 1988."

"I will go to Moscow on Sept. 3, and to Seoul at the end of that month. The significance of these two visits is quite clear."

South Korea has no diplomatic relations with the Soviet bloc.

UPC offers opportunity in tourism planning

By LYNN BENDER
Collegian Reporter

The chance to pursue an interest in travel and to gain experience in the industry is a passion expressed by the many students who are volunteers for the Union Program Council Travel Committee.

These students devote many hours researching, planning and developing trips which they hope will be of interest to K-State students.

Many of the students who have become involved have taken previous trips sponsored by the UPC travel committee. They have expressed an interest in building a trip from scratch and seeing it develop because of their work and determination.

"As far as returning members, this year's (1984-85) committee has the most experience," said Sylvia Scott, program adviser for the Union. "The returning committee members know what is involved in planning a trip, are kind of prepared for it, and some of the disappointments don't seem so big."

Whether a new or returning member, "being part of this committee is very good for the student; it teaches patience, exposes you to what it is really like to try and sell a program that you start from the very beginning," Scott said.

In deciding which trips will be offered for the coming year, committee members talk with students and research trips which they think will interest K-State students.

"We really try and find out where K-State students want to go and what we can feasibly do," Scott said.

After the research has been completed, the trips are chosen. Committee members then choose a trip which they are most interested in developing, and begin the planning stages.

"The committee members devise their own publicity campaigns, they try and get across to students what they are getting for their money," Scott said.

The committee picks a first and second choice for each trip which will be offered.

"Proposals are submitted by travel agencies that primarily center on college students. We compare the proposals in terms of quality and location of lodging, extra offerings and price," Scott said.

The bottom line in determining which trips will be chosen, Scott said, is cost and quality.

"One of the biggest things is the money involved, because we know that college students, in general, do not have a lot of money. We are very concerned about quality and the professionalism we have tried to establish with the UPC travel name," she added.

Scott's biggest role with the committee is that of an adviser. She described her main responsibilities as "making sure the budgets and contracts are followed, and that the students working on the committee are getting something out of being involved."

In terms of the budget, "we do not price for a profit, we are here to provide for the students," Scott said. "Our budget is $625 a year, and we must stay within it. It is not very much when it comes right down to it, with supplies, publicity, and everything else involved."

Another part of her job is to make sure that the agencies provide what was originally agreed upon in the contracts.

The biggest frustration for the committee, Scott said, is when the travel agencies do not live up to their promises and contracts.

"We do not run into this problem very often. Most agencies try to do what's right because their name depends on it," she said.

"It's hard to prove in monetary terms what you have lost. Basically what you lose when you work with an agency like that is your professional name, which is very important to us. Students do not know if it's your fault or the agency's," she added.

Scott gains enjoyment from seeing students who develop and grow through their involvement and experiences with UPC travel.

For the 1984-85 school year, UPC travel is planning a six-day Christmas break trip Jan. 6-13, 1985, to Steamboat Springs, Colo.

"Steamboat just seems to be getting bigger and bigger every year in terms of popularity. Many colleges go out there during the two-week spring break period," Scott said.

The tentative schedule for spring break will probably include a sun trip and a ski trip. The first choice for the sun trip is Fort Lauderdale, Fla., with Padre Island, Texas, as the second choice.

"We would like to see the Florida trip include air fare. If we take a bus it would take approximately 35 hours, because the bus has regulations on where they have to stop," Scott said.

A ski trip was offered some years back during the spring break period, but has not been offered recently because of the lack of time to promote the trip, Scott said.

The sun trips and the Christmas ski trip, Scott said, seem to be very popular with the K-State students. "They have come to expect these trips from us over the years," she said.

The committee will be trying something new this year — mini trips — including the Winfield Bluegrass festival on Sept. 13-16. The committee will be begin selling tickets for the trip as soon as the fall semester begins.

Some of the new trips which are being considered include: horse races, Kansas City Royals baseball games, Silver Dollar City and Worlds of Fun. The trips would be scheduled over a weekend period or possibly a three-day weekend.

Engineers celebrate early birthday on Washington Monument's 100th

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The 100th anniversary of the completion of the Washington Monument was celebrated a few months early Wednesday with speeches, a huge obelisk-shaped cake and plans for new sidewalks on the slopes of one of the capital's best-known landmarks.

The centennial celebration was held on a muggy, 93-degree day in July instead of the monument's actual Dec. 6 birthday so the festivities could be coordinated with the 50th anniversary convention of the National Society of Professional Engineers.

The heat may have been one reason Interior Secretary William Clark scrapped a plan to ride to the celebration on horseback.

Clark read the audience of several hundred people a letter from President Reagan thanking the society, which has published a booklet on the monument for visitors and is planning to build two new sidewalks to carry tourists to the memorial.

The monument, towering 555 feet, 5 1/8 inches above the Mall behind the White House, attracted 1,212,736 visitors last year, according to the National Park Service.

Robert Stanton, deputy regional Park Service director, said the monument is "a beacon of hope for a more perfect America."

It was a bitterly cold and windy day 99 years, seven months and five days ago when engineers placed an aluminum cap on the famed obelisk to mark its completion.

And on Feb. 21, 1885, when the monument was dedicated, it was so cold that the few people who attended fled indoors after one speech, and the ceremony had to adjourn to the Capitol.

The monument was opened to the public on Oct. 9, 1888.

Celebrating the monument's 100th anniversary on the wrong day seems in keeping with the tradition of the memorial to George Washington.

The monument, after all, was not built according to the original design, although it is similar. And it stands close to — but not on — the site selected by Washington's city planner, Pierre L'Enfant.

The original plan did call for a giant obelisk, but it also was to have included a large, circular building at the base, containing a pantheon of statues of presidents and other national heroes.

Atop the main entrance of this grand building was to have been a huge statue of Washington riding in a Roman chariot drawn by four horses.

Money problems, which plagued the project from the start, combined with politics and the Civil War to halt construction for years, and plans for the base building were dropped.

The Continental Congress voted 201 years ago to erect a statue to Gen. George Washington, but lack of funds delayed any action until a public fund-raising drive began in 1833. Construction finally began in 1847, and the cornerstone was laid July 4 the following year. Contributions totaling $230,000 ran out by 1854, when the monument had reached 154 feet in height.

After 36 years, five months and two days, the monument was completed. The final cost was $1,187,710.

Fire damages boat, marina at Tuttle Lake

By The Associated Press

A pontoon boat docked at Tuttle Creek Lake caught fire and exploded before dawn Wednesday, destroying the boat and a dock at the Spillway Marina, authorities said.

Investigator Gerald Schmidt of the Pottawatomie County Sheriff's Department estimated damage to the 42-foot boat at $20,000. He said damage to the marina was estimated at $50,000.

No one was on the boat at the time, and no injuries were reported.

Democrats prepare for convention's outset

Mondale reinstates Manatt as chairman

By The Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — Walter F. Mondale, flinching from a confrontation on the eve of the Democratic National Convention, reinstated Democratic party chairman Charles T. Manatt on Sunday — 24 hours after he fired him.

Mondale thus moved to quell a revolt among party leaders that threatened to sour the convention excitement greeting his selection of Geraldine Ferraro as vice presidential running mate.

Just hours before campaign chairman James Johnson announced that Manatt would stay, Mondale, at his retreat in Lake Tahoe, Calif., dismissed the flap as an "inevitable rumble," and said, "We're about to have one of the sweetest conventions in the history of the Democratic party."

But even as his press secretary, Maxine Isaacs, was saying the furor had caused "no erosion" in support from convention delegates, Mondale dispatched top aide James Johnson on a rescue mission to San Francisco.

Johnson met with Manatt and Bert Lance, the former confidant of Jimmy Carter whom Mondale elevated on Saturday to the post of general campaign chairman. At meeting's end, Johnson said, "Chuck Manatt has agreed to continue as chairman" of the DNC. He also named longtime Mondale aide Michael Berman as a top party official.

Before the convention, Manatt had made it clear he wished to hold on to his post through the November election. Mondale praised and fired him at the same time on Saturday, saying it was time for a change.

Word of the Manatt-Lance changes set off a wave of protest from party leaders and delegates streaming into San Francisco for the convention, which opens on Monday in a session highlighted by New York Gov. Mario Cuomo's keynote address and a speech by former President Carter. Mondale's reversal was greeted with relief.

"I think Bert will do a terrific job in the section of the country where he comes from," said House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill. "That's where he's needed and that's where he'll be working."

Lance's wife, LaBelle, said, "whatever fallout there might have been is over."

Mondale's opponents for the presidential nomination huddled in a hotel near the convention hall, with the Rev. Jesse Jackson saying he and Gary Hart were working on a challenge to Mondale's platform. Hart said his main interest was a non-intervention plank regarding Central America.

The city lived up to its boisterous reputation, tens of thousands of gay men and women marched two miles to a parking-lot rally across the street from the convention center. Earlier, an estimated 150,000 union members — led by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland — marched in a colorful "unity" rally. Labor leaders said the march was non-political, but many of the marchers carried anti-Reagan signs.

In her first interview since being named to Mondale's ticket, Rep. Geraldine Ferraro said she expects the issues of war and peace to highlight the fall race with President Reagan.

"If we don't start negotiating, it's all over," she said. "...I'd hope we'd reach out to the Soviets."

As to her historic selection, the

Unusual week awaits political observers

By LAURI DIEHL
Editor

One thing is certain, this week's Democratic National Convention will be anything but boring.

The political action will begin today in San Francisco's George R. Moscone Center, but events taking place outside the center threaten to draw more media attention than those officially scheduled.

Analysis

Groups as mainstream as the National Organization for Women, the United Church of Christ and nuclear freeze activists will compete for coverage against some less easily recognizable. A "Rock Against Reagan Racism" concert, a possible vice presidential nomination from a group called Bisexual Politics, children break dancing for peace and a parade of marijuana enthusiasts carrying a 12-foot-high joint and giant marijuana leaf may seal the impression for the rest of the nation that San Francisco is just a little different.

Walter Mondale is the apparent Democratic presidential nominee. With his history-making choice of Rep. Geraldine Ferraro, R-N.Y., as a vice presidential running mate, Mondale hopes to avoid a convention floor fight led by women's groups and exploit the gender gap to defeat President Reagan in the fall.

Mondale's choice of Ferraro was a gamble. Women are potentially the nation's strongest interest group — almost 54 percent of the electorate — but the existence of a gender gap is a highly debated subject. However, the possibility was great enough to lead Reagan to compare Ferraro's selection to his appointment of Sandra Day O'Connor to the U.S. Supreme Court and claim women's interests are best represented by the Republican party.

Perhaps Reagan has reason to be concerned. Although an Associated Press survey taken last week showed 35 of 44 Kansas delegates to the convention expect Reagan to beat Mondale in the state, this is not typical for the nation as a whole.

A Newsweek magazine poll showed that Reagan and Vice President George Bush would defeat a Mondale-Ferraro ticket if the election had been held Saturday — but only by 6 percentage points. That's not much of a margin for an incumbent president several months before the election.

However, there are still wild cards in the Democratic camp. Mondale seems to have reached an accord with Gary Hart and Jesse Jackson, but that truce is very fragile.

Jackson has acknowledged Mondale as the party's nominee, and Mondale aides have devised a plan to give Jackson recognition and television time at the convention. But all may not be well. Jackson's alliance with Black Muslim Louis Farrakhan may cause more political woe for Mondale than it did for Jackson.

Farrakhan's anti-Semitic slurs have led influential Jewish leaders to call for Mondale to repudiate Jackson. He cannot do this — the black vote is too important. Black and Jewish voters are traditional supporters of the Democratic party, but Mondale may find himself unable to hold both in November.

As Newsweek columnist George Will observed, Mondale is a Houdini.

Thatcher threatens union strikers with talk of using military troops

By The Associated Press

LONDON — Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher has hinted that troops may be used to deal with spreading strikes that are choking British trade, forcing down the nation's currency and stock prices, and now threaten tourism chaos.

The transport union has called for a halt to passenger ferry traffic across the English Channel at Dover starting today, the first day of school vacation.

Coming during the busiest tourist season, a Dover shutdown would affect tens of thousands of foreign and British vacationers.

Thatcher scheduled an emergency today Cabinet meeting to formulate her response to the strikes.

"The country will not be held to ransom by a tiny minority — 200,000 at the most — who are trying to impose their will on the other 56 million of us," Thatcher told a meeting in her north London electoral district of Finchley on Saturday night.

"The government will do everything necessary to keep the country working," she said in response to a question about what was planned.

British newspapers, whose reporters are regularly briefed by government ministers, interpreted her comment as a threat to declare a state of emergency and use troops to keep ports open.

James Gilligan, secretary of the 1.5 million-member Transport and General Workers Union's Scottish section, said that mobilizing troops would cause "total disaster."

About 35,000 of the union's members are longshoremen.

Denzil Davies, defense spokesman for the socialist opposition Labor Party, said using troops "would only exacerbate the existing situation...and make a reasonable solution even less likely."

The longshoremen's strike was called on Tuesday by the transport union to protest of the use of non-union labor to unload iron ore for the British Steel Corp.'s Scunthorpe plant. The dockers had refused to handle the ore in support of the 19-week old coalminer's strike.

Most of the nation's 183,000 coal miners went on strike on March 12 to protest plans by the state-owned National Coal Board to shut down 20 unprofitable mines and reduce the workforce by 20,000.

Dover was jammed with traffic on Sunday as trucks and vacationers sought space on the last boats to leave. Six miles of highway were sealed off by police to serve as an emergency parking lot.

On an average summer day, 30,000 people, 7,000 cars, 400 buses and 1,800 trucks would be expected to use Dover port.

Package tour firms were scrambling to make alternate arrangements for tourists.

There have been no reports of shortages or hoarding as a result of the dock strike. But tons of bananas, tomatoes and other fruits and vegetables were reported rotting in warehouses and ships' holds. The price of tomatoes, imported from the Channel Islands or the continent, rose.

About 90 British ports have been closed, and employers estimated three-quarters of the nation's import and export goods were strike-bound.

The 25,000-member National Union of Seamen, who work on freight ferries, struck in support of their fellow unionists and to protest government plans to sell profitable ferry services to private enterprise.

Miss Lawrence wins state pageant

By STEVE SWAFFORD
Staff Writer

PRATT — Nancy Cobb, representing Miss Lawrence, was crowned the new Miss Kansas as the state's pageant came to a close Saturday night.

Attending the 30th Anniversary of the Miss Kansas Pageant were 13 former Miss Kansas' and Gov. John Carlin, who crowned Cobb as Miss Kansas. 1984 Miss Nebraska and 1984 Miss Wyoming attended the Pratt based event.

Cobb, junior in physical therapy at the University of Kansas, captured the title, along with a $3,000 scholarship, she fell one step short of receiving last year. In 1983, Cobb was first runner-up to last year's Miss Kansas, Laura Watters.

In 1983, Cobb represented Miss Wichita and was a preliminary winner in the swimsuit competition. This year she nabbed the preliminary talent award on Thursday evening with a piano/vocal number but didn't repeat her win in the swimsuit competition.

Donna Payne, Miss Wichita, was named first runner-up and will represent Kansas in the Miss Sweetheart Pageant in Hoopston, Ill. the week before the Miss America Pageant. Payne was awarded $1775 for her first runner-up title. The Miss Sweetheart Pageant is like the Miss America Pageant but its contestants are all first runner-ups from state pageants.

Second runner-up was Kim Albright, who represented Miss Hutchinson. Albright, junior in psychology at K-State, won the preliminary talent award Friday evening. She sang a medley of rain songs for her talent and received a $900 scholarship as second runner-up.

University considers cooperative child care

By LISA WILSON
Collegian Reporter

Changing economic and social conditions in the United States have created an unprecedented demand for child care. As a result, there is increasing awareness of the need for local solutions to child care problems.

Laverne Lindsey, assistant provost for Continuing Education, said her department is attempting to establish a parent cooperative program at K-State.

The program would include a child care center run by the parents of children who attend the center.

Lindsey said parents interested in the program will be organized into a private, nonprofit corporation.

"All parents will be on the board of directors and will approve the plans for the operation of the child care center," she said. "Parents will teach as volunteers in the educational program, supervising play, formats and schedules."

Lindsey said there are three major concerns related to the child care issue at K-State. The first is economics.

"One of my major expenses in going to school is paying for a baby sitter and most student-parents don't have much money," said Jayne Dowell, junior in prenursing. "I did a lot of calling to day care centers and most were rather expensive and would not fit into our budget."

Mark Stallings, president of the Manhattan Child Care Management Corporation, said he attributes the high cost of quality child care to current child care regulations.

"There is a certain adult-child ratio for each level from infant on and we must pay minimum wage to those adults, plus general overhead, so by charging $15 a day for one child is barely breaking even," he said.

Secondly, to ensure proper care, parents want to be involved in the child care programs in which they enroll their children.

"It would be terribly inconvenient for a full-time faculty member, student or staff to become involved (with the child care program) if they have to drive clear across town to get to a child with the little time that they have (during the day)," Lindsey said.

Finally, parents involved with the University are asking for proximity of child care to K-State.

"If we (K-State) had a child care facility here they (the parents) could have lunch with their child and maybe spend an hour or so working with them," Lindsey said.

Lindsey said a parent cooperative program is labor intensive and a large percentage of adults are required to supervise the children in order to comply with current child care regulations.

"I do, philosophically, believe that surrogate mothers who have invested an interest in raising a child themselves make much better care givers than a professional care giver who is in the business for the money," Lindsey said. "We have some really talented people here and these children would be so enriched by being associated with them."

Lindsey said the program is in planning stages and a recommendation has been made to President Duane Acker about alternatives for implementing the program at K-State.

"We are a long way from getting the details worked out. President Acker was very supportive and it looks as if we will be able to do most of what we had planned," Lindsey said.

Individuals intending to use the program, Lindsey said, must first buy a share of stock in the corporation at about $35 a share, and eventually raise the money to hire a director to coordinate the schedule, ensuring continuity in the program.

Fees charged for other services would be prorated according to the amount of time the parents volunteered and used the program.

"Fees would be flexibly structured so that people who have more time to give would be charged less for their children being involved," Lindsey said.

She said the program would not be limited to parents who volunteer their time.

"Some people might never volunteer and pay top dollar for their child's care," Lindsey said.

Lindsey said no differentiations will be made between students, faculty or employees of the University. A building specifically designed for the program is in the planning stage and will eventually be built, but until then temporary housing is being sought, Lindsey said.

"The Ecumenical Christian Ministries has expressed a willingness to work with us and the Early Childhood Education Laboratory is available in the afternoons and evenings. The director of that building has promised cooperation in determining what the uses of that building can be for us," she said.

"We would definitely be willing to help, but because it is in negotiation stages, I don't know where it will lead," Rod Saunders, director of Ecumenical Christian Ministries, said.

Lindsey said she has studied other parent cooperative programs and

Academic issues gain top priority for ASK

By KEM ARST
Collegian Reporter

The Associated Students of Kansas (ASK) last big project was lobbying against the drinking age bill. The organization's next lobbying effort is geared toward academic and student financing.

"ASK is not devoted entirely for that purpose (the drinking age bill) and never has been," said Tracy Turner, junior in economics and Student Senate chairman. "ASK has always lobbied for issues in the best interest of the students."

"Academic issues have always been the top priority of ASK. Even in the midst of all this drinking business, the No. 1 priority has always been securing more funds and providing support for higher education," Turner said.

Lobbying issues are decided upon by a student legislative assembly, Turner said. The Kansas assembly is composed of student delegates from regent schools which include Fort Hays State University, K-State, the University of Kansas, Washburn University, Emporia State University, Wichita State University and Pittsburg State University. Each university is allowed one delegate for each 1,000 students. K-State has 18 student delegates.

Mark Tallman, ASK executive director, said the Kansas Board of Regents met last year to propose preliminary issues to be discussed by the legislative assembly this fall.

The development of a merit pay pool for student workers is one of the first proposals scheduled for discussion.

"We want to set up a system where students who have worked on campus for a year or more and who have performed well, will have the opportunity for a raise," Tallman said.

The raises are necessary because of cost increases for students, Tallman said.

"While costs have risen considerably in the last four years, minimum wage has stayed about the same," he said.

"In 1981 a work-study student, earning minimum wage and working 15 hours a week for eight months, was able to make enough to cover 47 percent of his total college costs," Tallman said. "In the past five years, the total cost a student could earn on work-study has dropped from one-half to one-third of his total costs, so that in the fall of '85 a student on minimum wage will only be able to cover 32.5 percent of his total costs."

This program is geared toward helping the student maintain a job and keep up with the costs of education, Tallman said.

"Currently, the University is hiring a larger number of students at minimum wage and fewer hours. We are hoping to receive enough money from the Kansas Legislature to implement this new program, where we could keep our valuable students and increase their wages," Tallman said.

In order to do this, ASK is requesting a 7 percent student wage increase and an additional 3 percent increase in funds to create new jobs for a larger number of students, Tallman said.

ASK will continue lobbying efforts to increase student benefits by pushing for a restructuring of the state scholarship program, Tallman said. Currently, the scholarship is funded through a federal program aimed at offering financial incentives to high school students who stay in the state for college.

"The program was developed to offer an incentive for high school students who achieved an American Collegiate Testing (ACT) score of 30 or above and who also had a financial need. The student also has to achieve a grade point average of 3.0 and maintain this average. The student must also stay at a university in the state," Tallman said.

The scholarship, which was originally $500, was reduced to $350 so that a larger number of students could benefit, Tallman said.

"The $500 figure was fine in 1963, because it more than covered a student's college costs (above tuition)," Tallman said.

"Now, the scholarship has lost its incentive. Three-hundred and fifty dollars doesn't even cover tuition, so the program is hardly an incentive in itself. What the regents have accepted to propose, is a new program which would provide $2,000 a year for 125 students," Tallman said.

"The student would have to achieve a score of 30 or above on the ACT and maintain a grade point average of 3.5 or above but, the student would not necessarily need to be in financial need," Tallman said.

It has been proposed that those students receiving the $2,000 scholarship, be designated as Regent Scholars, said Ken Heinz, junior in computer science and student body president.

"The new program would be based on merit efforts only. The current state program would be left as is, using existing state funds for a need-based merit program," Heinz said.

Tallman said that ASK will need $1 million in state funds in order to fully implement the program.

"It is important to keep quality students in-state, and this kind of incentive would definitely be appealing to high school students," Tallman said.

Lobbying efforts are also under way to benefit graduate teaching aides and graduate teaching assistants, Tallman said.

Currently, graduate teaching assistants receive a 40 percent reduction on tuition costs.

"We are asking for a total of $275,000 of state aid so that these students will only have to pay about 25 percent of their total costs," Tallman said.

The Student Advisory Committee (SAC), which is comprised of all the student body presidents from the regent institutions, will be working closely in conjunction with ASK to find a way that best serves the needs of the students attending the regent schools, Heinz said.

"In the fall, SAC and ASK will be lobbying in Topeka to encourage the Legislature to accept the system-wide student concerns proposals."

Program supplies internship, publicity

By GARY NELSON
Collegian Reporter

K-State receives over $500 worth of publicity for the mere investment of about 50 cents for a telephone call.

A radio actuality program, developed by Norma Ross, research and planning specialist for University Relations, supplies research for radio stations throughout Kansas and one station in Nebraska. Student interns help to supply the research.

A radio actuality is a taped portion of an interview that can be played back over the radio to waiting listeners.

"We (K-State) are helping the radio experts do their research by contacting our own experts here at the University," Ross said.

Ross explained that news from the newspapers are generally the idea sources used for topics.

Ross said that University Relations "always uses news. We don't do any promo stories — maybe feature-type stories, but never any promotional stories."

The news is taken from all around the world and then commented on by K-State's experts through the use of the radio actualities.

"It helps to increase the credibility of K-State's professionals," Ross said.

These radio actualities are sent to more than 30 radio stations. Each station is called and asked if it is interested in airing the story. If so, the information can be fed over the phone at that moment.

In a survey prepared by University Relations to analyze the air time K-State receives on its radio actuality stories, more than 85 percent of the radio stations surveyed said they want stories. Over 41 percent of the stations said they used the radio actualities in two of their newscasts and nearly 26 percent said they used three of the actualities.

"We've made sure everything is legal with the help of KMAN," Ross said. "They helped us get the right equipment necessary to meet FCC (Federal Communications Commission) requirements."

"I try to have at least two interns each semester," Ross said. "One just isn't enough to handle everything."

Ross said interns are required to work 120 hours per semester in return for one hour of college credit through the journalism and mass communications department.

"They may be hired and paid minimum wage later on after completing an internship," Ross said.

Students must produce at least five stories per month and report into the office of University Relations one to three times weekly.

"I write two evaluations during the internship on the student's work," Ross said. "One about midway and a final summary."

The students' goal, as listed in the radio actuality student handbook, is to "provide Kansas radio listeners with comments from Kansas State University experts on timely subjects."

The majority of interns who apply for this program are radio and television majors.

"Many of my students are now out in the profession," Ross said. "This builds a great support system for me and for K-State."

Labor unions demonstrate to show Mondale support

By The Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — About 150,000 labor union members carrying anti-Reagan signs marched through downtown San Francisco on Sunday in a festive "unity" parade on the eve of the Democratic National Convention.

It was the first of two marches scheduled the day before today's opening of the four-day convention. Gay rights activists were planning to march later to the convention site, the Moscone Center.

Unions and police had predicted a turnout of 100,000 for the labor parade, but motorcycle policeman Don Moorehouse toured part of the parade route shortly after the start at 10 a.m. and estimated the crowd at about 35,000.

By early afternoon, the crowd swelled to 150,000, police said.

Representatives of 50 labor councils, many dressed in distinctive uniforms, accompanied vintage fire trucks and cars and Chinese dragon dancers on the one-mile Market Street parade route lined with colored bunting.

Streets were crowded with buses, in addition to a dozen huge tractor-trailers brought by Teamsters to the parade.

The Teamsters, who have not endorsed a presidential candidate, co-sponsored the parade as a "unity" event along with the AFL-CIO and the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland marched at the front along with longshoremen's leader Harry Bridges, who led a West Coast dock strike 50 years ago.

Labor leaders billed their march as "non-political," saying their themes would be "labor's goals of full employment and social justice."

But most union leaders have strongly supported former Vice President Walter F. Mondale's presidential candidacy.

Democrats

New York congressman said she wasn't picked "just because I am a woman. There was more to it than that — my strength as a prosecutor, someone with the ability to take on issues." She said she wants the public to evaluate her "by the same standards as they judge the guys."

With Mondale and Ferraro 200 miles away from the convention hall, state Democratic leaders complained bitterly about the dismissal of Manatt.

Cuomo spoke with Mondale about Manatt and Lance, an old Carter confidant and now chairman of the state party in Georgia.

"I'm trying to play it down,"

Cuomo said Sunday.

Mondale said he was "very comfortable with the judgment" to give the job to Lance, a confidant of Jimmy Carter. "I thought this was the best job and I'm convinced it is."

Jackson and Hart moved about San Francisco promoting their own candidacies and vowing to force floor debates over the party platform. Hart said he'd press for a provision prohibiting U.S. military force in Central America, saying it "may be the only serious issue debated at this convention."

"I'm doing this party, I think, a favor," Hart told CBS News. "I don't know what the rush is to get me out of this race. I'm a legitimate candidate and I've opened up this party to an awful lot of people."

San Francisco swelled with the arrival of Democratic delegates — including one, Iowa Democratic chairman David Nagle, who was combining his political business with a West Coast honeymoon.

The city lived up to its boisterous reputation, as tens of thousands of union members paraded downtown in a festive demonstration of "unity" and gay activists arranged to march later in the day to the convention site.

That had nothing to do with Mondale and the party shakeup. But Jackson and the barons of organized labor joined the state leaders in complaining about the startling decision to fire Manatt and install Lance.

Jackson, who met with Hart and Carter and spoke with Mondale, said the four-day meeting would be a "convention, not a coronation," and said that in devising a platform,

Mondale's forces had thrown "no gesture of substance...to the black community."

Hart muted his own criticism of the Manatt-Lance affair, saying, "Almost every presidential campaign makes mistakes." Appearing on ABC TV, he said the move may have cost Mondale "perhaps 25 to 50 delegates" — although only two came forward — and suggested that the fear of further losses led Mondale to name Lance as general campaign chairman instead of a replacement for Manatt.

Jackson called Mondale's decision a "fiasco," and complained he was not consulted. "When you get to the World Series, you don't want to change plays and players."

Analysis

in-reverse: put him in any position of safety and he can swiftly escape into danger. He did just that Saturday by dumping Charles Manatt as party chairman and appointing Bert Lance, Georgia party chief and budget director during the Carter administration.

This move has the potential to start a rebellion among convention delegates. It is traditional for the party's new presidential nominee to install the party chairman of his choice, but many were surprised that Mondale would make such a move before becoming the official candidate.

Drawing attention to the Carter-Mondale connection is the last thing most Democrats want to do. This connection has been a drawback for Mondale throughout the primary campaign. Lance resigned as budget director amid questions about his financial dealings. Not only did Mondale's announcement re-emphasize this tie, it reminds voters that a number of Carter appointees did not stand up under the scrutiny of a high public office.

Hart's campaign manager said the announcement may convince large numbers of delegates to switch from Mondale to Hart. If so, the convention could turn into a free-for-all floor fight with party unity the big loser.

For political groupies, the Democratic National Convention promises to be a welcome relief in a long, dull summer. For those who don't care about politics, keep an eye on the convention — it may be the best party around.

Choral institute to blend music, talent

By LISA WILSON
Collegian Reporter

A blend of spirit, musical talent, team effort and a standard of excellence will be shared during the Sixth Annual Summer Choral Institute sponsored by the Department of Music this week.

The institute, which begins Tuesday and continues through Saturday, is designed for gifted high school sophomores and juniors who receive full scholarships through auditions. Three divisions of the institute include choral, keyboard and one which has been added this year for string instruments.

K-State's music faculty will instruct participants in each of those divisions.

Approximately 160 high school students from all parts of Kansas auditioned, but only 44 were chosen.

"We take the ones who are the best that we hear," Rod Walker, director of choral studies and founder of the institute, said. "But because the group must be balanced, we are limited, so there are some very good students who were left out, unfortunately."

Walker said only high school sophomores and juniors are allowed to participate because they can share their experience in the institute with other students in their respective high school choirs in the upcoming year.

Five nights of rehearsals with Cliff Bunford, head of vocal studies and choral training at University College, Cardiff, Wales, will lead to a final performance on Saturday.

"They (the students) can, for the first time, see what they can conceivably do with music in their lives," Walker said.

He said the institute's learning experience is reciprocal among students, teachers and professionals.

"We are trying to help motivate and show the word 'excellence,'" Walker said, adding that the key to excellence is to maintain high standards.

"Students who come here are treated like young professionals with high standards," Walker said. "I have seen these kids change totally in just the five days of the institute."

Concurrently with the institute, the Ninth Annual American Symposium for Choral Music is being held. It begins today and concludes Friday. Choral musicians from 15 states, Canada and the Bahama Islands will attend.

Both events are sponsored by The Master Teacher Institute and K-State's music department.

In the symposium, participants will share working experiences and to sing together in a choir under the direction of John Alldis, founder and conductor of the London Symphony Chorus.

"During the year they (the music teachers) give all of the time through conducting and rarely do they get to sit and sing," Walker said.

Additionally, seminars on motivation will be presented by Robert DeBruyn, founder of The Master Teacher Institute, and Jack Larson, director of seminars for The Master Teacher Institute.

Other seminars include teaching vocal techniques in a choral rehearsal; discipline and class management; and inspirational techniques.

Walker said a major concern among music teachers is motivating students to achieve excellence in their musical ability.

"You hear so much 'I can't' in our society and it's not true," Walker said. "We want to say 'you can be somebody.'"

The symposium has been expanded to include elementary and middle school music teachers for the first time, Walker said.

"We are addressing some of their problems now. I felt that we could serve more people that way," Walker said.

Walker, who was raised in a small western Nebraska town, said he was inspired by his high school music teacher who constantly encouraged and held high standards for students. "If it hadn't been for him I might still be out in that town selling shoes. I was very fortunate and I want to create that encouragement and high standard in others," Walker said. "This kind of experience changed me and that is why I have ended up doing what I have been doing."

While well-known conductors are working with the high school students in the institute, teachers participating in the symposium observe. Later they can talk with those conductors and ask questions.

"You bring together 44 highly motivated kids in the area of music and it is like electricity that goes off," Walker said. "If teachers just sit there and watch them, they can pick up ideas to take home to their students."

A maximum tuition of $250 was required for participation in the symposium in return for two hours of college credit.

Walker said the money will go toward defraying the cost of the symposium.

High school cheerleaders meet to improve squads

"Spi-rit, spirit leads to a victory!"

This is just one of the many spirit cheers that will be heard across campus this week as K-State sponsors the National Cheerleading Association's cheerleading, pompon and drill team camp.

An expected 600 participants from Kansas, Nebraska and Missouri will begin registering Tuesday morning for the four-day camp and will be staying in Haymaker Hall.

Scheduled activities and sessions for the week include skits, rallies, workshops and evaluations.

The NCA clinic is to help better the squad unit, as well as personal growth. Evaluation sessions are incorporated into the camp to help improve the techniques and help prepare the squads' leadership for promoting spirit.

was impressed with the Rustin Children Center in Rustin, Va.

Lindsey said the Rustin Children Center has 12 hours of child care daily and drop-in programs for an hour or two in the satellite homes. There are summer enrichment programs that are camp style for children who are school age.

Parents are instructed through seminars on how to organize satellite centers in their neighborhoods, Lindsey said. The satellite centers — used for "drop-in" purposes in the morning or afternoons for school-age children — enable volunteer parents to contribute time to the program in their home.

Lindsey said the first two years of the parent cooperative program at K-State are to serve as an experimental period.

"In two years' time we will know specifically the needs — how many children there could be anticipated — and we could be better prepared to build a building that would be big enough to serve the needs," she said.

Apple pie licks sauerkraut in 1943 film

By WAYNE PRICE
Arts and Features Editor

"Casablanca" was the film of my generation's youth, just as Bogart was the man and Ingrid Bergman the woman. Those were times when things were so much simpler; the good guys and the bad guys so much more clearly defined and the struggle itself, the moral imperative for man, so much more easily seen."

So wrote Ralph J. Gleason in the introduction to Howard Koch's book "Casablanca." And he's right. "Casablanca" is classic good guy defeats bad guy, apple pie smothered sauerkraut. Though not a rarity, the 1943 film, which won Oscars for Best Picture, Best Actress and Best Director, is said to have been the most written about film next to "Citizen Kane."

The plot is simple enough. It's pre-World War II and Casablanca, Morocco, is like a car going the wrong way on a crowded one-way street: people are desperately making deals to obtain travel visas in order to get to free Lisbon before the Nazis take over.

The center of attention in the chaotic city is Rick's Place where the majority of the shady deals take place. Rick's Place is naturally run by hard guy, Rick (Humphrey Bogart), who was jilted in France a couple of years before by a French girl named Ilsa (Ingrid Bergman). The olive in the martini is that two irrevocable travel visas are reported missing from two German soldiers found dead.

WAYNE PRICE
Arts and Features Editor

The night at Rick's begins as usual: Sam (Dooley Wilson), smiles big and plays numerous tunes on the piano, while Ugarte (Peter Lorre), does his best to get Rick's respect. No dice though. Ugarte gives Rick an envelope which contains, of course, the travel visas.

Enter the Nazis, who kill Ugarte. Enter Ilsa and her French Resistance-leader husband, Laszlo, and the show is on.

Strasser, a German officer will stop at nothing to catch Laszlo, and Laszlo will stop at nothing to get the two visas, and Rick and Ilsa, well, they try to figure out exactly what went wrong.

What makes the film is Bogart. Even though he didn't win an Academy Award for this performance, he plays the angry American to the hilt, not taking any guff from foreigners, even though he's one of the foreigners.

Renault: I have often speculated on why you don't return to America. Did you abscond with the church funds? Did you run off with a senator's wife? I like to think you killed a man. It's the romantic in me.

Rick: It was a combination of all three.

Renault: And what in heaven's name brought you to Casablanca?

Rick: My health. I came to Casablanca for the waters.

Renault: Waters? What waters? We're in the desert.

Rick: I was misinformed.

When Rick meets up with Ilsa, one gets the impression that her nose will never stop running and the whole Nazi thing is just a bad dream. Screenwriters Julius J. and Philip G. Epstein and Howard Koch did their best at making the film flow with an imperative seriousness but after growing up with suspense movies like the "French Connection" and "The Odessa File," the realism of "Casablanca" is diluted into being pure entertainment.

"Casablanca" is a love story which should be seen at least once.

The film begins at 8 tonight in Union Forum Hall.

KG&E proposal reveals lack of responsibility

Kansas Gas & Electric's Wolf Creek nuclear power plant project is moving into another problem area as company officials went before the Kansas Corporation Commission to request the start of plant operations as soon as possible. With the project already into cost problems as Wolf Creek's bill is approaching a staggering $2.7 billion — costs that will mean 50 percent rate increases for KG&E customers — the issue of safety is receiving attention.

KG&E went before the Kansas Corporation Commission last week to request that the start of commercial operations at the Wolf Creek facility begin as soon as possible. KG&E is apparently eager to begin recovering the losses of revenue incurred through the Wolf Creek project by beginning its plant operations immediately.

The problem with this request is that KG&E, in asking for the earlier operating time, is, in turn, requesting a relaxation of safety tests at the plant. KG&E contended in its request that the safety of the Wolf Creek facility could be determined by a brief test at a 50 percent capacity level, a test that would satisfy the safety rules of the U.S. Nuclear Regulatory Commission.

Yet the KG&E request illustrated a disturbing willingness by the company to meet only the bare minimum in striving for safety at the Wolf Creek plant. The KCC argued at the hearing that the plant should be tested for a 250-hour period at 100 percent of capacity — finding the KG&E testing plan insufficient in determining safety at Wolf Creek.

KG&E said the KCC test would add to the already high cost of the Wolf Creek project. Yet a more stringent test, such as the one suggested by the KCC, would better determine a far more important aspect of the plant than the cost — it would better ensure Wolf Creek's safety.

Nuclear power plants have the potential to cause great disaster through a malfunction in the system. Yet KG&E seems oblivious to the responsibility it has accepted by building a nuclear plant at Burlington. KG&E should be willing to spend as much money as is necessary to see that the Wolf Creek facility is totally safe, regardless of a possible cut in its all-important profit margin.

A test at 100 percent capacity of the plant would better determine the safety at Wolf Creek. The KCC, in its ruling, should ignore the KG&E request to begin operations with the less-demanding tests and stand by its more stringent plan of determining safety.

KG&E should show a greater concern for safety than that exhibited before the KCC. With so many Kansans' safety in the hands of the company, KG&E must realize it has a responsibility toward its customers beyond raising their billing rates — safety must also be a concern.

Ferraro offers many attributes as Demo pick

Rep. Geraldine Ferraro, Walter Mondale's choice as vice presidential running mate, obviously offers the Democrats the advantage of having a woman on the ballot. But to say this is the only point in her favor would be an understatement.

Ferraro is a three-term Congresswoman from Queens, N.Y. She is liberal, but drew 73 percent of the vote in 1982 from her not-so-liberal ethnic working-class district. Her Congressional campaign slogan was "Finally, A Tough Democrat." In other words, Ferraro is exactly what Mondale needs to offset his reputation for catering to special-interest groups.

Not only is Ferraro a tough Democrat, she is a self-made political figure with a history to rival President Reagan's. Born in New York to immigrant parents, her first eight years were a fairy tale. Ferraro's father was a successful restaurant owner and she had everything a little girl could desire. When he died of a heart attack, Ferraro's mother supported the family with a job in the garment district.

Ferraro went to college on scholarship and attended law school at night while teaching grade school. After finishing law school, she married, raised three children and resumed her career. She brings to the campaign the kind of overcoming-all-obstacles success story every voter loves to hear — something not common for women in politics.

It is also possible Ferraro can help Mondale unify the party in time for the election. Since she won her first term in 1979, she has carefully cultivated the Democratic leadership. House Speaker Tip O'Neill became her mentor and placed her on the powerful House Budget Committee. In 1980, Ferraro avoided supporting any of the presidential candidates and got the sought-after position of Democratic platform committee chairman. Ferraro is in a position to bring Mondale the support of most party regulars — something which can only improve his current standing.

The major point critics have made against Ferraro's selection is that she lacks the experience to be vice president. Unless the president dies, resigns or is impeached, all the vice president needs to do is help the president get elected, be tactful at state dinners and get along well with party regulars. It seems Ferraro is as qualified as anyone.

With Mondale, what you see is what you get

WASHINGTON — A film depicting the life of Walter F. Mondale will be shown at the Democratic National Convention. Its script is naturally a secret but I, through a secret source, have been provided a copy. This is the voice of the narrator.

Walter Mondale was born in a tenement on a Minnesota farm. He was raised in a traditional home, built by Americans of American building material, and was one of eight brothers and sisters — four of each. One sibling was Jewish, another was black, yet another was Hispanic, two were Protestant, two were Catholic and one was a white male from Texas whose religion has yet to be determined.

His parents, a man and a woman, were of Norwegian-Jewish-Irish-Protestant-Catholic-Hispanic-Union-Nonunion extraction and raised cows, pigs, veal, pasta and blintzes. As long as anyone can remember, there have been women in his family. At the age of 2, the young Mondale formed his first committee.

Mondale, called Walter by his friends, grew up poor, like all great Americans with the exception of Washington, Adams, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Roosevelt and Kennedy. His parents would have been a lot poorer were it not for Social Security, Medicare, Medicaid, TVA and food stamps.

Even at an early age, young Walter exhibited an interest in politics. He organized the neighborhood kids into political-action committees and his favorite games were "delegate hunt" and "conference call." Here we see him at the old swimming hole, having recklessly thrown off his tie and stripped to his jacket, shirt, trousers, garters and socks. The boy next to him testing the waters is Jim Johnson, now Mondale's campaign manager. Johnson is frowning because young Walter had taken off his tie. Mondale is beaming because his teachers have just named him school president.

It was in school that Walter caught the eye of Joan Adams, the future Mrs. Mondale. Although it was love at first sight, Walter insisted on calling in other women and interviewing them at the family tenement to see who would make the best wife. "This is the most important decision a man can make," Walter said at the time. This was a precedent for the way he would conduct himself in life. "Cautious passion," he would call it — although Johnson said it should be "passionate caution." The issue went to a committee for study while the couple honeymooned in Flint, Mich.

The young Mondale worked his way through school by selling newspapers. He rode from farm to farm, delivering the Minneapolis Tribune, the Jewish Daily Forward, El Progreso and El Diario De Duluth. When other newsboys tried to move in on his route, he fought them off, saying he was the more experienced. With the money he made as a newsboy, the young Mondale bought his first gray suit, white shirt and red tie. Since then, he has bought 4,673 sets of them, although he has never owned more than 86 at a time.

For excitement, the young Mondale would sometimes go ice fishing with Jim Johnson. The two of them would sit on the ice, sometimes pull their ties down a bit, say words like "heck" and "damn" and talk about domestic-content legislation. Those kind of carefree days are behind Mondale now, of course.

After college, Mondale went off on his own. He is pictured with Orville Freeman and there he is with Hubert H. Humphrey. Mondale is listening. Of all the Americans in the land, Mondale was chosen by Jimmy Carter in 1976 to be his vice-presidential running mate. He and Carter made quite a team. Here they are together at Camp David. Carter is the one in running shorts and low, black socks; Mondale is in a bathing suit, T-shirt, noseguard, earplug and bathing cap.

Here we close the stirring saga of Walter F. Mondale. And as the sun sets in the west, or if you insist, in the east, we present a man who was once a boy — that Minnesota farm kid who played PAC Man before anyone else. Farmer, suburbanite, urbanite — all things to all men: Walter F. Mondale. What you see is what you get.

Former senator calls for life rules

NEW YORK — Former Sen. Jacob Javits, still active despite a debilitating and progressive nervous system disorder, says the medical community needs to help establish rules for such illnesses "to determine who should live and who should die."

Javits, 80, who suffers from amyotrophic lateral sclerosis or "Lou Gehrig's disease," wrote in the August issue of Discover magazine that Colorado Gov. Richard Lamm "raised a question of deepest seriousness" when he was quoted as saying the elderly who are terminally ill "have a duty to die."

Because medical care is not available on an equal basis to rich and poor, society does need to decide who will be kept alive, Javits said.

"It should be based not on how rich the patient and his family are, but on whether the brain is functioning and whether there is any expectation that the patient will continue to enjoy what is truly life," he wrote.

Such a decision should be made jointly by the patient, his family, his religious adviser, a representative of the community, the medical profession and, if necessary, the courts, he said.

Javits, a liberal Republican who represented New York for four terms in the U.S. Senate, learned in 1980 that he had the disease that killed the famous New York Yankees baseball player and actor David Niven, among others.

Although he is confined to a wheelchair and needs a ventilator to breathe, Javits said he continues to lecture, read and write.

"In short, life does not stop with terminal illness," he said. "The greatest therapy is to forget about terminal illness. Everybody is terminal. That is the great message that can perpetuate the useful life of the patient and be of solace and comfort to the patient's family and friends."

Toddler makes 'super' progress

MADISON, Wis. — A toddler who was thrown three blocks by a tornado is almost ready to leave the hospital, after five weeks of treatment in which he made "super" progress, a doctor says.

Blue-eyed Trevor James Simon, who will be 2 on July 27, suffered a skull fracture, dislocated neck, two breaks in his left arm, three breaks in his right leg, lung and kidney bruises and a tear in his liver when a tornado ripped through the town of Barnveld.

The tornado killed his parents, Bruce and Jill, and his 8-year-old sister, Cassandra.

"There was not 1 square inch of his body that was not marked," Dr. W.H. Perloff, director of pediatric intensive care at the University of Wisconsin Hospital, said Friday.

"His progress has been super but not uneventful," Perloff said. For three weeks, he needed help to breathe. He wears a cast from his waist to the end of his left leg and a support collar encircles his neck. For a while "he was very depressed," Perloff said.

Trevor will leave the hospital under the care of his court-appointed guardians, Perloff said.

Fontenot, Yankees tip Royals, 4-1

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Ray Fontenot scattered eight hits over 6½ innings and Dave Winfield and Omar Moreno each drove in two runs as the New York Yankees defeated Kansas City 4-1 Sunday.

Fontenot, 3-5, allowed only one run while striking out three and walking one. Jay Howell pitched 2½ innings for his third save.

New York broke a 1-1 tie in the sixth against Charlie Leibrant, 4-4.

Omar Moreno beat out a bunt, moved to second on a sacrifice, took third on Ken Griffey's single and scored on Winfield's forceout.

Kansas City took a 1-0 lead in the first. Willie Wilson opened with a single and advanced to second on Darryl Motley's single. After George Brett forced Motley at second, moving Wilson to third, Hal McRae delivered a sacrifice fly.

New York tied the score in their half as Randolph led off with a single, took second as Ken Griffey flied out, stole third and scored as Winfield grounded out.

In the seventh, New York chased Leibrant and added two insurance runs as Moreno tripled in Bobby Meacham and Rick Cerone.

Stars dominate Arizona, gain USFL crown

By The Associated Press

TAMPA, Fla. — Chuck Fusina, dancing and scrambling around Arizona's heralded pass rush, engineered touchdown drives on Philadelphia's first two possessions as the Stars won the second United States Football League championship by beating the Wranglers 23-3.

The Stars, clearly the dominant team of the USFL's first two seasons with 34 wins in 40 games, avenged a 24-22 loss to Michigan in last year's title game by clearly dominating George Allen's Wranglers. They did so despite a series of turnovers and blown chances that could have mortally wounded them.

What should have been an easy victory wasn't put away until the fourth quarter because of Philadelphia mistakes — a fumble by Kelvin Bryant on the goal line, a tipped pass by Fusina from the Wrangler 16 that became an interception by Arizona's Ed Smith, and a missed extra point by David Trout, who also missed a 27-yard field goal attempt.

In fact, so clear was Philadelphia's dominance that the Stars didn't punt until 1:20 into the fourth quarter. The Stars ran 56 plays on the ground, a USFL playoff record, with Bryant accounting for 115 yards in 29 carries.

Philadelphia totally controlled the first quarter, taking the opening drive and methodically moving 66 yards in 10 plays for a touchdown.

The score game on a 4-yard blast by Bryan Thomas, who spelled Bryant more than usual because of Bryant's bruised toe. But the drive might have ended before it got going had not Fusina eluded John Lee, the league's leading sacker, and scrambled for 10 yards on a third-and-4 play from his own 40.

After the Philadelphia defense held Arizona without a first down, the Stars came right back. This time the drive covered 54 yards in nine plays, with Fusina taking it in himself from the 1 after fumbling the snap, juggling it, and rolling to the left with 1:11 left in the quarter.

K-State signs Speer

Brad Speer, who holds the country's third all-time highest mark in the high school jump, has signed to compete for the K-State track squad for the upcoming 1984-85 year.

Speer won this year's Kansas state high jump competition with a record-setting mark of 7-3. His season best of 7-4½ is the third highest mark in the country to be set by a high school jumper.

Speer qualified for the Olympic trials but bypassed them for the junior national meet. He finished fourth in that meet with a leap of 7-1/4.

Speer's continuous improvement and competitive spirit make him a prime contender for much success next season, said head track coach Steve Miller, who viewed the signing of Speer as the culmination of K-State's best recruiting season. Speer has yet to reach full physical maturity as an athlete, Miller said, which will also aid him in collegiate competition.

"He's truly a gifted kid," Miller said. "He's the kind of guy who can come into the program and make an immediate impact. He wants to be a great jumper and that's a criterion you can't measure. He's good — a great competitive heart."

Speer chose K-State over the University of Kansas, Wichita State University and Texas Christian University.

Don Rose, acting head coach for the K-State Crew, watches the progress of Crew members during last week's ergathon.

Rose sees discipline, hard work as important attributes for crew

By GARY NELSON
Collegian Reporter

There are not too many students who have missed being asked to join the K-State Crew team by the short, vocal man found peddling his product near the Union.

Don Rose, acting head coach for the K-State Crew is certainly not a big man in size, but he is big in pride.

"I've done a lot of things in my life," Rose said, "Some good things along with the bad too. I'm not hiding anything, though," Rose said.

Rose, who didn't give his actual age, chuckled and said he was now "38 in the hole — just like Jack Benny used to say."

As well as being the K-State Crew coach, he also has a small business, Wildcat Exteriors, a Manhattan construction company.

Rose left Wisconsin in 1952 with a bachelor's degree in journalism, and came to K-State to pursue a degree in physical education. He worked as night manager of the Union while taking classes for about eight years.

Rose also said he was the director of recreation services for approximately three years and then coached the crew for two years without doing anything else.

He said he then left K-State, worked in a store's sporting goods department and coached a rowing team in Springfield, Ill.

Rose has been back in the Manhattan area about three years and has no connection with K-State other than crew.

"Manhattan, as far as I'm concerned — after going around the world, and having experienced many things — is where my heart is," Rose said, "I have a deep feel for Kansas, K-State and the University."

Rose, a member of Fellowship of Christian Athletes, said he also supports Campus Crusade for Christ, Navigators and the Inter-Varsity groups.

Rose, who radiates pride for the K-State Crew, not only seemed interested in the development of the team, but in the benefits for each of the athletes as well. Rose believes the rowing sport is a great one.

"I think that we can return to the top 10," Rose said, after explaining that K-State was ranked second in the Olympic trials in 1968.

"What is more important is taking the students at K-State and working with them physically," Rose said, "I will predict that anyone who develops the discipline required for this sport will rise to be a great individual."

"Kansas people are a hard-working kind of people," he said, "This is the kind of person that this sport requires."

Rose said that he would keep up with his coaching career as long as his health was good.

"I want to have, in the way I have led my life, others to be able to look at what I've done and say, 'that is what I want,'" he said. "I want nothing but good for the kids."

Drought drains tourism, causes water theft

By The Associated Press

DALLAS — Businesses along Texas' Guadalupe River are buying torrents of water to revive tourism. Streets in Corpus Christi are patrolled for water thieves. One small town on the brink of losing its supply built a 7½-mile emergency water pipeline.

And mandatory water rationing starts Monday in Austin, one of dozens of cities imposing conservation measures.

From the Red River along the Oklahoma state line to the Rio Grande along the Mexican border, the story is much the same: the midsection of Texas has gone bone-dry this summer in what some say could prove to be the worst drought in 30 years.

"The last beneficial rain we had was in May of 1982," said Paul Werner, water superintendent in the coastal city of Corpus Christi, the first city to begin mandatory rationing and patrol the streets with non-police officials hunting offenders.

"We now have some of the brownest lawns in the state," he said. "What we really need is a hurricane to fill the reservoirs."

Corpus Christi, which built a second reservoir too late to collect any water before the drought, is not alone.

The drought, combined with rapid growth that has depleted water supplies, has forced 67 cities and towns into water conservation measures, according to the Texas Department of Water Resources.

Austin's city manager last week announced that a mandatory program would begin today. San Antonio, the nation's 10th-largest city, is on a voluntary plan. The town of Newcastle rushed a 7½-mile pipeline into service when one lake dried and the other dropped to 2 feet. Abilene saw cattle ranchers line up recently for a marathon sale of stock they could neither feed nor water.

For two years, Mother Nature has been cruel to Texas. In 1983, drought devastated farming and ranching in West Texas. Hurricane Alicia ravaged the Galveston-Houston area and the worst freeze in history ruined the citrus crop in the Rio Grande Valley.

All but 59 of Texas' 254 counties have been declared eligible for disaster aid, said George Svatek of the Farmers Home Administration. Spring rain eased the situation in most of West Texas, but the drought just slid east.

As a result, business evaporated this summer for the merchants along the Guadalupe River, a popular water sports area in central Texas. But the innovative entrepreneurs pooled their resources and bought river water in bulk.

Each weekend, 125 acre-feet of water bought from a water authority upstream is released from Canyon Lake into the river, raising the flow from 20 cubic feet per second to 100.

"We've decided to do it every weekend through Labor Day. It's costing us $65,000. But the economy is real bad here right now and we didn't know what else to do," said Don Moses of Texas Canoe Trails.

Corpus Christi's mandatory program, which prohibits lawn watering and other non-essential uses, has cut consumption by about 30 percent since it took effect early this month, said Werner.

Austin's program bans some outdoor uses and allows lawn watering only every fifth day.

Violating either city's ordinance is punishable by a $200 fine.

Meteorologists say prospects for showers are bleak in south-central Texas.

George Bomar, meteorologist with the state Water Resources Department, said the drought really began for the southern part of the state last winter. High pressure over Texas prevented the usual winter and spring precipitation that fills reservoirs.

From January to June, Abilene had only 4.23 inches of rain — the driest six months on record. Most cities and towns in the heart of Texas have received less than 60 percent of their usual rainfall.

Dallas and Houston have had close-to-normal rainfall this year.

But experts say the rapid growth of Austin and San Antonio has stretched water sources and supply systems beyond their intended use.

"The growth has just been too fast and some places would have problems even if there wasn't a drought," said Wayne Jordan, director of the Texas Water Resources Institute at Texas A&M University. "By the turn of the century, it's going to get worse whether it rains or not."

Fight about car causes stabbing death

By The Associated Press

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. — An owner of the defunct International Gold Bullion Exchange, accused of bilking investors nationwide of millions of dollars in undelivered gold bullion, was stabbed to death Sunday, apparently in an argument over use of his car, police said.

William Alderdice, 40, was killed in his Fort Lauderdale home, said Sgt. David Patterson, a city police homicide detective.

James Doyle, 42, who had befriended Alderdice several months ago, was charged in the death, said police spokesman Tony Sileo. The stabbing apparently was sparked by an argument over Doyle's borrowing Alderdice's car without permission, said Patterson.

Doyle and Alderdice's brother, James Alderdice, were treated for minor wounds, said Patterson.

Doyle, who befriended the Alderdices while the three were at the Metropolitan Correctional Institution in Dade County, was charged with second-degree murder and attempted first-degree murder and was being held at the Broward County Jail, Sileo said.

Doyle, who was living with the Alderdices, was not connected with the bullion business, Patterson said.

The Alderdices were named in an 18-count federal indictment charging conspiracy and mail and wire fraud. They also faced New York state charges of grand larceny and securities fraud.

The Broward County state attorney's office also filed 200 counts of fraud charges against the brothers, said Alderdice attorney Tom Sclafani.

Around 9:45 a.m. Sunday, a woman who lived at the Alderdice home rushed outside, and, "She was screaming, 'He's been killed. He's been murdered,'" said Donna Benninghoff, who lives across the street.

According to police records,

Debra Saltmer, 28, and James Alderdice became aware of a commotion in the house and went to the victim's bedroom, where they saw Doyle standing over William Alderdice's body. Saltmer was among three women also living in the house.

Sileo, reading from the official police report, quoted Doyle as saying "I'm going to kill everyone in this house," then lunging at James Alderdice with a kitchen knife and cutting him severely.

A witness living across the street later saw James Alderdice restraining Doyle with a metal bar held across Doyle's neck, said Sileo.

The Alderdices were jailed July 14, 1983 when New York filed the first criminal charges after their firm collapsed a year ago.

They were indicted by a federal grand jury in Fort Lauderdale on Aug. 16, 1983 on conspiracy and mail and wire fraud charges. The brothers were free on bond.

The federal indictment alleged the Alderdices accepted more than $140 million from November 1979 to April 1983 from customers in states including Illinois, New York, Texas, Washington, Georgia, California, Ohio, New Jersey, Alabama, Rhode Island, Kentucky, Maryland and Florida.

Authorities claimed IGBE, then one of the nation's largest gold and silver dealers, was used by the Alderdices to defraud about 25,000 creditors out of money they paid for precious metals they never received.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael Pasano said at the Alderdices' arraignment last year that $20 million to $40 million of the money they collected could not be accounted for.

But William Alderdice denied the charge at that time, saying, "I can account for every dollar that came in."

Legionnaires' disease questions remain

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Eight years ago it was the frightening, unknown killer in a medical mystery. Today, it is considered just one of many forms of pneumonia.

But researchers still are probing basic questions about Legionnaires' disease and the cigar-shaped bacteria that cause it.

The disease and the bacteria, "Legionella," were named for an outbreak of pneumonia in 182 people in Philadelphia, most of whom had attended a state American Legion convention there in July 1976. Twenty-nine people died before doctors and federal health officials traced the disease to Legionella that had been blown into the air from the air conditioning system in a convention hotel.

Since Legionella was discovered, it has been linked to pneumonia outbreaks that occurred decades before the Philadelphia convention. The disease still strikes an estimated 25,000 people a year, after they are exposed to the bacteria in places like hotels and hospitals.

But antibiotic treatment has reduced the death rate greatly, and Legionnaires' disease has lost its public prominence of eight years ago. "It is not a deadly killer any more than other forms of bacterial pneumonia, which are more common," said Dr. Steve Cochi of the federal Centers for Disease Control.

Still, Cochi and other researchers hope to head off outbreaks and improve treatment by studying the questions that remain about Legionella and the disease.

One basic mystery is why Legionnaires' disease is so rare. Legionella can be found all over the environment where water is available.

"We are all exposed to it at some time in our lives," said William Pasculle, associate pathology professor at the University of Pittsburgh Medical School. "And yet we don't all develop the disease."

A related question is just how Legionella travels to the lungs from its environmental homes, such as cooling towers of commercial air conditioners and plumbing systems. The disease isn't contagious, so no human carriers appear to be involved. And like other bacteria that cause pneumonia, Legionella seems to require inhaling rather than swallowing.

Likely pathways to the lungs include water spray from a cooling tower, or from a running faucet or shower, Cochi said. Some suspect contaminated water in respiratory equipment may cause Legionnaires' in some hospitals.

Researchers are particularly interested in hospital-acquired Legionnaires' because people there are especially vulnerable: they're already sick or undergoing treatments that weaken the body's immune system.

A weakened immune system can be deadly. A study of about five dozen patients at a California hospital showed that even with proper treatment, Legionnaires' disease killed 20 percent of its victims with weakened immune systems, compared to 5 percent of victims with systems at normal strength. Without proper treatment, the rate was 80 percent compared to 20 percent among other affected patients.

Besides the vulnerability of patients, "Legionella loves to grow at the temperature most hospitals keep their water at," said Dr. Paul Edelstein, director of the Legionnaires' disease laboratory at the Wadsworth Veterans Administration Hospital in Los Angeles. That temperature, about 105 degrees, is maintained so patients won't accidentally scald themselves. (Most homeowners keep their water hotter, as high as 150 degrees if they have a dishwasher, hot enough to kill Legionella, he said).

Researchers are trying to find the best ways to detect and control Legionella in hospitals and other buildings. Nobody has found an effective way to keep Legionella out of air conditioning towers for a long time, Cochi said. As for water supplies, heating the water and chlorinating it each have produced some success, but nobody has solid evidence about which is better, Edelstein said.

ty, was named third runner-up. Clark is a junior at Wichita State University majoring in communication disorders and sciences. Clark topped two scholarship awards. Clark was awarded $600 for finishing as the third runner-up and also received the $250 Debbie Bryant talent award for the most original talent for the pageant. She performed a song from "Cabaret" in the janitor lady character made famous by Carol Burnett. Bryant is a former Miss America from Kansas.

Fourth runner-up was Sheri Cook, who represented Miss Greater Kansas City. Cook received $500 for fourth runner-up and the $250 Deborah Barnes Award for the outstanding instrumental talent. Cook is working for her second masters degree at the University of Missouri Conservatory of Music in Kansas City, Mo. She played a classical number on the piano for her talent.

Miss Manhattan/K-State, Michelle Orr, received the $250 Margene Savage Award for outstanding vocal performance. Orr is a music education major at K-State.

"This year's quality was the best it has been in 30 years," Kent Goyen, member of the board of directors for the Miss Kansas Pageant, said.

The Miss Kansas pageant in Pratt provides over $60,000 in scholarships for the event with an additional $115,000 awarded at the local pageants, Goyen said. He added the largest local pageant is the $15,000 Miss Wichita pageant.

Francis Bunyan, Pratt resident, said she had been attending the event for around 20 years.

"It's the small town personal interest that makes Pratt special. Not only do the Pratt Jaycees and Janes do the work (for the pageant) but the businesses take an active part in the pageant also," Bunyan said.

Debbie Goyen, board of directors member for the Miss Kansas Pageant and coordinator for the former Miss Kansas, said Wichita has expressed an interest in hosting the pageant. However, Goyen said in larger towns, such as Wichita, there are more events taking place and the larger towns couldn't provide the atmosphere Pratt maintains.

"It's a community event," Mrs. Goyen said.

Mondale, Ferraro arrange meetings seeking party unity

By The Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — Democrats opened their 39th national convention Monday with party leaders denouncing President Reagan while Walter F. Mondale and ticketmate Geraldine Ferraro arranged a peace and unity meeting with his losing rivals for the nomination.

Mondale, with the votes for nomination on Wednesday night, arranged the session with Sen. Gary Hart and The Rev. Jesse Jackson as a gesture to discuss "anything that they will."

Mondale and Ferraro came to San Francisco earlier in the day to await their installation as the Democratic ticket. Ferraro had the lead role at two arrival rallies on the day of her 24th wedding anniversary.

Mondale had resisted a three-candidate meeting before the nomination. Bert Lance, newly installed as general campaign chairman, set up the session after he met with Hart and Jackson, and said later, "This is the time for us to begin the healing process in the Democratic party."

Mondale and Ferraro met with Democratic candidates for Senate seats in the Nov. 6 elections.

Their nominating triumphs came later in the week. The first of 13 opening-day political speeches began immediately after the gavel fell, with plenty of ceremony following.

Almost as the session opened, police arrested about 100 demonstrators a half-mile from the convention hall for blocking streets in a non-violent protest against nuclear weapons.

Party chairman Charles T. Manatt rapped the opening gavel only two minutes past the official 2 p.m. PDT starting time, mounting the podium to overlook a hall in which almost no one was seated. Instead, thousands of delegates, alternates, guests and reporters conducted their own business, ignoring Manatt.

The huge hall slowly filled with the party faithful. Mondale signs, blue and white with small red stripes, competed with the bright red Hart standards, while Jackson's face looked out from hundreds of photographs.

Early speeches were all but ignored, but the presence of former Treasury Secretary John Connally high above the floor in the Cable

News Network television tower provoked a spontaneous demonstration. "Kick John Out," shouted hundreds of delegates, making a "thumbs down" gesture. Connally, a former Democratic governor of Texas turned Republican, simply smiled.

Under the chairman's hand, the opening business went smoothly, as the credentials report was approved without dissent.

There was irony in his role, for Mondale fired him as chairman on Saturday, only to reinstate him on Sunday after a vociferous protest from party leaders and union supporters.

"I'm not saying this was handled perfectly. Obviously, it wasn't," Mondale said before his arrival in the convention city.

Once in the convention city, he and his new political partner spoke to women leaders, many of whom had tears of joy in their eyes at the sight of the Mondale-Ferraro ticket. Ferraro said, "What this ticket is all about is not what America can do for women but what women can do for America."

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland urged delegates to forget the "foul-ups and quarrels" of the past and concentrate on electing Mondale-Ferraro.

Manatt told the delegates that by re-electing Reagan "America would choose the greater risk of nuclear war."

"By electing the Democratic candidate, American can choose to bring the terror of the arms race to an end," he said.

He stressed the unity theme: "Unity is not a casual slogan. It is a choice — a hard choice in which we give up some of the things we want in order to get those things we cannot do without."

Former President Jimmy Carter told the convention that under Reagan the United States has "acquired a reputation for unwarranted belligerence." He said that must change and a Democratic president would make it happen.

New York Gov. Mario Cuomo, in a keynote address that celebrated "the family of America" and directed harsh criticism at President Reagan, said "Democrats must unite so that the entire nation can."

To succeed this fall, he said, "We must answer our opponent's polished and appealing rhetoric with a more telling reasonableness and rationality."

Police arrest anti-nuclear protesters

By The Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — Police arrested 95 anti-nuclear demonstrators on felony conspiracy charges Monday after they blocked entrances to two buildings in the financial district, about a half-mile from the site of the Democratic National Convention.

The demonstrators, members of an arm of the anti-nuclear Livermore Action Group, were being booked for felony conspiracy, police said.

Police set the number of demonstrators at 115 and said most were taken into custody after blocking entrances to the Bank of America world headquarters and another building.

The protesters at the second building were met by police, according to Officer George Pohley.

"At that time, it was decided it was a planned event, it was a conspiracy to pull our strength of officers ... away from the convention site," Pohley said, when asked about the decision to charge those arrested with felonies.

No violence was reported. The protest was intended to show a link among the "Democratic Party, corporations in the area, and militarism," said Gretchen Ritter of the Livermore Action Group.

A pre-convention demonstration Thursday against Moral Majority leader Jerry Falwell was punctuated with violence between a handful of the 2,000 demonstrators and some 200 police.

That demonstration was staged to protest Falwell's Family Forum III conference in San Francisco. Eight people were arrested and eight others injured.

Meanwhile, in front of the Moscone Center where the convention is being held, a friendly crowd of about 200 kicked off the "Children's Campaign for Peace Without Fear" on Monday.

About a third of those arrested Monday in the financial district were juveniles, said Officer Steve Johnson. All would be charged with blocking a sidewalk, a misdemeanor, and conspiracy to block a sidewalk, a felony, he said.

By midafternoon, just 15 people had been booked because some refused to give their names.

Attorney addresses immigration issues

By KRISTIE FABER
Collegian Reporter

The Simpson-Mazzoli Immigration Bill which has passed both the House of Representatives and Senate — although in different versions — was the main topic of the speech given by Suzanne Gladney Monday at the International Student Center. Gladney is an attorney from Legal Aid of Western Missouri.

"Legal Aid of Western Missouri is located in Kansas City, Mo., and is funded to give legal aid in Missouri," Gladney said.

Legal Aid in Kansas does not provide information on immigration matters, however, so occasionally Gladney speaks in Kansas.

Concerning the Simpson-Mazzoli Immigration Bill, Gladney said that she doubts that certain points of the bill will pass after the process is finished.

"It (the Simpson-Mazzoli Immigration Bill) may not pass at all,"

The bill has raised many questions for international students at K-State and across the country.

In an attempt to clear up some questions on the bill, Gladney explained the right-to-work provision. This provision would make employers require proof of citizenship before hiring an employee.

"This requires the employer to do the policing for immigration," Gladney said.

This provision may cause employers to hesitate before hiring anyone with an accent or one who looks foreign. Employers found guilty of hiring someone without proof of citizenship can be sentenced to jail, Gladney added.

Another provision that raises many questions is the amnesty provision that would allow people with illegal status to have temporary citizenship. After a waiting period, the person would be eligible for citizenship, Gladney said.

One version of the bill states 1980 as the year the person with illegal status would have had to enter the country by and the other states 1982. "An estimated 3 million (illegal aliens) could benefit from this," Gladney said.

Gladney urged students not to go to the Immigration and Naturalization Service and question the bill yet since it has not yet become a law. If a student does go in and admits to having illegal status, he or she would probably be arrested on the spot, she said.

Many students believe that if they marry an American citizen they can achieve citizenship. If the marriage is not for the right reasons, the people involved in the marriage are not only in violation of immigration law, but criminal law as well, Gladney said.

Violation of these laws results in a jail sentence, followed by deportation, she said.

"Since January of this year I know of 10 who have gone to jail in the Kansas City region," she said.

"There is supposedly a ring of people setting up marriages for green cards (the card which gives temporary citizenship) operating out of Wichita. There are some 200 marriages in the Kansas City region being scrutinized at this point that are said to be a product of this ring," Gladney said.

She warned that if the ringleaders are caught and threatened with jail sentences, they might divulge their victims' names, to avoid going to jail. Gladney advised students against using the services of these people.

There are no fees for the lawyers' services at Legal Aid and the only requirement is that the person asking for help be able to demonstrate financial need, Gladney said. Remembering her years as a student, she said that students almost always fit into this category.

Gladney, a 1975 graduate of the University of Missouri-Columbia, specializes in immigration law for Legal Aid which is supported by the Legal Services Corporation.

About 40 people were in attendance for Gladney's presentation and question and answer session, which was sponsored by the International Coordinating Council.

Fort Riley serviceman dies from power line accident

FORT RILEY — A Fort Riley soldier was electrocuted Monday morning when he was erecting a radio antenna near the troop barracks on Custer Hill (a barracks area), said Harvey Perritt, public affairs spokesman.

Pvt. Coleman M. Eagle, 21, of Savanna, Ill., had been at Fort Riley since June 26, upon completion of basic training at Fort Leonard Wood in Missouri, said Arzula Dillery, deputy public affairs officer at Fort Riley.

"It (the antenna top) apparently came into contact with an overhead high-voltage line," Perritt said.

"Emergency medical personnel administered cardiopulmonary resuscitation and mouth-to-mouth (resuscitation) upon arriving on the scene," Perritt said. The soldier was pronounced dead on arrival at Irwin Army Community Hospital shortly before 10 a.m.

According to the preliminary report of the investigating committee, the incident occurred about 8:30 a.m.

Unsupervised children remain hidden while parents work

By LISA WILSON
Collegian Reporter

For many children, time after school is spent playing with friends. Their environment is safe and secure. Rarely do they experience apprehensive feelings about what might happen in the next minute. This is an ideal situation, but not all children are that fortunate.

Wendy is 9. After school she is not allowed to play with her friends. She must go straight home and lock the door behind her. She is not allowed to open the door to anyone, not even close relatives.

She is not allowed to go outside for any reason or watch out the windows because her mother doesn't want anyone to know she is there.

Confined to an apartment, alone, she waits for her mother to return from work. While she waits, she hears noises — walls creaking or a tree branch scratching across the window. Sounds easy to identify for most, but, to an isolated child, this can be a frightening experience.

Wendy is a latchkey child — a school-age child left unsupervised in the home while parents are at work.

"This is something I have been forced into doing and I don't like it," Brenda, Wendy's mother, said. "Anything could happen when she is there by herself."

"I don't trust anyone and I can't scare her for how I feel, but kids can sense things more than you tell them," she added.

Brenda said she has chosen this alternative not only for economical reasons, but because of the unavailability of "good" child care in her neighborhood.

The last two decades have shown a dramatic increase in the number of working mothers and a corresponding concern on the effects of maternal employment on children.

Beth Denney, social service supervisor for Riley County, said mothers in the labor force are a major variable accounting for the rise in the latchkey situation.

The Women's Bureau of the Department of Labor reported that from 1977 to 1982, mothers of children under 18 have been entering the labor force at an average of more than 500,000 a year.

The Department of Labor reports 32 million children — from infants to high school age — have mothers who work outside the home. About 13 million of those children are under age 14.

The exact number of children left unsupervised while their parents work is unknown. The latest year in which statistics are available is 1976.

The Bureau of the Census reported 13 percent to 15 percent of children age 7 through 13 (whose mothers worked outside the home) cared for themselves and, in some instances, for younger siblings.

The number of latchkey children suffering from stress, anxiety or the inability to cope with their situation is unknown because few researchers have probed this issue empirically.

An article in Children Today magazine said no social event affects all children equally. Nearly all experiences are filtered by the quality, character and environment of the family.

"Some children may thrive on the opportunity of being a latchkey child, while others may have difficulty coping," the article stated. Denney said the latchkey phenomenon has evolved from a general lack of resources — the main resource being money.

Denney said Riley County Social Services has a program in which it purchases day care for income eligible families to alleviate the latchkey situation, but "it takes money to buy day care and not everyone is eligible for that service."

The Monthly Labor Review said mothers with young children have more difficulty entering the labor market than other mothers.

In March 1983, the unemployment rate for married women with young children was 12.8 percent — less than half that of mothers maintaining families.

"Unemployment rates of mothers of young children may be higher because child-care responsibilities may restrict the types of jobs these women can accept," a Monthly Labor Review report said.

When employed in 1983, 83 percent of mothers with young children worked full time.

Tim McHenry, case worker for Big Brothers and Big Sisters Inc. of Manhattan, said they are attempting to initiate a latchkey program through the Riley County Chapter of the American Red Cross.

Through the program, children in the latchkey situation will be educated on personal safety in an attempt to prepare them for emergency situations, he said.

McHenry added that in September the organization plans to have a pilot group consisting of 15 to 20 students — kindergarten through high school age — attend a two-session class.

"Problems evolving from the latchkey situation are caused by lack of structure in the home," McHenry said.

Plans for the class include setting up rules and guidelines that both parents and children agree on through a contract.

In preparation for this program, McHenry studied programs published by the American Red Cross and the Kansas Committee for Prevention of Child Abuse. He plans to create a program applicable to Manhattan based on those studies.

Auto safety decision a victory for consumer

The Reagan administration, in its inconsistency, has made a wise decision in forcing automakers to install air bags or automatic seat belts in new cars over the next six years.

With this decision, the administration, for reasons yet unknown, is finally telling big business that, at least in some instances, people's safety is going to come before the almighty dollar. Automakers have worked feverishly in their lobbying efforts to avoid making the safer adaptations. Supposedly, the modifications will raise the price of automobiles which would spur a decline in auto sales. But isn't it possible for successful automakers, in their infinite business wisdom, to find other ways to cut costs, or is safety for the driver and passengers a car's most expendable feature?

The Ford Motor Co. apparently had little problem in doing a study on the ramifications of its Pinto fiasco. It would seem of equal motivation that a study could now be used for drivers' safety.

The government has every right and a responsibility to step in and add safety features for items such as automobiles. A spokesman for one the three major automobile corporations said the responsibility should lie with the driver. But precautionary statements on the use of seatbelts in no way work on the same level as a warning label on the back of a can of Drano. People obviously don't purposely ingest poisonous chemicals every day — there is a strong deterrent for not doing so. But most people drive an automobile every day and every trip without the use of a seatbelt is a subliminal statement that seatbelts aren't needed — when nothing is further from the truth.

Although auto companies are making tests with new materials which might be able to reduce the shock of impact, nothing will replace the use of a seatbelt. An air bag is an extra safety feature that could only benefit the driver, higher prices or not. Automakers are asking why they should be responsible for a driver's survival. Maybe there is no convincing argument. But Chrysler, why is it we were responsible for your survival?

Wayne Price, for the Editorial Board

America's potential goodness should be used

Sometimes I wonder if the insane are in charge of the asylum. Our nation seems hell-bent on building three nuclear weapons a day for the next five years, in the name of peace. Repressive and brutal dictatorships in South Africa and the Philippines are considered to be valuable members of the "free world." Americans are spending more money on pet food and veterinarians than the entire Third World spends on food. And the 1984 presidential election pits Walter Mondale, the prince of dullness, and Ronald Reagan, the king of dimness.

By the end of this year, one-tenth of the general population will be hospitalized for mental illness; 16 million pounds of aspirin will have been consumed; and 17,000 people will have committed suicide. Is it any real surprise that a recent poll found that more people place stock in astrology than in science or God?

By the time the average child graduates from high school, he will have spent more hours in front of his television sets than inside a classroom. Look at two of media's most popular celebrities — Boy George and Mr. T. Both have more jewelry than the average female and neither has a last name. And thanks to Velcro straps and video games, it seems very possible that the next generation will grow up eating PAC-MAN cereal unable to lace their shoes.

In a world such as this, filled with craziness and confusion, it must seem almost impossible to avoid cynicism. But we should try. In the words of famous heart specialist Dr. Michael DeBakey, no case is hopeless — a fact that applies as well in our everyday lives as in medicine. No matter how senseless and futile life may seem, we can always have hope.

Many prophets of doom have proclaimed the end of America and possibly the world. But when I look into America's future, I am reminded of the Eastern book of philosophy, "I Ching," which says, "After a time of decay comes the turning point. The powerful light that has been banished returns. There is movement, but it is not brought about by force. The movement is natural arising spontaneously. For this reason, the transformation of the old becomes easy. The old is discarded and the new is introduced."

After decades of decay and decline, perhaps the turning point has arrived. Despite our faults, the past has shown that America has the capacity for great goodness. Now the time has come for us to act on this potential. Principles espoused and hopes expressed are no longer enough.

But the first thing that we must bear in mind is that we cannot change the world in one fell swoop. Our primary objective should not be to change the world without, but to change the world within. As this happens, we achieve our full abilities to influence the outer world. As individuals, we must find useful tasks to perform, noble causes to fight and personal dreams to chase. We must also change the way we look at the people around us.

When we see those emotionally less stable than ourselves, we must have tolerance, for they are the lost. When we see those less fortunate than ourselves, we must have compassion, for they are the lost. And when we see those more powerful than ourselves (who ignore our needs), we must have patience, for they are the deceived.

To these people, we can scorn, hate or ridicule, but that would change nothing. To fight hatred with hatred, or wrong with more wrong, is not only barbaric, it's senseless. But "if we work upon men's immortal minds, if we imbue them with high principles, if we imbue them with love of their fellow men, we engrave something which no time can efface, and which will brighten for all eternity," Daniel Webster once said.

Many of you, no doubt, feel that one person can't make a difference; that one person has no power in a world filled with special interests. But you're wrong. As Robert Fuller, former president of Oberlin College, once wrote, "The minute you find love in someone else, you become bigger and stronger; you're more powerful." That will be, I think, the meaning of power in the 21st century.

When one person influences his friends, and these friends, in turn, influence their friends, it becomes a social chain-reaction that is limited only by our imagination. Our motives may be misunderstood, our words misinterpreted, but the message will be clear. Clouds may cover the sun, but they cannot banish the light.

But it is up to each of us to set an example for others to follow. The world will not change overnight because the whole process must build up speed like a boulder rolling down a hill. But at least our progress will set a clear direction for generations to come.

The doubters among us will say that this is empty rhetoric and idealistic nonsense of a dreamer. To these people I can only say that yours must be a lonely, hopeless existence. Why shouldn't we be allowed to dream? People who are deprived of their dreams are stripped of the main things that separate us from the animals. And to these people I would also ask another question: Can we not dream a better dream than this?

Rec Complex heats up during summer

By LYNN BENDER
Collegian Reporter

With the summer temperatures rising near the 100-degree mark, one might wonder why the temperatures are also rising in the L.P. Washburn Recreational Area.

Construction of the Rec Complex was completed in 1980. In the initial construction plans of 1976-77, the Rec Complex was not built to include air conditioning.

"At that time, the idea of participation space was of more concern than that of including air conditioning," said Raydon Robel, director of recreational services.

The construction cost of the Rec Complex was also on a strict budget of $3.5 million.

"To include air conditioning in the complex at that time, it would have been half more in cost," Robel said. "Back at the time of construction we were also concerned with conserving energy."

Attendance at the Rec Complex this summer is not decreasing, despite the lack of air conditioning.

"Attendance is not going down. In fact, it has been increasing every year. This year we had a head count of 15,000," Robel said. "People come with the idea that they will sweat."

He believes the Rec Complex offers a good facility to the people, and those who want to use the facilities and equipment will bear with the temperatures within the building.

The heat itself does not seem to be as much of a problem, as much as the combination of humidity and heat.

"Humidity is our biggest problem. When the humidity rises it causes a problem," Robel said. "We are not the ultimate Cadillac where fitness centers are concerned, but we are not the only University around without air conditioning."

University Facilities is looking into the possibility of air conditioning for the Rec Complex in the future.

"They are looking at what could be done with the building, possible cost, and what can be feasibly done," Robel said. "There might be the possibility of air-conditioning part of the Rec Complex for summer use."

Robel believes that it might be feasible to air-condition part of the facility for approximately two to three months, during the summer.

The plan would, most likely, include air-conditioning major use areas of the complex.

"Eight of the handball and racquetball courts, the small recreation gym, weight room, lounge and the dance and combative areas," Robel said. "Cooler would be nice, if we can come back and do it that fine."

For some students the heat inside the Rec Complex does not pose a major problem.

"People come to sweat. I don't think they mind the heat. Air conditioning would defeat the purpose," Kurt Bingham, senior in information systems, said. "When you sweat it makes you feel like you are getting more for your workout. It gives you a better mental attitude about the workout."

If the University is considering air-conditioning the Rec Complex, Bingham said he would rather see the money spent on more benches and weights for the weight room.

But for other Rec Complex users, air conditioning would be a cool change.

"I think the University should air-condition the Rec Complex. Tuition is high enough, so why not?" Bruce Golden, senior in marketing, said. "We sweat enough when we work out that we don't need a sauna."

The high temperatures inside the Rec Complex seems to have much more of an effect on those just starting to work out and older people.

"I teach an exercise class in the evening, and I think that the attendance has gone down because of the heat," said Linda Verschelden, graduate in health and physical education. "It seems to affect the older people; the hard-core people will come anyway."

Verschelden said she would like to see money taken from the proposed Fred Bramlage Coliseum to air-condition the Rec Complex.

"It would be nice if it was air-conditioned. I don't stay out here as long as I sometimes would," said Dave Farris, senior in finance and accounting.

TAMPA, Fla. — There's no question that the Philadelphia Stars are the United States Football League's best team.

But just how good are they? "Come back to me in a couple of years — maybe three — and ask me," Philadelphia nose tackle Pete Kugler said after the Stars dismantled the Arizona Wranglers, 23-3, to take the USFL's second title.

"Right now, I don't know how we could do against any of the teams from the NFL. I would like to think that we could hold our own, but who knows?"

Kugler, who signed with Philadelphia after jumping from the San Francisco 49ers of the National Football League, was the linchpin of a defense that limited George Allen's Wranglers to 119 yards while rolling up 414 themselves in Sunday night's championship game.

"There is no doubt that this is the best team in the USFL," said Philadelphia Coach Jim Mora, who in two seasons has coached Philadelphia to a 35-6 record — 19-2 this year after three playoff victories.

So it was inevitable that Mora, who spent five years in the NFL as an assistant at Seattle and New England, would be asked at Monday's early-morning news conference to compare leagues.

"We could survive in the NFL," he said, comparing the Stars to the third-year expansion team he joined in Seattle. "We could go into that league and compete and we have a number of players who could play in the NFL. We wouldn't get crunched."

On paper, the Stars don't measure up to the NFL. Two players, running back Kelvin Bryant and offensive tackle Irv Eatman, were considered blue-chip prospects by the older league, defensive end William Fuller probably would have been taken in the first two rounds of the NFL draft this year and Kugler was a starter on a 49er team that reached the National Conference finals last year.

Another Star, linebacker John Bunting, started for the Philadelphia Eagles in the 1980 Super Bowl but was cut loose at the start of the 1983 season after 12 years in the NFL.

But many of the other Stars were

NFL journeymen, outright rejects, low-round draft picks or free agents, not necessarily because they lacked skill but because they were coughed up by a computer or were thwarted by too many good players stacked up in front of them.

For example, quarterback Chuck Fusina, the championship game's Most Valuable Player, never really got a shot in the NFL.

He joined the Tampa Bay Buccaneers as a fifth-round draft choice with Doug Williams ensconced at quarterback. Released in training camp two years ago after throwing five passes in three seasons, he was picked up by the San Francisco 49ers and released after a week.

"When we were thinking of signing Chuck, I called (49er Coach) Bill Walsh to ask his opinion," says Carl Peterson, the Stars' general manager and the man given most of the credit for building the team. "Bill said he hadn't had time to give Chuck a real good look."

Now, people are looking.

Royals break losing streak, beat Cleveland

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Mike Jones pitched eight innings of one-hit ball and George Brett and Hal McRae stroked RBI singles in the eighth as the Kansas City Royals downed Cleveland 3-1 Monday night.

Jones struck out three and walked two in notching his first major league victory in almost three years. Dan Quisenberry pitched the ninth for his 24th save, giving up the Indians' second hit.

Brett Butler's single leading off the fourth was the only hit allowed by Jones, 1-1.

Dane Iorg led off the Kansas City eighth with a single off Don Schulze, 1-3, and went to second on a sacrifice. Willie Wilson walked and reliever Mike Jeffcoat got Pat Sheridan to force Iorg at third before Brett and McRae singled home two runs.

The Indians' run in the fourth was scored on sloppy Royals' playing. Butler singled, then broke for second base when Jones threw behind him to first baseman Balboni. But Balboni's throw sailed about 10 feet above shortstop U.L. Washington and Butler kept running.

In shallow left, outfielder Darryl Motley picked up the ball and fired to third. But the throw was so high that Brett merely turned and watched it sail into the Indians' dugout. Butler trotted home for a 1-0 Cleveland lead.

Farmers voice views through K-State survey

By JIM ORTH
Collegian Reporter

Politics ranks second only to the weather as a major cause for agriculture instability, said Barry Flinchbaugh, associate professor of economics.

Flinchbaugh and five other K-State economists, randomly surveyed 995 Kansas farmers for their evaluations and suggestions on topics ranging from the Farmers Home Administration (FHA) to the Payment-In-Kind (PIK) program.

The survey also asked for the opinions of the farmers regarding the current farm bill and what changes are desired by the farmers in the new bill when it goes into effect in 1985.

Bill Tierney, associate professor of agricultural economics, said that most farmers desired changes in the farm bill. Of the 1,000 Kansas farmers who answered the survey, only 19.7 percent wanted to continue with Congress and the secretary of agriculture in charge of the farm policy.

According to the K-State Cooperative Extension Service, one-third of the Kansas farmers surveyed said the government should get out of agriculture; and another one-third said an independent board or a commission should be appointed to establish agricultural programs.

"Twelve percent of the farmers didn't go for the working groups idea. But 53 percent agreed that establishing a board or a commission would best lead to longer policies," Tierney said. "The government writes a farm bill every four years. When the present administration instituted the PIK program, within months the agricultural policy changed without a new bill and debate by Congress."

Flinchbaugh said that Congress has never determined what agricultural policy should accomplish.

"Should programs help financially troubled farmers? Or, should they increase commodity prices? Kansas farmers have seen that multipurpose policy can be politically dangerous. If nothing else, the reaction to PIK has made them aware," Flinchbaugh said.

The grain and livestock farmers said that if the government continues its farm programs, it then should be less lenient on how it controls commodity surpluses.

Forty-two percent favored some type of mandatory program, while 22 percent said they like the current voluntary programs. Twenty percent said they would withdraw all government support and let competition persuade them to produce as much as they could. More than 50 percent added that future farm programs should give most price and income support to farmers with an annual gross sales of less than $40,000.

Eighty percent would not support an increase in the $50,000 limit on individual payments to those enrolled in farm programs.

More than 40 percent favored a program that provides only minimum protection. Twenty-eight percent suggested programs should be replaced with farm income insurance plans. The cost then would be shared by farmers and the government. This would allow farmers to get money when income fell below a certain average.

"Income insurance is a relatively new concept that hasn't had much discussion," Flinchbaugh said. "So, a 28 percent response indicates to me that Congress may take a look at the idea and realize that many farmers are ready to try something new."

Tierney said that most of the responding grain and livestock producers were concerned that programs designed to help agriculture can actually hurt sales of farm commodities.

A majority of farmers supported continuing target prices and deficiency payments. Less than 5 percent said the targets should be lower than the $3.03 for corn, and $4.45 for wheat in 1984.

"Target prices are the government's way of giving them (farmers) a fair and minimum income. If market prices fall below the target for a certain time, the government will supply the difference," Tierney said.

Other government programs have been designed to give farmers better prices by reducing the amount of grain for sale, Tierney said.

This allows the grain to be used as collateral. Farmers can give up their grain and have their debt cancelled. The government used this type of program for its PIK payments in the past.

Nearly half of the farmers said the government should limit the amount of reserve grain being allowed to pile up.

"Farmers are aware of how huge stocks of grain, stored at government expense, can also distort and depress market prices," Tierney said.

Farmers were almost evenly split on whether a PIK program should be used if large grain stocks develop.

"PIK did reduce the government's stored stocks of grain. We started the crop year with more than 3 billion bushels of corn and will end up with about 600 million, due to PIK and the weather," Tierney said. "Farmers have many reasons for being less than enthusiastic about PIK. Sometimes the grain they got as payment was stored in another county or state. Or, it was a different quality or variety from what they were used to marketing."

Fifty-seven percent said the government should continue payments for acreage diversion.

"It's not surprising farmers support target prices and paid land diversion," Tierney said. "The returns to agriculture have fallen sharply the last three years. At the same time, farmer's net worth has been eroding, mostly due to declining land values."

Of the farmers surveyed, 64 percent participated in the 1983 acreage reduction program for wheat and 39 percent in the feed grains Acreage Reduction Program.

Nearly 38 percent signed up for the 1983 wheat PIK program and 29 percent for feed grain PIK, according to Chuck Lambert, coordinator of the K-State research and extension project.

The surveyed farmers also want help from the government from disasters. About one-third favored the current all-risk crop insurance for which the farmers pay 30 percent and the government pays for the rest.

One-quarter of the farmers surveyed wanted a return to government-financed disaster payments. Less than 18 percent thought the crop insurance program was a good buy.

More than 50 percent of the farmers said that the government should require farmers to practice soil conservation, to qualify for other farming programs. Farmers felt that Washington should spend more of its conservation funds in states with the worst erosion.

The Soil Conservation Service Resources Inventory said that the total loss for land in Kansas was 160 million acres in 1982. That is a nearly 5.5 tons of erosion per acre per year. This is more than can be replaced naturally.

When asked to evaluate issues Congress will debate on the 1985 farm bill, 65 percent said that strengthening the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) was necessary. Under GATT, major trading nations meet to reduce trade barriers.

Second, 59.7 percent of the farmers wanted an expansion of farmer-financed developments of foreign markets.

Garnering 48 percent of the agreement was the strategy of governmental subsidy. When U.S. prices are high, the government would pay private exporters enough to enable them to meet or undercut competitors such as Canada, Europe and Australia.

Forty percent of the farmers supported a two-price plan. This plan would allow for domestic prices to be higher and exports lower and more competitive.

Residents seek new parking edict, offer petition to City Commission

Residents of the Fairchild Terrace area are presenting a proposal to the City Commission today, concerning the new parking permit ordinance scheduled to go into effect Aug. 1.

The commission passed an ordinance June 5 by a 3-2 margin, which designated no parking in the area from 2 to 9 a.m. without a parking permit. The ordinance affects Denison and Fairchild avenues, Fairchild Terrace and Laramie Street.

Tracy Turner, junior in economics and member of the Theta Xi fraternity, said a petition has been circulated to residents on Denison Avenue and Laramie Street for an alternative agreement. Turner said the petition was limited to these two streets since they are the only two affected by the new proposal.

Turner's proposal involves a "compromise" situation. It would eliminate two of the four streets included in the present ordinance. Parking permits would be distributed according to the property's frontage (amount of parking space available) on the street.

The Fairchild Terrace area has a high concentration of greek housing which includes four fraternities and four sororities. Turner said his house has parking for three cars in its parking lot; however, 51 house members are left without sufficient parking.

If Turner's proposal is not accepted, fraternity and sorority house members will be required to purchase West Stadium student parking permits. This concerns Turner because sorority members will be forced to walk back to their house after dark under insufficient lighting.

Turner said two-thirds of the neighbors have signed the petition for the commission to reconsider their action on the parking in the Fairchild area.

"There are 16 properties (houses) on Laramie Street and along Denison Avenue that we are trying to get (to sign the petition) and we have 11 of the 16 properties right now," Turner said.

He added that he has not sought any University support on the petition drive.

Area film choices lack fresh approach

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

"The Last Starfighter" is a generally enjoyable little movie. Its plot is derived almost directly from "Tron" — even computer-generated graphics were used in lieu of miniatures. Instead of our hero being zapped inside of a computer, he is grabbed by aliens and enlisted to help fight forces endangering the galaxy.

The film's hero is Alex Rogan, a teen-age dreamer who wants nothing more than to escape the stuffy constraints of his home at the Starlite Starbrite Trailer Court — a haven for white picket fences, painted rocks and concrete deer statues. He doesn't enjoy his friends' idea of a good time — spending nights at the drive-in and drinking until they puke. A major happening at the trailer park is Alex's setting a record on the Starfighter video game, but this video game is no ordinary video game. It was placed on Earth to discover a vastly talented individual with the ability to become a Starfighter.

When the movie stays on Earth, "The Last Starfighter" is quite entertaining. The scenes between Alex (Lance Guest) and his girlfriend, Maggie (Catherine Mary Stewart), are full of energy and seem quite genuine. The stifling atmosphere at the trailer park is communicated very well also. But once Alex is picked up by the aliens, the film becomes rather routine. Picture Luke Skywalker and Han Solo in the gunner turrets of the Millennium Falcon, blasting Imperial fighters, and you'll have a pretty good idea what happens in the bulk of the action scenes in "The Last Starfighter."

This film offers nothing new to these scenes; they are derived almost shot for shot from "Star Wars." There is even a trip through an asteroid, reminiscent of "Empire Strikes Back." Unlike "Tron" which had several different games for its characters to play, "The Last Starfighter" only has the one.

While Alex is saving the universe, an android takes his place on Earth. The scenes between the android and Maggie are fresh and funny. The failure of the space scenes is a rather large flaw, though — even splendid performances by Dan O'Herlihy as a lizard-faced alien and Robert Preston as a recruiting agent can't overcome the staleness of the film's action scenes.

If you saw "Police Academy" and laughed so hard you nearly threw up the six-pack of beer you drank before walking through the theater's front door, then "Bachelor Party" is your kind of film. It's clearly aimed at the sort of audience that only rarely makes it to the theater — two or three times a year at most. The witless goings-on can then seem to have some semblance of intelligence to someone completely out of touch with recent developments in cinema, such as a plot and character development.

Most people end up at a movie like this not from the reviews they read but from all the yuk-yukking they have heard from their friends. Then through an obligation to being avowed partyers they are required to sit through this drivel and even regard it as being funny.

The makers of "Bachelor Party" never try to raise the humor above gutter level; there are no pretensions that this is anything but lowbrow entertainment. But this movie must set some sort of record for missed opportunities. Situations with comic potential are constantly set up, but the payoffs are never delivered. This could have been a hilariously raunchy movie — like "Animal House" — but all it ends up being is raunchy.

The few moments of comedy provided in this film are all delivered by Tom Hanks. He may be a sort of poor man's Bill Murray, but he has an exuberance that shows through his imitative acting style.

Oh, you wanted to know what the movie is about? Well, the title pretty well sums it up. Add an affluent father who doesn't want his daughter marrying a slob and an ex-boyfriend who wants to show his old flame that her future husband is a jerk. Then add in a bunch of booze, drugs, naked women and mayhem. Make the IQs of the women characters a notch or two below their bust sizes and then you have "Bachelor Party."

*****
"Top Secret" is not nearly as effective as "Airplane!" The problem may have to do with the filmmakers actually needing to come up with a plot this time.

In "Airplane!" they had a ready-made vehicle for the plot; disaster on an airliner provided the constraints and the direction that the parody needed.

"Top Secret" doesn't have the luxury of a ready-made plot device. This left the filmmakers floundering in their efforts to give the film some sort of direction. They opted for a combination between an Elvis Presley musical and a war movie, but the parody is much less witty this time.

Before, they gave the old jokes slight twists, but here most of the jokes are just stale. There are some good sight gags, but just not enough to keep the movie interesting.

Senate requests Burford appointment recall

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Senate, by a vote of 74-19, urged President Reagan on Tuesday to withdraw his appointment of Anne M. Burford to an environmental advisory committee because of her "controversial and flawed tenure" when head of the Environmental Protection Agency.

"No, I won't," Reagan told a news conference later.

"I am standing by the appointment that I made, and I am pleased that the resolution that was passed was non-binding," the president said.

The Senate approved the "sense of the Senate" resolution sponsored by Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., who said that Burford "did virtually everything but carry out her responsibilities to the environment" during her time at EPA.

"If Anne Burford had been sent to EPA to dismantle it, she could not have done a better job," Kennedy said. "She attacked the fabric and every function of the agency, and left EPA, in the words of her successor William Ruckelshaus, 'crippled (and) in trouble.'

"She should not have been appointed to EPA in 1981 — and she should not be appointed to the (advisory committee) in 1984," Kennedy said.

The resolution was supported unanimously by Democrats and by 33 of the 52 Republicans who voted. Despite the heavy Republican support, however, Reagan he saw no justification for withdrawing the appointment.

The president said the former

EPA chief "obeyed the instructions that we gave her" to assert executive privilege and refuse documents to a House subcommittee, the action that sparked the congressional investigation into EPA.

Despite allegations of mismanagement, the president said, "there was not one single allegation that was proven in any way, that stood up under all the shouting and the furor."

The president took the opportunity once again to defend his administration's environmental record, saying the air and water were cleaner than when he took office, safety in the national parks had been much improved and wilderness areas had been greatly expanded. He did not mention that his administration opposed many of the state wilderness bills in their original form.

Burford resigned as EPA administrator on March 9, 1983, in the wake of investigations by six congressional committees into allegations of mismanagement at the agency. She was one of 12 top officials to resign or be fired. A Justice Department investigation cleared her of any wrongdoing.

On July 2, Reagan appointed Burford to be chairman of the National Advisory Committee on Oceans and Atmosphere, which advises the Commerce Department's National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration.

The job does not require Senate confirmation, but Kennedy's resolution expressed "the sense of the Senate that President Reagan should withdraw the appointment."

Reagan says he has no plan for raising taxes next year

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan said Tuesday night he has "no plan" for a tax increase next year despite Democratic rival Walter F. Mondale's assertion that one is inevitable no matter who wins the election. Moments later, however, Reagan described circumstances under which he might propose an increase.

In his 26th televised news conference, Reagan tread softly on questions concerning Democratic vice presidential nominee Geraldine Ferraro, saying he'd already "turned the other cheek" on her assault upon his policies as un-Christian.

Reagan said he thought a woman nominated as vice president was probably "long overdue," but he rejected charges raised by both members of the Democratic ticket.

Reagan, confronting Mondale directly on Central American policy, said Democratic treatment "of El Salvador is comparable to letting El Salvador bleed to death." Mondale has said he would end the "illegal war" in Central America — namely covert support of Nicaraguan rebels — within 100 days after taking office.

The president said Mondale has "repeatedly and over the years" called for tax increases as a budget cure-all. Asked if he would flatly rule out a 1985 request for higher taxes, Reagan first said "Yes."

Mondale had said that taxes would go up no matter who was elected because of the imperative of controlling federal deficits projected at $200 billion annually for the next several years. "Mr. Reagan will raise taxes, and so will I. He won't tell you, I just did," Mondale declared in his nomination acceptance speech.

"I have no plan for a tax increase," Reagan said. "I believe it would be counterproductive" for the economic recovery.

Mr. Reagan will raise taxes, and so will I. He won't tell you, I just did.
— Walter Mondale

So he (Mondale) believes in tax increases, and I believe that our goal must be to...reduce the tax burden for our people.

— Ronald Reagan

However, moments later, the president began to hedge that stand by saying "you would have to look at the tax structure" if all possible spending cuts were made and the deficit still remained, "but I think we're a long way from that point."

Mondale insisted that both spending cuts and a tax increase would be necessary to meet his pledge of cutting the deficit by two-thirds in his first term. Reagan did not spell out where he thought additional spending cuts could be found on a scale to dramatically reduce the huge deficits.

But he said the recovery, with millions more in the workforce, would itself produce greater revenues and lessen pressures for higher tax rates.

"So he (Mondale) believes in tax increases, and I believe that our goal must be to...reduce the tax burden for our people," the president said.

As for Democratic charges that his program was designed for the wealthy, Reagan declared, "There is no basis for this demagoguery that we are trying to base or get our recovery on the backs of the needy."

Reagan opened his news conference — his first since Mondale won the Democratic nomination last week, with a call to the election year Congress to approve several bills, including a so-called balanced budget amendment to the Constitution. The measure actually would not require balanced spending, but would make red-ink appropriations more difficult procedurally.

He got his message across for free, since the news conference was telecast and broadcast by the radio and TV networks. Earlier, his campaign had paid for political commercials to deliver the same theme.

In addition to the balanced-budget amendment, Reagan reinstated his call for tax breaks to parents of lower and middle income private school students, increased retirement benefits for housewives, tax breaks to encourage inner-city business investments, anti-crime legislation and an "equal access" bill permitting religious student groups to meet after hours in schools.

State officials doubt benefits of raising drinking age to 21

LYNN BENDER
and JIM ORTH
Collegian Reporters

(Editor's note: This is the first of two articles about the effects of the recently passed federal drinking age bill.)

President Reagan recently signed a uniform 21 drinking age law which will deny federal highway funds if the state fails to adopt the law by Oct. 1, 1986. The law is aimed at decreasing the number of traffic fatalities caused by drunken drivers.

Despite legislative good intentions, area officials believe the law may backfire.

"The 21 liquor law may not do what lawmakers hope. Underage students will not stop drinking, but instead will be forced to now drink in their cars. This trend will increase with this law, creating an even greater hazard than we have today," said Elaine Spensor-Carver, director of the Manhattan Alcohol and Other Drugs Service.

If a state decides not to comply with the law, it could lose millions of dollars in federal highway funds.

Under the legislation, a state would lose 5 percent in federal highway construction funds if it does not raise its drinking age to 21 by Sept. 30, 1986, and 10 percent if not put into law by Sept. 30, 1987.

Vougn Bolton of the Kansas Department of Transportation said Kansas would lose $5.5 million in the first year, and $11 million the second year. The law would affect federal funding for improvements on interstate, primary and secondary highway systems, but not funding for bridges.

The law will have an impact on 27 states which now allow people under the age of 21 to buy at least some types of liquor.

Although the legal drinking age for liquor in Kansas is 21, anyone over 18 years of age can buy and drink 3.2 percent beer, also known as a cereal malt beverage.

The new law will have to be passed by both the Kansas House and Senate, and signed by the governor. If passed, the effective date will be set by the Legislature.

The reaction across the state on the proposed law is diverse, both in the content of, and the effect the law will have.

"Response from constituents in government is for passing of the 21 liquor law, but if we don't get liquor by the drink I'm against passing the 21 law," said Steven Hendricks, aide to Gov. John Carlin. "Liquor by the drink would be economically better for the state."

The "grandfather clause" is the only option that Hendricks believes could be included.

"The state's option, the only option, is the grandfather clause — phasing it in. Raise the age one year at a time: 19 years of age next year, 20 years of age the following year, and then 21. I feel this would be a lot better than an outright jump to 21. Slowly, but surely," Hendricks said.

Hendricks believes that Kansas is behind the times, and this is the reason why the issue of raising the drinking age to 21 was not adopted in earlier years.

"With the pressure from special-interest groups, the high number of traffic fatalities, and outcry from the public, the issue was finally looked into," Hendricks said.

The drinking age is seen as a moral issue by Hendricks.

"People with higher morals are getting results, like the right-to-life group," he added.

Even though Hendricks favors a drinking age of 21, he believes the federal government virtually blackmailed the states into accepting the law.

"I feel that it is blackmail; it's totally unnecessary. It would have taken place in Kansas anyway, (but) just taken a little bit longer. It was a strong-arm tactic by the government. Of course it's blackmail — government throwing their weight around," Hendricks said.

Michael Swenson, Gov. Carlin's press secretary, said Carlin was not taking a strong position of pro or con on the issue, but he believed that education was the key to combating the problem of drinking and driving, instead of just changing the drinking age.

The Associated Students of Kansas (ASK) lobbying group has not made a decision on whether to continue its fight against the 21 drinking age law.

"A decision has not been made, and it will not be made until the legislative assembly meets in November. The decision will be up to the delegates," said Chris Graves, ASK legislative director.

He said ASK could pull out completely or propose its own package.

"If the 21 liquor law is adopted we would probably try to have some provisions added: (a provision so that) 18- to 20-year-olds (who work in establishments that serve alcoholic beverages) would not lose their jobs, a mandatory alcohol education program and a mandatory seat belt law," Graves said.

Graves said that ASK fought the 21 drinking age law because the organization believed the increase in the age restriction was unfair.

"The increase in the age was unfair; 18- to 20-year-olds are adults and should be treated as such, and be able to have the same luxuries," Graves said.

Graves believes there is not conclusive evidence that raising the drinking age to 21 will do anything beneficial.

"In many states, the 21 liquor law has worked, but in many it does not. There is no conclusive evidence that shows that it does work. With the 21 law it would be difficult to continue alcohol education to younger ages," Graves said.

Resignation draws fire from women's righters

By The Associated Press

ATLANTIC CITY, N.J. — Miss America pageant officials said Tuesday they consider the resignation of Vanessa Williams over nude photos a "closed chapter," but a women's rights group called the controversy an example of "blaming the victim."

Meanwhile, the new Miss America, 21-year-old Suzette Charles, said she never would have allowed herself to be put in the kind of situation that led to the ouster of the woman who placed first in the contest last September.

Williams, 21, of Millwood, N.Y., the first black to wear the crown, resigned as Miss America on Monday at the request of pageant officials. The request was prompted by nude photographs that were taken of Williams before she entered the pageant and that have been published in a men's magazine.

It was the first time in the 63-year history of the pageant that a Miss America stepped down.

Albert A. Marks Jr., executive director of the pageant, said it was time to put the episode in the past and move ahead. He said he and other pageant officials were weary of answering reporters' questions triggered by disclosure of the photographs last Thursday.

"It's a closed chapter. I have no further comment," he said.

Williams, in an interview on the NBC-TV program "Today," said Tuesday that "it took literally 72 hours" — the time allotted by pageant officials — to decide to step down.

"And it's very, very tough because I know that I'm strong and I know that sometimes I don't want to give up, but there are a few sacrifices that have to be made," she said.

Charles was asked Tuesday what would happen if she were embroiled in a similar situation.

"It's hard to say because I wouldn't let something like that happen to me. I can't say what I would do, because I wouldn't put myself in that position," she said on the "CBS Morning News" show.

Charles, who also is black, was Miss New Jersey and first runner-up to Williams. But the Mays Landing resident said she never thought she might have to assume the title.

In Washington, the Political Support Group for Minority Women denounced Penthouse magazine and the freelance photographer who took the photos "for their callous exploitation of Vanessa Williams" and called for a boycott of the magazine in the nation's capital.

President Marie Dias Bembery said Williams was "an inspiration and role model" whose career has been ruined by publication of the pictures.

"This is yet another example of 'blaming the victim,' while the real culprits not only go unpunished, but reap generous monetary gains at the expense of the victim," she said.

University to restripe, rework lots

The Union student parking lot will be closed beginning Monday until Aug. 15 for cleanup work and restriping.

The library parking lot (lot A4) will close Friday morning, until further notice for complete renovation.

"The lot will be completely reconstructed. The existing surface material will be removed and a new lot (will be) constructed to replace it," Abe Fattaey, civil engineer for University Facilities, said.

When completed the lot will have a different traffic flow pattern and a new appearance.

The $56,000 project includes a landscape design that will include a yard irrigation system and an area for bench seating.

Curbs and gutters will be built and lot lighting will be improved. Also, a drive-through book drop will be installed.

The renovation will not make room for any more parking spaces, although more stalls will be marked for handicapped parking, he said.

Fattaey said the completion date is not definite but plans are to be done with the project sometime in September.

Varied factors account for choice of majors

By TIM FITZGERALD
Collegian Reporter

Ramona Lucius's English Composition I class has been doing more than just methodical theme writing this summer. The class has been seeking answers to the question many college students ask — "Why did I choose this major?"

"Lucius, a graduate student in English, got the idea for the group research project from a series of articles which appeared in the May 24 issue of USA Today.

Each of the 25 members in the class was required to interview six students for his paper, but Lucius said many students interviewed more students than they were required.

The students conducted interviews with a wide range of students. Lucius said the interviews included old and young students, international and domestic students, as well as graduate and undergraduate students.

"The (USA Today) article said students choose their major based on pay and job availability. Besides pay and job availability, we received some interesting responses," she said.

"We found that there was an equal response between personal interest and job availability and pay. A few even said they were in the field because it was easy to get a degree and a few were even brave enough to say they were in an easy major until they could find a husband," Lucius said.

Inge Griffin, freshman in pre-nursing, said students gave many reasons for deciding upon a major. Many of the older people she interviewed said they had returned to school to earn a degree in a field where there are job possibilities.

"The main reason I found out why people choose their major, is they wanted to have job security with something which is in demand today. I had an Army officer who wants to get out of the Army, and already has a degree in geography. He wants to get out, but can't find a job, so he is coming back to get a degree in business administration," Griffin said.

"Students go about it differently.

It seems like the younger ones are guided by intuition or by family...but an older student coming back has found you can't change the world (in their major), so they come back to get a degree in something they can get a job in," she added.

In Griffin's research she talked to James Akins, associate director of K-State's Career Planning and Placement Center, who agreed with her findings. He said that often finances will be a significant factor in whether or not a graduate decides to return to school.

"There is difference in how a returning student chooses a major. They tend to be more pragmatic," Akins said.

Catherine Werme's research contradicts Griffin's and Akins' beliefs. Werme, a freshman in physics, found many older students who had returned to school to get a degree in a field which interested them more than their first degree.

"Something I found was that the older students, those older than your normal college age, would pick things that they liked. They had been out working and now were coming back to get another degree in something they like," Werme said.

Akins believes many freshmen come to college picking a major which a role model ideologically impressed upon them.

"A person who wants to be an engineer, for example, has probably been influenced by a teacher or an engineer somewhere along the way, or perhaps he has a parent who is an engineer," Akins said.

The purpose for going to school varied depending where the student was from, according to Lisa Davison, a sophomore in arts and sciences.

"The majority of the people, at least from here in Kansas, were interested in job availability and pay, but the foreign students were more interested in something which could help their country. But they did say they could make more money in their country by having a degree from the United States," Davison said.

Davison also found students who are going to school while they are husband hunting.

"And then, there were those that were up here just looking for a husband. I was talking to some girls in computer science and not only did they not like their major and didn't intend to go into that field, but they wanted to find themselves a husband who was going into computer technology, so people, look out," Davison said.

Werme found it was difficult to define whether the student entered the field because of personal interest or pay.

"They all said they were interested (in their field). So, I asked if money had nothing to do with it and they would say, 'Oh, no, there is good money, or I wouldn't be here, but I picked it because I was interested in it.' It was like they were picking the money field which interested them," Werme said.

Deneen Kimbrough, sophomore in graphic design, said she believes there is a lot of pressure on those students who have successful parents.

"The things that people do choose are socially defined as to what society expects of people. The majority of people who are expected to make money or are expected to make it big are trying to move up because of this stratification system we have...it's like trying to keep up with the Joneses. If going to college and getting a high-tech degree will do it (then they do)," Kimbrough said.

Griffin agreed with Kimbrough's findings from talking to students who had returned to school.

"We are all trying to do better, to move up the social ladder. They come back because they can't move up the social ladder, so they choose something so they can," Griffin said.

Kimbrough also noticed a difference in a student's reason for going into a difficult major depending on who was paying for his education.

"I notice a difference between students who are paying for school and those whose parents are paying for school. (Those paying for their own) want to get into a profitable field so they can make it for themselves, as opposed to those who are up here because mom and dad said 'make it big,'" Kimbrough said.

UPC gains different perspective

New adviser to plan special events

By KRISITE CRABTREE
Collegian Reporter

The Union Program Council will get a fresh and different perspective from new UPC adviser Janice Kiser, who began the job June 25 and is taking time this summer to learn the ropes.

Kiser's job at K-State will be the adviser of the Special Events Committee which organizes concerts. She will also advise the Outdoor Recreation Committee.

"I think what we'll do this year is to slow down on the concerts. We'll probably tone down and not do so many shows and try to use McCain Auditorium for smaller shows," Kiser said.

Kiser, 29, received a bachelor of arts degree in sociology and a minor in psychology at Missouri Southern State College in Joplin, Mo., in 1977. She received her master's degree in guidance and counseling with an emphasis in student personnel at Eastern Illinois University in Charleston, Ill.

She also served a one-year internship at Eastern Illinois at the student activities office. Kiser explained that this program is a competency-based training program for people wanting to be student activities professionals, and is certified with the National Association of Campus Activities. To be certified, Kiser said, a minimum of 14 competencies must be completed.

"Each of the competencies was different and was like a class," Kiser said. "It was a busy year, very intense. In the end, I got through the certification, but I didn't think I would."

Kiser said that her interest in student activities became real to her during her undergraduate years. She became involved with the college union board, worked with the concerts and was a lecture coordinator.

"My undergraduate degree was in sociology, but I didn't really want to work in the sociology field. I really got interested in student activities," she said.

Following graduation, she wanted to get the experience of working in an entertainment agency and do the selling, so she worked for Blytham Ltd. Entertainment Agency in Champaign, Ill., for six years.

"I always wanted to get back in the college market working in student activities. I applied and got the assistantship at Eastern and then applied here and got this job. I was looking in this area," she said.

Kiser's professional work experience includes office manager at Blytham Ltd. Entertainment Agency; agent for the college and club departments at Blytham Ltd.; administrative assistant for the club department at Blytham Ltd.; and administrative assistant for the college department at Blytham Ltd.

Kiser was born in Salina, then her family moved to Missouri when she was in the fourth grade. She said her parents live in Webb City, Mo., so she claims Missouri as her home.

"My mother and father are very happy I'm here at K-State because all my aunts and uncles went to school here," Kiser said.

When asked about her opinions of Manhattan, Kiser said she thinks this is a good town because the people are so friendly.

Summer can bring mosquito problems

By JIM ORTH
Collegian Reporter

Enjoying summer evenings is not always easy if one has to constantly slap and scratch oneself to get rid of pesky mosquitoes.

"Mosquitoes can become a serious problem this time of the year, if measures are not taken to control them properly," said Judy Bertholf, K-State extension entomologist.

"Insect populations run in cycles, some being heavy seasons for one insect and not for another. This happens to be a peak year for the mosquito," she said.

Bertholf said that to control the mosquito population one must first eliminate breeding places.

"Mosquito eggs cannot hatch without the use of water. By removing all unnecessary standing water, you help reduce breeding and hatching areas," Bertholf said.

Female mosquitoes will lay eggs in areas of standing water. The eggs are about one-fortieth of an inch long with an elongated shape. The female will lay eggs in batches of 50 to 200 with several batches being laid by the same female, Bertholf said.

"Mosquitoes are so bothersome to humans because the female requires a blood meal before producing eggs," she said. "In warm weather, like what we're having now, eggs hatch in three or four days. After hatching, the larvae will feed on organic matter."

Six or seven days later, the larvae will develop into the pupa stage. This is the non-feeding stage of development between the last larvae and the adult form. The pupa will then transform into an adult mosquito two days after becoming a pupa. The entire process takes 11 or 12 days, Bertholf said.

To control mosquitoes, Bertholf suggested the following: remove unnecessary water containers; dispose of tin cans; put old tires in a place where they cannot collect water; fill tree holes with concrete; empty and wash out bird baths once a week; clean out rain gutters, and examine flat roofs after rains to be sure no water remains there.

Bertholf added that people should drain or fill in stagnant pools and swampy areas. If pools cannot be drained or filled, all debris and floating vegetation should be removed.

"Eliminating and removing standing water from areas around your home is the most important thing to remember when trying to keep your home free from mosquito infestation," Bertholf said. "These measures may not always solve your problem. Some mosquitoes are strong fliers and may reach your home from other breeding places."

Repellents are a good protection against mosquitoes when outdoors, Bertholf said. Repellent protection lasts one to five hours, depending on the amount of sweating and rubbing of the skin, and the number of mosquitoes, Bertholf said.

"It's important that you cover the area of the skin evenly. Mosquitoes will quickly find areas not protected. This is why sprays are preferred more than a rub-on brand," Bertholf said. "Spray repellents tend to give a more uniform coverage but are more expensive."

According to Bertholf, some states have a law permitting organization of mosquito control districts. Jurisdiction of the districts may be exercised by the state departments of agriculture or health.

The law permits organization of a mosquito control district in which a majority of residents indicate by petition or vote that they desire it, and the need is shown by an adequate survey of the local mosquito problem, Bertholf said.

"If you live in an organized mosquito control district, support the organization. Organized control can accomplish much more than individual efforts alone," Bertholf said. "If you are not certain whether such a district can be formed in your area, consult your State Department of Agriculture or the State Department of Health."

Switching majors changes student's lifestyle

By LISA FORD
Collegian Reporter

A major change has kept Kelli Wondra busy this summer.

An actress with the K-State Summer Repertory Theater, Wondra changed her major from sociology to theater last semester. The difference in her lifestyle since then she said, has been tremendous.

"When I first came to K-State, I was a sociology major," said Wondra, a junior. "I came here (K-State) in January from Washburn (University). Initially I transferred to study sociology, but I moved into an apartment with a friend from my hometown. She participates in forensics, which is something I competed in in high school. I wanted to get back into it."

Trying out for the Summer Repertory Theater was done more or less on a whim, Wondra said. This is her first experience with college-level theater.

"I'd had a lot of experience with theater in high school, but when it came time for college I thought I'd better decide on a more feasible field of study," Wondra said. "It was hard to stay away from it (theater), though. I love it too much."

Wondra said that acting is, by far, the hardest job she's ever had and certainly the most mentally demanding.

"It's not the number of roles that you play that makes acting tough; trying to really become the person that you're portraying is what makes things difficult," Wondra said. "It's not the fact that you're doing a different play every night that's hard; the amount of concentration, attention and energy it takes to create another person is what's unreal. Walking out on stage and trying to convince the audience that you're another person is a real challenge."

Acting isn't something that someone can learn as far as Wondra is concerned. She hasn't taken any formal acting or theater classes.

"People who act have an ability just like people who are athletic or artistic have an ability," Wondra said. "You have to possess the capability for doing it. Through classes and learning, you refine your ability into a real talent."

Positions for the summer repertory group were advertised in the Collegian, through the speech department and on posters placed around campus.

Actors and actresses were chosen through an audition process in which each applicant must bring an audition piece to be read.

"The director will also ask that each actor do a cold reading," Wondra said. "This is when the director hands the actor a script and asks him to read it on the spur of the moment."

Wondra doesn't believe that too

Staff/Chris Stewart

Kelli Wondra, junior in theater, sits on the set of the Summer Repertory Theater's production "The Dining Room."

many people think of theater as a real vocation.

"Some people really believe that actors, actresses and directors just go out for eight hours a day and play on or with film — they don't," Wondra said. "I read somewhere that being an actress is supposed to be glamorous and I laughed. I haven't seen anything glamorous about it yet."

Theater, as a profession, is a lot of hard work, Wondra said. Cast members become very close, not only because of the common interest, but because of the lengthy amount of time they spend together.

"In June when this all started, we were spending 12 hours a day with each other at least," Wondra said. "We'd come in for a production meeting at 8 in the morning and we wouldn't leave until 8 that evening."

"Having jitters or being nervous isn't a problem after you've been acting a while," Wondra said. "Opening night is always the worst."

"On opening night I'm just a bundle of nerves," Wondra said. "I think everyone is on opening night because of the very special atmosphere. It's the first time you've given your best and it's special. There's a real audience out there and the energy that's in the air is unreal."

Actors are usually able to channel and control their energy more effectively the longer they act, she said.

"Usually by the time you really get into the production there's a different type of energy," Wondra said. "If you're concentrating correctly, you're not really aware that there's an audience out there. You're so into it; it's like stepping out of yourself and becoming someone else for three hours."

Wondra said that after three or four times the acting becomes easier. There should be a more comfortable feeling and the concentration level between the cast members becomes much higher because an actor has done it so many times.

"After a while you just don't get nervous anymore," Wondra said. "You still get the jitters, but that's different from being nervous. When you're out on stage you don't feel any different than if you were out on the street."

As far as careers go, there are several options in theater besides acting, Wondra said. Directing and playwriting are two other theater options. The technical and administrative aspects of theater are certainly the most secure professions, Wondra said.

"My basic interests are directing and playwriting, although I think it's hard to separate any area," Wondra said. "I'd be happy doing either of the two at this point."

The directors for Summer Repertory Theater are Lew Shelton, the artistic director, and Doug Hoseney, a recent graduate of K-State.

Wondra said the summer directors control the interpretation of what's being said. They have the responsibility of making sure that the actors interpret the play within what the writer was trying to say. If there weren't directors, there'd be too many versions of every play, Wondra said.

"My favorite play, acting-wise, is 'Dining Room,'" Wondra said. "I like it the best just because everyone is involved in it. You get the chance to work with every other member of the company."

"Dining Room" is a play made up of a series of scenes done in the same room. Each actor rotates characters, doing a total of seven or eight. Wondra said this is difficult to do, but that she is lucky in the sense that all of the characters she portrays are written very differently. That makes it easier for her to change character.

"Crimes of the Heart," a play in which Kelli portrays a shy, 30-year-old, insecure woman, has been the most challenging play for her this summer. It's a three-act play and the character she portrays, she said, is nothing like herself.

"When I first read the play, I hated her (the character, Lenny Magrath)," Wondra said. "I thought she was silly and weak, but she's really very strong in her own way. It's just hard for me to change my mind-set from me to her because she's so different."

"When there's nothing from your own personal experience that you can apply to a character, it gets sticky," Wondra added. "You really have to create something and you need to use your imagination more."

The most important trait of an actor is self-confidence, Wondra said. An actor must be able to handle rejection. Being persistent and optimistic is also important.

"I'm going to concentrate on a purely theater curriculum this fall," Wondra said. "I'd like to continue in theater, but right now it's just a matter of deciding where I'm going to be happy. I don't think I'm ready to go out to California and try to make it big — there are literally thousands that do. I think that would be extremely difficult. I really have no desire to do that at all."

Lavish congressional pensions need reform

Are former politicians worth more retired than when serving as elected officials?

According to a study released this week by the National Taxpayers Union, someone thinks so. The taxpayer union study found that more than 135 former senators and representatives are currently receiving more money in salary as retired public officials than they ever did while in office.

Eighty-three retired members of the House and Senate receive more than $50,000 annually, the report found. Meanwhile, for the rest of Americans relying on the Social Security system upon retirement, the maximum annual income is currently at $8,536.

This is a stark contrast with the highest congressional pension earner, former House Speaker Carl Albert of Oklahoma who receives an yearly benefit of $87,864 — $22,000 more than the $65,000 he earned before his retirement in 1977.

There is something fundamentally wrong with a pension system that allows a greater salary for a worker after retirement than when he was a member of the work force. The current congressional system is based on a member's length of service and the average pay earned during the final three years in office. Congressmen pay up to 8 percent of their salary to participate in the program — an amount that is matched with taxpayers' money.

It works out to a pretty nice living for those who are lucky enough to become involved in the program. While only 32 percent of Social Security retirees or their survivors receive retirement benefits — from the 95 percent they pay into the fund — every congressional member is included in their pension program.

The congressional pension program conjures up an image of the elite getting more at the expense of the average citizen. Although certainly government needs to offer solid benefits to attract talented individuals into public office, it seems that such a lavish pension goes beyond the bounds of sensibility.

Perhaps it is sensible to pay former Congressman Frank Carlson of Kansas an annual salary of $59,652, but what has he done lately to deserve such payment? Has he enacted any important legislation or served any constituency in recent years?

Maybe it is feasible to give former Presidents Richard Nixon and Gerald Ford — two among the 138 former legislators earning more now than while they did in office — salaries of $30,816 and $64,800, respectively, but why give them even more money on top of their large presidential pension, with Secret Service protection included in the deal?

A total of $13 million was paid out in congressional pensions last year. While congressional officials deserve a reward, in most cases, for their public service, benefits such as the ones offered now are too extreme in the face of a dying Social Security program. Reform of this program is definitely needed, but don't look for any action soon from politicians who would be taking money out of their own already-full pockets.

Newspapers attempt to find public's answers

I make my living off the evening news.
Just give me something,
something I can use.
People love it when you lose, they love dirty laundry.

These lyrics from a popular song seem to summarize the public's image of the media, be it television, radio or the press. Many people, while starting their day off with a newspaper, morning television news talk show or radio news broadcast, still believe the majority of journalists are phony hypocrites with overzealous curiosities.

As a member, and hopefully future member, of the journalistic community, I disagree. However, even I question some instances in which the media might overstep the boundaries of news worthiness and delve too far into an individual's private life.

But what a reader must realize is that most responsible journalists (and this statement alone eliminates several weekly supermarket tabloids from further discussion in this column) do not look at news events with dollar signs and escalating circulation statistics shining in their beady little eyes.

KAREN BELLUS
Collegian Columnist

Most journalists regard news events with a public consciousness. Their job is to report events that people should know about, an event that could change the way the public votes, acts or spend its money.

However, for a person who has been in one way or another hurt by these news articles or reports, reporting the news is more of an intrusion and exploitation of one's mistakes than the informative report it is intended to be.

A recent example is the case of Vanessa Williams, the first black Miss America. Williams posed nude in photographs before she received the title. The pageant officials asked Williams to give up her title.

The photographs are scheduled to appear in the September issue of Penthouse magazine.

This is news. It is not gossip. Williams has admitted to posing in those photographs and the story contained facts about the photographs and the pageant officials' reaction.

What it did not contain was a moral judgment. The news story concerning this event did not say Williams should surrender her crown as Miss America. It did not say she should be penalized or that she deserves to lose her beauty pageant title. Those opinions and conceptions were made either on the editorial page or by individual readers.

Still, many have criticized the media's attempt to find out Williams' account, or to find out the specifics of the upcoming publication of the photographs, or the reasoning behind the beauty pageant officials' decision. But everyone would want to know the answers to these questions, and if they had not been provided, the newspapers would have been criticized for giving the readers only half of the information.

Many have also criticized the media's headline assault on certain members of the government. For example, former Secretary of the Interior James Watt and his somewhat controversial statements, often concerning ethnic slurs, were detailed in many a front page story. But others, especially environmentalists, have also realized the important role the media played in his eventual resignation.

Obviously, not all cases are clear cut, as the recent onslaught of libel and invasion of privacy cases have shown. But newspapers do not usually accuse or report unless there are hard facts to substantiate the news story. In fact, most of the libel cases in courts today concern not the strong, straightforward stories, but the stories that appear more innocent and for one reason or another have caused people to read between the lines and derive a meaning not intentionally meant by the reporter.

So the next time you pick up the newspaper to read about more details of a government scandal, bank robbery or other headline news, remember that My Lai, Watergate and the Three-Mile Island nuclear accident were all regarded by many as "dirty laundry."

Drinking bill a clear case of federal blackmail

Here is an age-old saying for Kansans soon to be 18 — "Just when you think you've got the world on a string, you get rope burns."

For those about to turn 18 who will probably lose their privilege to drink alcohol beverages (legally) in the state of Kansas, that saying is probably more relevant than it's ever been.

President Reagan signed into law earlier this month a clean little piece of federal blackmail which promises to remove a portion of federal highway funds from states if they don't change their drinking age to 21 by 1986.

This means the state of Kansas would be subject to the reclamation of approximately $11 million of federal highway funds if the Kansas Legislature would decide to ignore the fearless leaders in Washington.

Think of the cement $11 million will buy; there is little chance Kansas is going to ignore this congressional and presidential mandate.

I would imagine Gov. Carlin isn't too pleased about having $11 million of cement held over his head. I doubt he'll put up a fight on this one and who can blame him?

A 21 drinking age has been proposed and denied before in Kansas, but never fear, the federal government has opted to decide the lifestyle of Kansans through the use of bureaucratic arm twisting.

The arguments in favor of what Congress has done have been repeated over and over. All of this about lowering the highway death rate by removing drunken teenagers from the roads is quite touching and very noble.

Thank you, Mr. President. With the swoop of your executive pen you have completed the legislation of morality under the pretense of protecting ourselves from ourselves.

I still haven't been convinced that the attempted removal from the road of these post-pubescent drunkards will save very many lives.

Those underage who drink enough to kill on the highway won't be stopped by the law. It's already illegal to drive under the influence and it isn't stopping these boozehounds on wheels from killing.

TIM FITZGERALD
Guest Columnist

This is not to say a 21 drinking age won't have any affect. I am convinced that the removal of any three-year age group from the drinking public will slightly lower the number of alcohol-related highway deaths in any state.

So, in an effort to protect the American public, I propose that the ages of 40 and 43 no longer be included in the legal drinking age. After all, whose reactions would you trust more — a drunk 20-year-old, or an equally drunk 40-year-old?

I'm riding with the 20-year-old. This 40-year boozie shouldn't be on the road, I'm appalled we let these people on our roads.

Our federal government, in all of its entangled wisdom, has decided to handle the major social problem of our time through the passing of legislation. Education, not legislation, is the solution to this critical problem in American society.

All of this has caused me to become quite confused about when adulthood truly begins. If you are 18, you are held accountable for your actions while not being old enough to control your actions. Brilliant piece of reasoning, Mr. President.

If an 18 year old is mature enough to bleed on foreign soil, he is mature enough to drink alcohol on his own soil. If an 18 year old is wise enough to be held accountable for crimes he might commit, it shouldn't be a crime for him to drink alcohol.

Let us not be fooled, this isn't the first time the federal government has used this method of political blackmail to coerce the states into obeying its will. The same method was used to implement the 55 mile per hour speed limit.

Now it will be "55 and 21 saves lives."

Don't get me wrong, I'm not against the 55 mile per hour speed limit (the snail's pace it is), but I think if cars were eliminated, the highway death rate would really be low.

If the federal government wants to save lives why don't they go as far as reimplementing prohibition and enacting walking as the only legal form of transportation. If the United States wasn't allowed to drink or drive, think of how many Americans would still be alive.

What is so surprising about all of this is the action comes from a president who spoke of states' rights when he was elected. I seem to recall you saying something about the federal government should do less meddling in the affairs of the states, Mr. President.

I guess you just proved yourself wrong. A strong federal government must be the only way to keep the states in line.

So, for those about to turn 18 — never fear, you will finally be adults. You wanted to drink?

Well, Washington has said to the 27 states which don't have a 21 drinking age that you're only a pseudo-adult.

Care list not a quality guide

Editor,

Re: Mark Sullins' letter of July 24. I find, through personal experience, that although the health department's list of licensed and/or registered child care homes is a useful guide to finding people interested in (baby) sitting children, it cannot be used as an indicator of good, or even adequate child care.

It is not difficult to be registered or licensed — clean your home, fence your yard, you're OK. The quality of child care, though, is a different matter. My children deserve the best I can find for them, so I shop for day care and I have found very few good homes on those health department lists. (I have horror tales of licensed homes I have tried.)

The best bet I have found, is to pay more than I can afford and put my children into a commercial center with structured learning, a decent playground and degreed instructors.

I greet with joy the possibility of a parent-run, less expensive day-care center. The K-State area does need this option.

As for the health department list, also available at Holton Hall, be careful parents, licensed and/or registered does not guarantee good, loving care for your child. Be an aware consumer.

Princess Diana makes appearance

LONDON — Princess Diana, who is expecting her second baby in September, visited a center for fetal research Tuesday in her last official solo appearance before the birth.

During her tour of the research unit at King's College Hospital, the 23-year-old wife of Prince Charles revealed that their firstborn, 2-year-old Prince William, is something of a royal cutup.

She also saw equipment that monitors mothers with troublesome pregnancies.

Memories return during screening

HOLLYWOOD — A preview screening of "Grandview, U.S.A.," a film set in a small Illinois town, evoked warm memories for members of the movie's cast and crew who lived on location in Pontiac, Ill., for about three months.

"Tell them I miss them and love them and I think they'll be very happy with the film," actress Jamie Lee Curtis, who stars as the operator of a demolition derby, said after the screening Monday.

About 800 people attended the screening at the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences in Beverly Hills. The screening was followed by a gala party at the trendy Palace nightclub.

C. Thomas Howell, 17, who plays a rebellious high school senior in the movie, attended Pontiac schools to bone up on his part. Howell, whose film credits include "E.T., the Extra-Terrestrial" and "Tank," said small-town life was a revelation.

Low sales sends Simmons home

EUGENE, Ore. — Exercise guru Richard Simmons arrived for a special appearance here, but flew back home to Los Angeles after finding out that ticket sales for the event had been small, organizers said.

Representatives for the television star blamed Simmons' departure Monday night on a "family emergency," said Dan Tripps, executive director of the Olympic Scientific Congress in Eugene. Simmons was to have appeared at a congress session.

Kayaker finishes 1,500-mile trip

NEW ORLEANS — James Snyder, who has finished his 1,500-mile paddle down the Mississippi River in a kayak by arriving at the World's Fair, says he wants more.

"I am ready for another river," Snyder said Monday.

The Gulfport, Miss., contractor was slim and tanned in cutoff jeans and a life jacket. He also had a thirst. "Where's the beer?" he yelled to a friend.

Snyder, who retraced the 1861 exploratory voyage of LaSalle, began his voyage in Chicago on May 12.

Snyder made the trip to raise money for the research on multiple sclerosis. His best friend, Kurt Miller of Akron, Ohio, suffers from the debilitating disease.

Royals whip Toronto

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY — Kansas City pitcher Mark Gubicza said he didn't have his best stuff, but the rookie right-hander had his fastball when he needed it Tuesday in a 5-4 Royals win over the Toronto Blue Jays.

The Royals were clinging to a one-run lead when Toronto third baseman Rance Mulliniks tripled leading off the seventh.

After Ernie Whitt grounded out, Toronto sent up pinch-hitter Cliff Johnson, a .296 hitter this season.

Gubicza struck him out with a fastball he said was just out of the strike zone.

"I threw it as hard as I could," said Gubicza, 7-8. "I just reared back and threw it. I didn't even know where it went. I just threw it as hard as I ever threw a ball."

"I didn't have my best stuff all night. I didn't have any kind of breaking ball."

Gubicza retired Tony Fernandez on a tap back to the mound, and Dan Quisenberry pitched the final two innings for his 27th save, tops in the majors.

"You just can't pitch a power hitter any better than he pitched Johnson," Royals Manager Dick Howser said. "We needed a strikeout in that situation and he went out and got it."

Jorge Orta doubled home a run, and Willie Wilson and Pat Sheridan added run-scoring singles in the Royals' four-run fifth inning.

Fank White started the Royals big inning by singling off Toronto starter Dave Stieb, 11-4. White went to third on Onix Concepcion's single and scored on a single by Wilson, who hit in his 15th straight game.

Concepcion scored on Sheridan's single and, one out later, Orta lined a double into the right-field corner to score Wilson.

Happy village atmosphere sought by Games officials

By The Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Behind a forbidding 8-foot-high double fence of barbed wire, with a military SWAT team alert for any emergency, the XXIII Olympic Games face Saturday's opening with serenity and tremendous calm.

So far, you can call them the "Happy Olympics."

"When you walk through the village everything seems lighter and happier," said Rick Carey, the United States' world record-beating backstroke swimmer. "Everyone is more cheerful and there are more smiles than I've ever seen."

"It's so peaceful and pleasant," said Jamaican sprinter Auguston Young, a student from North Carolina State now living in the Bronx but running for his homeland in a bid to thwart Carl Lewis' bid for four gold medals. "Everyone seems so relaxed and feeling so secure."

No Games have been staged under tighter, yet virtually invisible, measures to prevent a recurrence of the tragedy at Munich in 1972 when Arab terrorists invaded the Israeli complex in a carnage that left 17 people dead.

Peter Ueberroth, the president of the Los Angeles Olympic Organizing Committee, has gone to great lengths to try to lighten the security cloud of such a shattering incident.

Smiles are everywhere among the army of green and orange-clad volunteers. There is a remarkable absence of queues. Ueberroth is making his minions treat everyone as he would guests in his own home.

The LAOC chief said he was impressed by the congeniality of the Yugoslavians at the Winter Games in February at Sarajevo and was troubled by the breakdowns he found there in communications.

The security force is dressed in khaki uniforms with blue berets. None of its members carries or wears a firearm. This is left to city and county officers, who wear sideguns but are almost invisible.

Shea shows way for runners over 40

By SHELLY GRINNELL
Collegian Reporter

Beginning a running program today is as common as learning how to drive a car.

Beginning a running program when you are nearing the age of 40 and completing your first marathon at 42 is a different story.

Chris Shea, a Manhattan resident, has accomplished this and more. Shea said she began running four years ago to control her weight, and running quickly changed into an inspiration for her.

"I felt like I was reaching for something impossible," Shea said.

Shea ran her first three miles on July 31, 1980, and set a goal to run four miles by her 40th birthday. Five months later, she achieved her goal.

During the four years Shea has been running, she has qualified and run in many races and marathons. Her first marathon was in 1982 in Lincoln, Neb., where she finished first in her age division. In November 1982, she ran in the Omaha (Neb.) Riverfront Marathon, placing second in her age group. A year later she repeated her performance in the event, with a second place finish.

Shea's time in the 1982 Omaha race qualified her to run in the Boston Marathon that year.

"I had some trouble and I didn't run very well," Shea said about the Boston Marathon. She finished with a time of 3 hours, 37 minutes.

It's hard to believe that I was actually there and was a part of the 8,000 people who ran."

Recently, Shea competed in the Topeka Triathlon, consisting of swimming five-eighths of a mile, biking 18.7 miles, and running 6.5 miles, placing first in her age division with a time of 2:26.

"It was an endurance test where you had to keep high mileage," Shea said. "It was hot, windy, humid and hilly; it was also very hard."

Shea said she averages running 55 to 70 miles per week while training for a marathon. When she's preparing for a triathlon, she said

Staff/Chris Stewart

Chris Shea, Manhattan, has won a wide assortment of trophies since she began running at the age of 38.

she runs between 40 to 50 miles per week, and devotes other energy to biking and swimming.

"I'm in tip-top condition, and am healthier all over," Shea said of her running program.

Shea also said she does not have a weight problem, she eats better, is more disciplined and is more understanding toward people.

"Running is a stress release," Shea said. "You have to solve things and be by yourself. You think all the time while you're running, and are at peace with yourself."

Another important area of her running program is the people she has met. Her running group, she said, acts as a psychiatrist and support group.

"They give you feedback," Shea said. "They are very objective friends who are willing to help."

Despite all the benefits that can arise from running, Shea also warned about some of the problems.

"I have been verbally and physically harassed by motorists, and have had bottles and beer cans thrown at me."

Shea suggested that runners should run in groups and change routes every time.

Shea offered advice to runners beginning a running program. The beginner, she said, should start out slowly by either slowly walking or jogging. The next step, Shea said, is to be able to run 15 minutes comfortably.

"Listen to your body," Shea said. "If it hurts or you don't feel good, slow down or walk."

Good shoes and stretching before and after running are additional tips that she suggested. Shea also suggested reading about running before beginning.

The future looks exciting for Shea as she trains for the Omaha Triathlon on Aug. 12, and a triathlon in Manhattan on Sept. 8. Shea said she encourages older people to take up running.

"I get a great deal of pleasure seeing someone older running, and hope I will be able to run later too," Shea said. "I don't take running for granted. It's hard to believe what I've actually done until I look back at it all."

Wareham renovation retains original design

By LYNN TALPERS
Collegian Reporter

Since its construction in 1926, Manhattan's Wareham Hotel has undergone only one minor renovation. This was after the flood in 1951. Once again, the hotel is under construction, only this time it is being renovated into apartments.

Originally designed by Clarence Johnson, who was also the architect for the Riley County Court House, the hotel has as varied a history as its original owner, Harry Pratt "H.P." Wareham.

Wareham was born March 25, 1866. His family was en route to Kansas when he was born in Davenport, Iowa.

Wareham made a name for himself in Manhattan as he began opening various businesses and entertainment sites.

Some of Wareham's contributions to Manhattan include the city's first telephone system; a city sewage system; the Manhattan Ice and Cold Storage Co.; the Manhattan Ice, Light and Power Co.; the Wareham Opera House or Airdome; the Wareham Ballroom and Garage; the Wareham Theater and the Wareham Apartments, as stated in the Historic Preservation Certification application.

"Wareham really has K-State to thank for his business career," said Cheryl Collins, an employee of the Riley County Historical Society. "He had opened a portable roller skating rink while in college. Well, the president of K-State told him that wasn't a suitable occupation and to quit that business or quit college." So, Wareham quit college.

Wareham went on to establish

Manhattan's first telephone exchange. The company, according to the records of the historical society, charged $2 per month for commercial service and $1 per month for residential service. Both rates were payable in advance.

Wareham later went on to become one of the directors of the First National Bank. He died July 14, 1939.

The Wareham Hotel never had a formal opening ceremony, Collins said. A ceremony was scheduled, but because Wareham was ill at the time, the event never took place. The hotel opened on schedule without fanfare.

Collins said, the hotel was the headquarters for the crew and cast of the first major motion picture ever shot in Kansas. It was a Hopalong Cassidy picture set in Fort Riley and produced in the early '30s.

"The Wareham Hotel was the first steel-reinforced, six-story building in Manhattan. It is a distinguished example of an early 20th century mid-sized hotel," states the historic preservation application. The hotel remained the largest building in Manhattan until 1960.

The hotel is built on the site of the former Airdome, an open-air opera house owned by Wareham.

"The hotel was built with a penthouse which is probably the only penthouse originally built with any hotel in Kansas," Ruth Wareham, H.P. Wareham's niece said. "It was built especially for occupancy by the owner; it has been reserved for the family ever since."

"The building was originally a combination office, apartment and hotel and was one of the most modern buildings in northeast Kansas containing two elevators," stated the application. Wareham's telephone exchange was located next door.

Originally the hotel was connected by walkways from the fourth and fifth floors to the Wareham Ballroom and Garage. This building housed the hotel parking in the basement and a two-story ballroom with a spring-supported dance floor.

The building is being converted to 41 apartments, mainly efficiency and one-bedroom apartments, said Peggy Flaur, a representative of McCullough Property Management. The McCullough firm is supervising the renovation and managing the apartments for The Wareham Partnership, the owner of the building.

"The original materials include brick veneer with terra cotta trim and simple classical detailing," states the application. All materials are being replaced as near to the original material as possible and will match the existing facade details, said Ken Ebert, an architect for The Design Group which is handling the renovation.

"Terra cotta was a very popular building material at the time the hotel was built," Ebert said.

The balconies, the base of the hotel and the cornice of the building are made of terra cotta. These fixtures, when damaged, are being replaced with cast concrete, glazed to match the original terra cotta.

The balconies are reached by French doors with windowed transoms. The windows were etched with a "W" denoting Wareham.

"The glazing consists of frosted glazing which is etched with flower tracery and a grid," according to the architect's specification book. Much of the original glass is missing and will be replaced by patterned frosted glass to match.

No plans have been formalized for the renovation of the lobby, but designers will attempt to echo the original design. There will also be a memorabilia section in the lobby containing photographs and many of the hotel's original fixtures. The desk in the lobby and two tables are from the original hotel furnishings and will be kept.

The coffee shop, banquet room and formal dining room may be renovated to the specifications of a new restaurant/club after the hotel is completed.

Renovation is expected to be completed in the fall.

Tired plot takes fresh twist

"The Neverending Story" really tells a neverending story in the sense that it's been used a million times before. As Solomon or Shakespeare or whoever said, there's nothing new under the sun. What film makers must do, then, is make the story seem fresh. Writer-director Wolfgang Peterson livens up the tired plot enough to make "The Neverending Story" a pleasant way to spend an afternoon.

Review

Peterson uses the framing device of a story within a story to make things more interesting. We meet Bastion (Barret Oliver), a young boy who spends much of his time daydreaming and drawing unicorns instead of studying his math, being lectured by his father (Gerald McRaney), who believes Bastion's fantasy life is his way of escaping from his problems, chief of which is his mother's death.

But that is only part of it. Bastion is also the victim of three chubby little extortionists who hit him up for his lunch money daily. This time poor Bastion hides from them in an antique book shop where the crusty, old proprietor tells him about a book called "The Neverending Story." Taking the book with a promise to return it, our young hero heads for school. Alas, when he arrives he's late for a math test, so he runs up to the school attic to hide and read the book, which is supposedly not safe like other adventure stories.

LINCOLN KONKLE
Collegian Reviewer

Now the fantasy begins, the film's second story. As Bastion reads, we are shown the characters and their action as if the camera was looking into Bastion's imagination.

The book is your average imitation of Tolkien's "Lord of the Rings." A mysterious plague called "the nothing" is destroying the land of Fantasia. Even the Empress of the Ivory Tower is stricken and unable to stop the destruction. The great warrior Atreyu (Noah Hathaway) is sent for and to everyone's surprise he is only a boy — a brave one, though, so he undertakes the quest to destroy the nothing.

As you would guess, Atreyu meets and is aided by several fantastic creatures along the way: a big, bored turtle who is the wisest creature in all of Fantasia (and who looks enough like E.T. to bring a lawsuit against the designer), a long skinny "Luck Dragon" who looks more like an underfed white cocker spaniel, a towering "Rock Biter" who rides a steamroller tricycle, and so on.

As Atreyu goes through each adventure, we see Bastion reacting in horror or delight. When Atreyu eats, Bastion digs out his sack lunch; when Atreyu is nearly caught by a demonic beast in league with the nothing, a stuffed wolf's head is blown over by a wind coming through the attic window right in Bastion's face.

This is what makes "The Neverending Story" special: the two stories run parallel, gradually merging, until the Empress speaks directly to Bastion as he reads. It is only he who can save Fantasia, which turns out to be human imagination and fantasy itself, and the nothing is what happens to it when we do our math homework, grow up, and live in the "real world." All Bastion must do is believe it's true and Fantasia will survive — a kind of child existentialism that Bruno Bettelheim would approve of wholeheartedly.

"The Neverending Story" isn't a classic fantasy film, but the special effects are good enough and the double story is interesting enough that the 90 minutes it runs are just plain fun. Perhaps that's the real virtue of "The Neverending Story": it's so short you can actually make your popcorn and Coke last all the way through.

"The Neverending Story" is playing at Westloop Cinemas.

Republican candidates seek Manhattan votes

By CORRINE NELSON
Collegian Reporter

The Republican candidates running in the primary election for a seat in the Kansas 2nd Congressional District met each other in a debate at Long's Park last night.

The three candidates, Jim Van Slyke, Bob Laflin and Stan Eckert are competing for the Republican nomination to run for the position currently held by Jim Slattery, D-Topeka. They were asked questions and given an equal amount of time to respond.

In response to the question, "What makes you qualified to run for this position?" Eckert said, "I have 12 years of experience and I have a clear understanding of what makes politics work."

Van Slyke considers himself a "conservative Republican" and said he has a good understanding of the issues that are facing America today.

"I want to stand for something and I prefer to stand for something that I believe in. No candidate can know everything. I want to know all I can. I have the ability to analyze the issues, make a decision and explain the decision to the people of Kansas," Van Slyke said.

Laflin wants to put "common sense in government."

"It is time for the business people to be involved in government. We need to tap into the business world. They are efficient, professional and know how to make money. We need that in government," he said.

"I have a background in agriculture and I feel that is important when I am representing this area," Laflin said. I want to see people in agriculture make money. When they (people in agriculture) are making money, the businessmen can also be making money. The two walk hand-in-hand."

The candidates also gave their views about national issues such as military spending, abortion, education programs, reducing the federal deficit and aid to the elderly were responded to by the three candidates.

Laflin believes United States can make "peace through strength."

"It is time to establish goals and act instead of react (to the Soviet Union)," he said.

"I strongly believe that we need to keep the elderly as a priority in government spending. They are the people who have made this country what it is today. I am willing to support any funding that would go to aid the elderly," Laflin said.

Laflin also supports a "pro-life amendment" to make abortion illegal.

"Having a child is one of the greatest blessings a man and woman can have and I will do all that is possible to keep abortion from being an alternative to life," he said.

Van Slyke has three steps that he would support to reduce the federal deficit.

"First, pass a balanced budget amendment. Second, give the president line-item veto power and third, put strict limitations on government contractors so they stay within the budget and their bid (for contracted governmental work)," Van Slyke said. "Throwing money at anything doesn't solve the problem."

In reference to military spending, Van Slyke said, "as long as technology exists, a problem will exist. We need to make nuclear weaponry obsolete. I believe money spent for the high frontier is money well spent."

Van Slyke said his priority in military spending is to maintain national security.

"The citizens must feel safe. If security slips, everything slips. We must not jeopardize security by making unwise expenditures," he said.

Van Slyke also supports making abortion illegal.

"It is a question of life and death. I believe life begins at conception. I would support elimination of any federal funding for abortion and a constitutional amendment making abortion illegal," he said.

Eckert said he supports giving women the alternative to have an abortion.

"The Bible tells me life begins at conception. I am against abortion but I do feel we need to offer pregnant women an alternative. Moral values are the real issue. We need to deal with that before we will eliminate the problem (of unwanted pregnancies)."

Eckert believes the United States needs mandatory competency testing for students.

"We need to be sure our children know their multiplication tables by the third grade. To prove this, they need to be given a competency test," he said.

Each candidate was given two minutes to make closing comments.

Eckert said he is striving for excellence in government.

"Government can only be as good as the people we send to represent (us). We cannot be a yes man to the president. Our nation must return to reliance upon God to solve our problems. Weigh what you want in government and look for the good of boys," he said.

Bob Laflin and Jim Van Slyke listen to Stan Eckert during a debate at Long's Park Monday night. The three are candidates for the Republican nomination for 2nd District Congressman.

blems. Weigh what you want in government and look for the good of boys," he said.

In closing, Van Slyke said, "Look at the difference between a politician and a leader. A politician is just looking to just be elected. A leader will look at the valuable traditions of Congress of the past and look forward to tackle the problems of the present. I have a set of principles and look forward to what tomorrow will be."

Laflin repeated his call for common sense in government.

"We need someone in Congress who has an understanding of the needs of the people, trust in God and most of all someone who will be responsive to the community and to the people of the 2nd District," Laflin said.

Time was given for people attending the debate to write down questions for the candidates. These questions were read so the candidates would be aware of the issues that are important to the people of Manhattan.

Questions about ERA, the 21 drinking age bill, how they would plan to win against Slattery and how they plan to win the vote of the young voter were raised.

Labor support margin grows as Israeli polls close, count continues

By The Associated Press

TEL AVIV, Israel — The Labor Party strengthened its lead over Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir's conservative Likud bloc in incomplete returns from Monday's general elections, but both sought the first chance to form a new government.

Israel Radio said early today that with 87 percent of the votes counted, it appeared that Shimon Peres' Labor Party would have 45 seats in the 120-member Parliament and Likud 40.

But 61 seats are needed for a majority, and analysts predicted a lengthy stalemate in negotiations to organize a ruling coalition because of the record 15 parties that were expected to win seats.

There were calls for Shamir and Peres to join in a national unity administration to deal with Israel's severe economic problems and the issue of peace with the Arabs. Both expressed willingness, but Peres said such a pact would have to be based on "an agreed program."

The nearly complete vote count and an exit poll organized for Israel Television by pollster Hanoch Smith indicated Labor would win more seats than Likud, but with neither of the major parties coming close to a majority.

The exit poll projected 45 or 46 seats for Labor and 42 for Likud.

In the outgoing Parliament, Likud held 46 seats to Labor's 50, while in the 1981 election Likud won 48 and Labor 47. Likud has ruled for seven years through alliances with smaller parties, and Shamir called the early election when four defections reduced the number of seats he could command to 60.

Twenty-six parties entered candidates, and several minor parties gained at the expense of the two main rivals. That posed enormous problems for either one to form a coalition. Likud appeared to have the upper hand because of the strength of five religious groups that are ideologically closer to Likud than to Labor.

Former Defense Minister Ezer Weizman, who organized the centrist Yahad (Together) Party, said he would not join either Likud or Labor and called on them to form a unity government. "If the nation doesn't unite, we're in for a very difficult period of domestic problems, economic problems and issues of peace or war," he said. It appeared his party would win two seats.

Peres told reporters, "I believe there is a chance the Labor Party will form a coalition. I can't say anything final until the picture clears."

Shamir said on television: "I am convinced that I have the best prospect of forming a coalition," and urged Labor to join him in a unity government.

In the outgoing Parliament, Likud held 46 seats to Labor's 50, while in the 1981 election Likud won 48 and Labor 47.

The election to form Israel's 21st government since independence began at 7 a.m. and the polls closed 15 hours later. Central Elections Committee officials said 78.5 percent of the 2.65 million eligible voters cast ballots, which was about the same as in 1981.

Fear was expressed before the election that a coalition might emerge which would prove too unwieldy to tackle the Lebanon crisis, Middle East peace efforts and the nation's 400 percent annual inflation rate.

Two polls on Sunday had predicted that Shimon Peres and his Labor Party would defeat Likud 48-41 or 46-40.

Miss America resigns due to nude photos

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Miss America 1984, Vanessa Williams, gave up her title Monday at pageant officials' request because she had posed nude for sexually explicit photos with another woman. She became the first of 57 Miss Americas to be forced to resign.

Williams, 21, the first black Miss America, said she wanted to keep her title but "the potential harm to the pageant, and the deep division that a bitter fight may cause, has convinced me that I must relinquish my title."

"It is apparent to me that because of all that has happened during the past week, it would be difficult for me to make an appearance as Miss America," she said at a news conference.

"It is not my desire to injure in any way the Miss America title or pageant," she added, and asked "sponsors and the public...to continue all their support" of the event.

Albert Marks, pageant executive director, said pageant officials "regret that circumstances...have caused Miss Williams to relinquish her title." In a statement issued in Atlantic City, N.J., he said she had "fulfilled all of the duties and responsibilities of her position in exemplary fashion."

Suzette Charles of Mays Landing, N.J., the first runner-up at last September's pageant, will become the 58th Miss America. "I'm excited," she said upon learning of Williams' decision. "It's unfortunate it had to be under these circumstances."

Williams said she would devote herself to her career. She had reported receiving offers for various show business projects.

As the painted portrait of Williams that had hung in pageant offices was taken down, Marks said no deal was struck with Williams to get her to resign.

Bob Guccione, publisher of Penthouse, which published the photos this month, said "I think it's a mistake that she elected not to fight to keep her crown. I think the pageant is getting away with something, which I think is very unfortunate."

Williams said she did not recall signing any form approving release or general distribution of the photos. Guccione responded, "Obviously she did consent because she signed a model release."

Meanwhile, lines formed and telephones rang at newsstands across the country as customers clamored for copies of Penthouse's September issue, featuring pictures of Williams taken in 1982 by a photographer in the Mount Kisco, N.Y., studio where she worked for one summer. The photographer, Tom Chiapel, has been unavailable for comment since Penthouse's publishing plans were disclosed Thursday.

At the news conference, Williams said the photographer assured her the photos would show her only in an unrecognizable black-and-white silhouette and they were not for distribution.

Williams' legal adviser, Dennis Dowdell, said she would not answer any questions. He would not say if any legal action is planned against Penthouse.

President to speak at 8 p.m.

Carlin supports state tourism

By GARY NELSON
Collegian Reporter

Gov. John Carlin encouraged his audience on Monday to continue efforts to improve public awareness of Kansas tourism.

Approximately 150 people attended the Governor's Seventh Annual Conference on Tourism at the Manhattan Holiday Inn/Holidome which began Sunday and ends today. The conference is sponsored by various businesses and area convention and visitors' bureaus.

Carlin expressed his concern about public relations between guests and employees in Kansas hotels and motels.

"It is very important to show travelers that this (Kansas) is a good place to visit," Carlin said. "Hospitality is important."

Carlin said the hospitality is "good" in Kansas, but he wanted to stress the importance of communication between travelers and hotel and motel owners and operators.

During recent trips to Europe, China and Japan, Carlin and his wife, Karen, have been working to promote Kansas tourism. Carlin added that his wife was responsible for most of the efforts on the tourism campaign.

Carlin said Kansas is far behind other states in tourism and there is a lot of potential for Kansas to improve in that area.

"We have at least a start on tourism now," he said. "But we are so behind."

"You can't sell the importance of tourism to legislators without the interest of the public," Carlin said.

Carlin also added that he was proud of the efforts being made by the information stations located throughout the state to aid travelers.

"I'm confident that things are getting better," Carlin said.

In closing, Carlin said he was optimistic about improving Kansas tourism.

"We can sell Kansas," he said. "We can grow and prosper."

Carlin was asked after his speech how he felt liquor-by-the-drink regulations affect Kansas tourism.

"We're paying a high price for these regulations in Kansas right now," Carlin said.

Carlin added that he was not in favor of the old liquor-by-the-drink laws or the promotion of excessive drinking, but with modifications, liquor-by-the-drink would help Kansas tourism in revenues.

"We need a system (legislation) that is very up-to-date or modern," Carlin said.

"I only hope that next time legislators (discuss) this issue that they do it with merit and careful consideration," he said.

Carlin was also asked about a mandatory post-Labor Day school opening date in Kansas.

Carlin said he was not in favor of involving legislation into the operation of a school.

"I'd be just a little reluctant to say that it (post-Labor Day opening) should be set by law," he said.

Carlin said the state only requires its schools to be open a set number of hours during the school year and that it should be up to the school districts to decide when schools should open.

Carlin's last addressed question was about pari-mutuel betting in Kansas. Carlin said he spoke in favor of pari-mutuel betting and that if people are in favor of it, they should speak with their representatives on the subject.

"Those of you in the minority (for pari-mutuel betting) need to get involved and talk, if you want the laws changed," Carlin said.

Amtrak train collision claims 1, injures 112 in New York

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Two Amtrak passenger trains collided head-on and derailed on an elevated track Monday after the Boston-bound Zip failed to wait for the southbound Shoreliner to pass on a stretch of track under repair, officials said. One person was killed and scores were hurt.

Rescuers said they treated 112 people, most for minor injuries, after the collision in the New York City borough of Queens. An Amtrak official said the Zip had failed to wait for the Shoreliner to pass.

"I first thought we were braking, and then in less than a second, the seats were uprooted and people were thrown out of their seats," said Ernest Boyer, 33, who was traveling on the Washington-to-Boston Zip. "A lot of people were screaming. People were lying on the floor, saying, 'Let's try to get out.'"

Some people were "covered with blood, some with gashes," Boyer said.

It was Amtrak's fourth serious accident this month, including a derailment that killed five people and injured 147 on July 7 in Williston, Vt.

Four people died in the other two accidents, which were train-truck collisions.

The trains in Monday morning's crash collided on an approach to the Hell Gate Bridge, just across the East River from Manhattan at about 110th Street. All Amtrak trains to and from New England use the route.

Amtrak spokesman Clifford Black said the southbound track on the line was closed for regular maintenance, and The Shoreliner, coming in from Boston, had received written instructions to use the northbound track.

"Whether it was dispatcher failure, an engineer failure or a signal failure we do not know at this point," he said. "The northbound train was to have held for the southbound train. That did not happen."

Ambulances rushed the injured to hospitals, including five people who were seriously hurt, said Ellen Weiman, spokeswoman for the Emergency Medical Service.

The EMS treated 115 people in all, she said, including 75 who were taken to seven hospitals — 35 of them by bus — and 40 who were treated at the scene.

Tear gas cripples anti-government riot

By The Associated Press

MANILA, Philippines — Soldiers used tear gas to rout an estimated 18,000 anti-government demonstrators Monday as President Ferdinand E. Marcos asked his opponents in the new National Assembly to help him avoid a "gruesome future" for the Philippines.

Several hundred riot police and soldiers guarded the assembly in suburban Quezon City. Fire trucks stood by. Police also lined up for several miles along the main route leading to the assembly.

Marcos addressed the State of the Nation speech to the opening of the assembly in which his opponents held their largest minority in 13 years.

Marcos said the re-imposition of martial law was not "imminent," and he drew applause when he said he would not use his sweeping powers without the approval of a caucus of his governing party. Although Marcos lifted martial law in 1980 after eight years, he retained powers that permit him to legislate by decree.

The attack by some 2,000 anti-riot troops, at a downtown plaza several miles from the assembly building, left several opposition leaders reeling from the effects of tear gas.

The fleeing marchers burned a military jeep. About 1,000 later rallied in a churchyard, denouncing the assembly, Marcos' 19-year-old authoritarian regime, U.S. involvement in the Philippines and the nation's economic ills, including a $26 billion foreign debt on which no payments have been made for nine months.

Four hospitals reported treating 13 of the protesters for minor fractures, bruises and inhalation of tear gas.

Police said they broke up the march because intelligence reports showed it was infiltrated by communists who planned to cause violence.

Marcos' allegations that communists are attempting to create political instability were the main point of his speech.

Marcos' opponents, who held a maximum of 13 seats in the previous assembly, won 71 of the 183 contested seats during the elections May 14. The outcome of some contests still is in dispute. Seventeen of the 200 assembly seats are filled by presidential appointment.

Police previously allowed demonstrations at the post office, and only broke up marches that tried to approach Marcos' palace.

Legislators net more pension than pay

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Retired members of Congress are drawing an average pension of $35,386 a year, with 138 former senators and representatives collecting more now than they earned as lawmakers, the National Taxpayers Union said Monday.

The congressional figure was nearly three times the average $12,988 that the U.S. Census Bureau says was earned from all sources in 1982 by American men over age 65. Women over 65 drew an average $7,435.

The NTU's study said that pension benefits for 374 former congressmen totaled $13 million last year, compared to the $36.8 million annual cost of salaries for the 535 current members of Congress.

Democratic presidential nominee Walter Mondale gets $32,616 a year for the 12 years he represented Minnesota in the Senate. His salary was $44,600 when he became vice president in 1977.

Two former presidents, Richard M. Nixon and Gerald R. Ford, are earning more in congressional pensions than they did in Congress. Nixon's Capitol Hill pension is $30,816, compared to the Senate pay of $12,500 when he became vice president in 1963. Ford, a representative from 1949 to 1973, draws a congressional pension of $64,800. The pay for lawmakers in 1973 was $42,500.

Nixon, Ford and Mondale are also eligible for pensions from their service as president, vice president or both.

The largest yearly congressional stipend goes to Carl Albert, the Oklahoma Democrat who served in the House for 30 years and retired as its speaker in 1977 at a salary of $65,600 a year.

Albert's $87,864 pension was one of five exceeding the present congressional pay level of $72,600, the NTU said.

The other four largest pensions go to Margaret Chase Smith, a Maine Republican who was in the House and Senate from 1940 to 1973, $81,204; Rep. Benjamin Reifel, R-S.D., 1961-71, $76,512; Albert A. Gore, a Tennessee Democrat in the House and Senate from 1939 to 1971, $74,460; and Sen. James O. Eastland, D-Miss., 1943-1978, $73,812.

How a member leaves office does not affect the pension. Former Sen. Harrison Williams, D-N.J., is drawing $42,888 a year while in prison for a bribery conviction arising from the FBI's Abscam investigation.

Congressional pensions, payable as early as age 50, are calculated on the basis of a member's length of service and the average pay earned during the final three years in office.

Members, who do not pay Social Security taxes on their congressional salaries, are required to contribute 8 percent of their salaries to the pension fund, with taxpayers matching it with an equal amount.

Congressional pay was $10,000 a year from 1925 to 1947, when it began rising in 10 steps to the current level of $72,600. Retirement benefits have also been increased over the years.

"A pension system that allows someone to make more money not working than working is fundamentally flawed," says Jim Davidson, chairman of the NTU.

Discovery links gene defects, cancer forms

By The Associated Press

BAR HARBOR, Maine — A childhood bone cancer called osteosarcoma has been linked to the same genetic defect that causes an inherited children's eye cancer, researchers said Monday.

The discovery suggests that many forms of adult and childhood cancers might be caused by a kind of genetic defect, or mutation, that until now has been thought to occur only in inherited cancers, the researchers said.

Webster Cavenee, one of the scientists who made the discovery, said officials at the National Institutes of Health in Bethesda, Md., have given him $2 million to begin searching immediately for this kind of defect in virtually every other kind of children's cancer.

Cavenee described the findings at a news conference at the Jackson Laboratory in Bar Harbor, where he is participating in the annual Short Course on Medical Genetics. The privately funded Jackson Laboratory is a leading center of genetic research.

Ray White of the University of Utah, who with Cavenee was the first to discover the defect in the eye cancer, said he is already looking for a similar link in breast and colon cancer.

For several years, researchers have known that certain genes now called cancer genes contribute to the formation of cancer.

The new discoveries involve entirely different genes that protect against cancer. In this case, cancer arises when these genes are absent or damaged.

White and Cavenee reported last year that they had identified this kind of defect in the eye cancer called retinoblastoma. The defect occurred in a gene on chromosome 13. Humans have 23 pairs of chromosomes.

Earlier this year, Cavenee reported finding a similar defect in a childhood kidney cancer, Wilms' tumor. This defect was on chromosome 11.

Doctors had known for some time that children who survived retinoblastoma had a high risk of developing bone cancer in their teen years.

Cavenee therefore looked at the bone cancer and found it was caused by a defect in the same gene that is responsible for retinoblastoma.

Thaddeus Dryja, an ophthalmologist at the Massachusetts Eye and Ear Infirmary in Boston who had collaborated with Cavenee and White, then found the defect existed in bone cancer patients who had not had retinoblastoma.

This discovery suggests that this kind of defect in protective genes is not limited to inherited cancers.

If, as the scientists hope, similar genetic defects turn out to be involved in many other cancers, it may ultimately be possible to screen for a variety of cancers.

Putnam Hall to house Tri Sig sorority

By CORRINE NELSON and NATALIE HAZELTON
Collegian Reporters

The members of Sigma Sigma Sigma sorority will be living in a Putnam Hall until the construction of their house at 1615 Denison Ave. is completed.

"The arrangements have been made for the members of Tri Sig sorority to live in Putnam Hall while their house is being completed," Tom Frith, K-State director of housing, said.

The sorority members will be moving into the residence hall Aug. 10 and will be living there during sorority rush. Because the Putnam food service will be closed, members will eat their meals at Derby Food Center.

The sorority is paying by the day for use of the residence hall because the sorority house completion date is not definite. The house is to be done by the end of October, Peggy Flouer, Tri Sig housing director, said.

"By making the arrangements to pay by the day for use of Putnam Hall, the girls will be able to move out of the residence hall and into the house at anytime."

"When the house is ready for us, we are ready for it," Flouer said.

The Tri Sig members have been living in an apartment complex for the past two years, while awaiting plans for the sorority house to be completed and approved.

"The first year we all just met in the Union. It was more difficult to unify the members, but we got a lot closer when we moved into the apartment," Marla Steiner, Tri Sig member and senior in journalism and mass communications, said.

"It will be different for us to move into a residence hall after living in the apartments, but we are going to make the best of it," Jola Murphy, junior in speech pathology and audiology, said.

The housing department has helped to make the best arrangements that are possible so that members will be comfortable with this living arrangement, Flouer said.

A 10-year lease expired on the property, allowing the Tri Sigs to buy half the lot. The lot was divided into two sections and Kay Nelson, co-chairman of the Tri Sig housing committee, said at one time the Phi Kappa Tau fraternity was considering buying the other half of the property.

The two-story building will be made of limestone and there will be a large parking area. Nelson said the house will have 70 parking spaces in the rear and 10 in the front for visitors.

The house will have a half basement, which has just been poured. Oettinger-Lloyd Construction is ready to pour the main level and the house is almost ready for framing, Nelson said.

The house is expected to hold 67 members. There will be several four-person rooms. Students in those rooms will sleep there. There will also be one eight- and one nine-person room with a sleeping dorm.

Only the members who will be living in the house will stay in Putnam Hall during the interim period, Flouer said.

"It has been a struggle because everything has to be new," Nelson said. The sorority has sponsored rummage sales and bake sales in order to raise funds for furniture and draperies for the house. Bedding and carpeting were included in the building contract, but the rest of the furniture must still be bought. The chapter raised $4,000 during the spring semester of 1984.

Nelson and Steiner admit they have had help with the new house and with the new chapter.

"Parents are offering furniture and odds and ends," Nelson said.

"We especially worked with other houses in the state the first year," Steiner said. Tri Sig houses at Fort Hays State and Emporia State helped by donating money for the new chapter.

"Barb Robel (director of greek affairs) and the alumnae have been especially helpful," Nelson said. Several alumnae helped finance the building of the house by cosigning a loan, and organizing and working with the architects.

The building of the new house is with the financial help of the national chapter and Union National Bank, Nelson said.

"The rates should be comparable," Nelson said. "It was important for us to keep the prices comparable with other houses and the dorms," she said.

"We are looking forward to a strong rush this year," Nelson said. The Tri Sigs are allowed a maximum membership of 115 members.

There are now 90 members. The K-State Tri Sig chapter is the largest in Kansas.

After three years at K-State, there are 10 charter members who will be back to live in the house this fall, Nelson said.

"We are so excited to have a new house this year even if it is not ready for us to move into at the beginning of the fall semester," Susan Price, senior in elementary education, said.

"We plan to have a celebration of some kind when the house is completed and we all get moved in. We (charter members) have waited three years for this (the new sorority house to be built) and I couldn't be more proud of what has been accomplished by everyone through a lot of hard work and dedication," said Lisa Ochs, senior in interior design, a charter member of Tri Sig and current chapter president.

While the members are living in Putnam Hall they will hold their chapter meetings there and the members will continue to have money-making projects to help pay for new furniture for the new house.

"We don't see any problems with the house being completed and ready for the girls to move into in October, although the rains in late May and early June did cause a slight delay," Flouer said.

"We are so pleased to have the living arrangements work out so well for the time before the house is completed," she said.

Nelson said that the house is now eight days behind schedule but thought the days might be made up before the deadline date.

Zoo camp offers natural environment

By KATHIE CORMACI
Collegian Reporter

A zoo may not be considered one of the wildest environments. Most think of a zoo as a place where tamer animals are kept in cages as a kind of show and tell, and somehow this prevents their still being wild.

But hang around a zoo after the sun goes down and the animals come to life. Just the sounds emitted by these creatures of the night is substantial evidence of their natural behavior inherited from the wild.

Camp Zoo, a project by the Manhattan Parks and Recreation Department in conjunction with Sunset Zoo, recently made it possible for 25 children, ages 9 to 12, to have this wilderness experience.

Under the guidance of Neil Schanker, nature educator for parks and recreation; Don Wixom, Sunset Zoo education director, and seven other supervisors, these children got a chance at experiencing nature first-hand while learning valuable facts.

This was the first year for an overnight camp at the zoo, but there have been other zoo activities sponsored by the parks and recreation department.

According to Wixom and Schanker, a program called "Zoo School" is taking place for its second summer. It consists of three different classes that meet on Mondays for six weeks. Children are able to sign up for one of the classes or all three if they like.

"Animal Kingdom" is another class offered at the zoo. According to Schanker, in this class children are taken to see a different major group of animals each week and told by the instructors about the animals' habits and behaviors.

Occasionally, animals such as fish are dissected so that the children can observe the internal organs and learn still another facet of the animal, Schanker said.

In another class, "Animals and People," children learn about the interaction between the two. Field trips are taken to such places as K-State's Veterinary Medical Complex and a farm nearby to observe various situations of interaction between animals and people, Schanker said.

"Animal Signs and Tracks" is another class offered at the zoo. In this class, children do such things as make plaster casts of various animal prints and also set live traps, which are safe for the animals. The children are encouraged to invent and make their own traps at home and bring them in to class, Schanker said.

"Camp Discover," sometimes known as "Neil's Nature," is a special zoo school Schanker teaches specifically for handicapped children.

According to Schanker, instructors in this class are basically concerned with familiarizing the children with the sights and sounds of animals. The children get to do some handling of the animals and at the petting zoo they can feed the animals.

Recently, the first "Sunrise Safari" was held. People of all ages arrive early in the morning and are given a flashlight tour of the zoo. They also go on a bird-watching expedition and are served a continental breakfast.

"These sunrise safaris and camps prove to be popular because people like to see the zoo when all the animals are active. Over 60 percent of the animals here are nocturnal, meaning that they do most of their sleeping during the day and wake up at night to eat or exercise," Wixom said.

"People come to the zoo during the day while most of the animals are sleeping or staying out of the heat. After dark the people can enjoy a cooler, more comfortable tour of the zoo along with observing the animals during their most active period," Wixom said.

Wixom and Schanker had a series of activities set up for the children at the overnight camp which began with setting up tents and sleeping arrangements.

"Believe it or not, some of these kids had never camped before, so they were really excited about the whole thing," Schanker said.

Organized games were played during the overnight camp with the purpose of teaching the children about biology and nature.

"One of the games we played was ecological tag. It teaches the kids about the food chain in nature, that is, the way one thing eats another to stay alive. We divided into three groups: grass, rabbits and wolves. The groups can 'tag' one another and this represents how one class consumes the other in nature," Schanker said.

"Each time a wolf tags a rabbit, for example, the rabbit becomes a wolf. So, you start out with even teams, and it can turn out to be very imbalanced, just like nature. After the game, we sat down and explained how this game applied to nature and it was much easier for the kids to understand," Schanker said.

The campers sat around a large campfire after it got dark and had a marshmallow roast at which time animal stories were exchanged.

"We didn't want to tell the traditional ghost stories because this was the first time to camp out for many of these kids. We didn't want them to get scared so they wouldn't fall asleep. I started the storytelling by telling about a personal experience I had with a snake," Schanker said.

"Then one of the staff told about his experience with a raccoon when he was camouflaged. The kids were pretty shy at first. Pretty soon hands started to fly up and kids told stories about experiences they had with animals, stories their parents had told them about animals and stories about their own animals — like how they died. It got pretty emotional at times," Schanker said.

The children were led on a wilderness hike well after dark in the Project Wolf Wilderness Area which required them to use other senses rather than sight.

"The wilderness hike was fantastic because the whole woods was lit up by lightning bugs. We heard a lot of frogs and we even heard an owl. We told the kids what the animals were doing, like whether they were sleeping or eating. In this situation, sounds were much more important than sights," Schanker said.

Late that night they took their first zoofari, or nighttime tour of the zoo. The children were able to observe many of the nocturnal animals doing what most consider daytime activities like eating and roaming around their cages. A second zoofari similar to the sunrise safari was taken early the next morning.

"While on the tour we talked about each animal and what they did, in particular, at night. We saw the porcupine, which is never out in the day, and bearcats, which are rarely out. And we saw the wolves, along with a den of baby wolves," Schanker said.

According to Schanker, experiences with wildlife for children at a young age is something they will never forget and may encourage them to be more interested in wildlife at school.

Greek action puts stop to cowardly decision

Parking problems at K-State are wounds that never seem to heal. No one knows this better than residents south of campus, particularly those in the "headache square" — Laramie Street from Fairchild Terrace to Denison Avenue and the section of Denison between Laramie and Fairchild. Some houses, particularly the greek ones, have rightly fought against the City Commission's remedy to the headache.

At the June 5 City Commission meeting, commissioners attempted to sweep part of the problem under the rug when a number of the residents weren't looking. Fortunately, after the last City Commission meeting, it was not action without proper representation. Through the work of Tracy Turner, junior in economics, and Marty Oborg, junior in family life and human development, a petition with signatures of area residents was presented and the ordinance was changed to limit the requirement of parking permits to only Fairchild.

A question that arises is why the decision, which would affect a large majority of residents, was made on June 5. Were commissioners attempting to reroute the battleground to a safer spot. A large number of people returning this fall to school would have been forced to obtain permits with little or nothing to say of the matter.

Oborg, vice president of the Alpha Xi Delta sorority house, said the ordinance would have affected a large number of young women in her house. Capacity for the Alpha Xi house is 72 people. The house's parking lot contains 23 spots, three of which are reserved. This leaves 35 to 40 people forced to park on the street in front of the house. Were commissioners expecting these people to come back on a June 5 night from various areas of the state to have their needs and opinions heard? An action such as this, kept as it was, would have agitated feelings even more between greek houses and other area residents. Turner and Oborg did an excellent job in pruning the problem before it was allowed to blossom further.

The action of greeks obtaining signatures on the petition prove that greek house members and local residents can work together on the parking problem. The selfish feelings of a minority of residents should not be able to woo the commission into such an act as was the June 5 decision.

Ordinances, such as the one passed June 5, defeat any headway made between the greek houses and other residents concerning the parking problem. Cowardly decisions, aimed at avoiding any conflict, probably would not benefit anyone except commissioners who don't have to park there.

Wayne Price, for the Editorial Board

Name recognition keys candidate's success

The secret of politics is to get the name remembered and the past forgotten.

American voters are amazing in their ability to forget — and successful politicians have learned to use this. But first, the politician must build name recognition.

Sen. Fritz Hollings, D-S.C., was considered by many political observers to be the best-qualified candidate seeking the Democratic presidential nomination. However, he failed to attract media attention, and voters had no idea who Hollings was or what he supported. After a poor showing in early primaries and caucuses, he dropped out of race. Most people who found out who Hollings was have now forgotten.

But name recognition does not ensure political victory. The past often derails political campaigns of the present. Sen. John Glenn, D-Ohio, is known almost everywhere as the man who moonwalked before Michael Jackson. Glenn's exciting past could have been an asset, but he was unable to capitalize on it. Glenn needed to forget his high-flying past and bring his campaign speeches down to the voter's level. Democrats decided Glenn lacked "the right stuff."

Another victim of the past is Democratic presidential nominee Walter Mondale. He gained recognition through former President Jimmy Carter. Now Mondale can't make voters forget the Carter connection.

President Reagan, on the other hand, is a master of the political game. Reagan was well known from his acting days and his political career in California. Better still, he has an uncanny ability to make voters forget the past.

Examples of Reagan's prowess are not difficult to find. Voters have forgotten his promise to reduce the federal deficit as the deficit skyrockets to previously unknown heights. Reagan takes credit for the recent economic recovery while avoiding blame for the recession which occurred during most of his term. One of the worst environmental records in recent history is forgotten when Reagan begins the campaign season by hugging trees. And, aside from a few snide remarks, even Bonzo has been left behind — out of sight and the voters' minds.

Most politicians know the route to success. Those who do not soon lose out in the never-ending race for elected office — and are forgotten tomorrow.

Postal strike could make life interesting

CHANUTE — Mail has been delivered through rain, sleet, snow and gloom of night. It will also be delivered through contract negotiations, disputes and expired contracts.

Postal employees are now working without a contract, because the old contract between the U.S. Postal Service and the four unions which represent the postal workers: the American Postal Workers Union, the National Association of Letter Carriers, the National Rural Letter Carriers Union and the Mail Handlers division of Laborers International.

The Associated Press reported the Postal Service is pressing for a three-year wage freeze on current employees and a cut in starting wages from $21,511 to $17,532. The Postal Service had originally asked for starting wages to begin at $14,400. The average postal worker earns $27,892 in wages and benefits, AP reported.

The starting wages for a first-year teacher, by comparison, is less than $14,000.

Contract talks reached an impasse Saturday, when the old contract expired. Union leaders asked the postal workers to keep working during the impasse.

Federal law outlaws strikes against the Postal Service, Postmaster General William F. Bolger said. The breakdown of negotiations started a fact-finding period which could lead to binding arbitration. The situation may not be resolved until Dec. 10, Bolger said.

BRIAN LA RUE
Collegian Columnist

If postal workers were to strike, it could make life interesting. For starters, the mail system would come to a halt. No mail would mean no letters from home, no checks to be lost (think how convincing the excuse "The check is in the mail" could be), no junk mail to read and discard.

Since this is an election year, a postal strike could place President Reagan in the hot seat. Federal law prohibits such a strike, so Reagan could fire the striking workers, just as he did with the striking air traffic controllers a few years ago. However, such a move during an election year could tarnish Reagan's image and cost him votes — especially votes from union members who are unhappy with Democratic nominee Walter Mondale.

The ball rests in the postal workers' hands. They control their fate. If they are smart, they won't strike and work for a solution to the issue. However, if a strike is called, I propose the following action:

— Fire the postal workers. After all, the law is the law.

— Hire former air traffic controllers to take over the postal service. The work isn't the same, but they will get a lot of fresh air and exercise.

Of course, if this doesn't work, the military could take over the postal service. The military wouldn't take any guff about wrong addresses, biting dogs or undeliverable mail.

Then again, the cost overruns on bids could prove to be too much for the public; $300 per paper clip isn't any way to run a business.

The government could choose to deregulate the postal service, as it did with Ma Bell. But it probably wouldn't work, because nobody would want to do the rural areas.

Besides, how could you listen, without laughing, to a commercial which touts "Reach out and write someone?"

With knowledge, child care can be found

Editor,

Last Wednesday's Collegian had a front page article that talked about the problems that parents have in finding inexpensive care for their children after school. This, I believe, is primarily a problem of people not having the correct information.

The Riley County Health Department (and I believe all other county health departments) has available a list of family day-care homes that operate within the county. This list is available at no charge and is several pages long. The Riley County Health Department, for those readers who can't keep track of our moving health department, is currently located under Raoul's Escondido on Seth Childs Road.

All of those homes are either licensed or registered with the state. Licensed homes are inspected by the health department to make sure that the children are being cared for in a healthy and safe environment. Registered homes are to provide the same type of environment but are not inspected annually as licensed homes are.

The cost of care in these homes for the hours before and after school ranges from about $2 to $4 per day, a small price to pay for the well-being of a child. The cost for full-time summer care is more expensive but there are government programs which will help with the cost for low-income families.

Most of the licenses allow these homes to care for up to four school age children.

I hope that this information will help to avoid the type of child you described in your article who sits in his locked home after school terrified of every noise he hears.

Stray gets top dog military job

MILWAUKEE — The armed forces went looking for a few good dogs over the weekend and found Elmer, a German shepherd stray from a local animal shelter.

"Elmer is exactly the kind of dog we are looking for," said Staff Sgt. Carol Stone, of the Defense Department's Dog Center in Lackland, Texas. "He's friendly with handlers...but if you told him to, he would probably eat your shorts off."

Stone is the chief evaluator of a 12-member team that tested and accepted nine of 80 dogs reviewed Saturday and Sunday at the 440th Tactical Airlift Wing here.

Elmer passed a physical and temperament test with flying colors. "When I agitated him, he was at the end of the leash, snarling and barking," said Stone.

Elmer will go through a six-week training session for patrol dogs, then could be assigned to the Air Force, Army or Secret Service.

Couple marries in control towers

PITTSBURGH — Eden Harriss combined his love for aviation and his love for Kristan Russo in a wedding atop a 200-foot-tall air traffic control tower under construction at Greater Pittsburgh International Airport.

"You might say I'm addicted to aviation," the 45-year-old groom said after Sunday's ceremony.

"As soon as he told me he was getting married up there, I said 'It's not shocking. It sounds like Eden Harriss,'" said Archie DiFante, a friend.

"He's always coming up with something interesting. And I like to try new things," said the bride, a 33-year-old floral designer from nearby Crafton.

Heart transfer patient improves

Ann Arbor, Mich. — The world's youngest heart transplant patient has been doing well, but doctors remain concerned her body might reject the new organ, a hospital spokesman said.

The unidentified 2-year-old Detroit-area girl on Sunday was "walking better than ever and is showing a lot of energy," said John Woodford, a spokesman at Mott Children's Hospital. "She's doing fine. However, there's still some sign of rejection."

The girl showed signs of rejection last week and doctors increased the amount of anti-rejection medication she was receiving, said Woodford.

She probably will be checked again on Wednesday, Woodford said.

The girl, whose identity is being withheld at the request of her parents, had suffered from cardiomyopathy, a degenerative heart disease. She received her heart in a six-hour operation June 20 from a 3-year-old Michigan boy who had died of meningitis, Woodford said.

Weather

Partly sunny today, high mid-90s. Easterly winds 5 to 10 mph. Partly cloudy tonight and Wednesday. Low tonight mid- to upper 60s. High Wednesday low to mid-90s.

Watson looks to win PGA title after British Open tourney loss

By The Associated Press

ST. ANDREWS, Scotland — One piece of history escaped him so Tom Watson has his sights set on another golfing landmark.

Watson, betrayed by the weapon that often is the most potent in his arsenal and deprived of the British Open title by the famous Road Hole, will head for the American PGA championship at Shoal Creek Golf Club in Birmingham, Ala., Aug. 16-19.

"That's my goal," Watson said. "It's been my goal since Pebble Beach (and his U.S. Open triumph in 1982). It'll be my goal until I win it."

"I want the Slam." He was referring a career sweep of the world's four major tests of golfing greatness — the Masters, U.S. and British Opens and the PGA, accomplished by only four men: Gene Sarazen, Ben Hogan, Gary Player and Jack Nicklaus.

Others have come close. But one or the other eluded them. Walter Hagen missed the Masters. Byron Nelson did not win the British Open. Sam Snead did not win the U.S. Open. Lee Trevino did not win the Masters. Arnold Palmer did not win the PGA, the one Watson lacks.

"You don't know if you can do it until it's done," he said. "I want it. Until I get it, that's my goal."

Another goal escaped him last weekend at the Old Course at St. Andrews.

From the lead, he was unable to hold off Spain's Seve Ballesteros, who ended a season of frustration with a 2-shot triumph in the 113th renewal of the British Open.

Watson, who had won the two previous British Open crowns and five overall, was attempting to tie Harry Vardon's record of six British Open crowns and complete a unique sweep of the Scottish courses that are used for this ancient event.

He couldn't do it. In the end it boiled down to two factors: the bogey he made on the dreaded Road Hole, the 17th, and an uncertain putter. He 3-putted twice and missed three from about six feet.

"A balky putter," said Watson, considered by many to be the premier putter in the game, "was the single most important reason I couldn't perform well today."

"The putter wouldn't allow me to put any distance between myself and the rest of the field."

And Ballesteros, now the winner of two British Opens and two Masters, applied relentless pressure, made the par he needed on the Road Hole, then nailed it down with a birdie on the 18th.

For the 27-year-old Spaniard, it marked the end to a season of frustration.

Playing most of the year on the American Tour, Ballesteros, had an indifferent, unproductive and, he said, unhappy season until returning to Europe and turning his year around in the British Open.

When he left the United States a month ago, he said he was homesick for Europe and not that happy on the American circuit.

And, after winning the British Open, he gave an enigmatic answer to the question:

"Will you return to the U.S. Tour?"

"I enjoy playing there," Ballesteros said. "It's a beautiful country with beautiful courses."

Crew ends summer season with win over Topeka team

K-State's crew ended its summer season Monday, with the varsity eight-oar team capturing first in a regatta held on Tuttle Creek Lake.

The Topeka Rowing Association from Washburn University gave the K-State team a good fight but couldn't quite pull ahead at the finish.

K-State crew coach, Don Rose, said that the Topeka crew led the entire race until the end.

"They (K-State) rowed hard," Rose said. "It (the lead) varied from deck length (15 feet) to as close as 7 to 8 feet near the end."

The Topeka team finished second with a time of 4 minutes, 28 seconds, finishing only 3 seconds behind the K-State varsity's 4:25 time.

K-State's novice team glided in third with a time of 4:51.

Rose said that the K-State eight-oar team made one tactical error that added to the difficulty for K-State. The "Cat" crew, instead of listening to their coxswain, overheard the Topeka team call for a final sprint and interrupted their rowing rhythm.

"We passed them in the final sprint," Rose said. "I thought our crew rowed extremely well though."

K-State alumna Peggy Gano, a Topeka team member, as well as the coxswain — one who calls out the rhythm of the oarsmen's strokes — seemed proud of her team.

"This was the second time we've been in the water this year," Gano said.

The Topeka team is made up primarily of businessmen and two college-age members, Gano said.

Gano said a coxswain has the most important job on a crew squad.

"You have to keep them encouraged," Gano said. "You have to tell them when to pull and even when to breathe."

After the race the K-State crew sponsored a picnic and watermelon feed at its boathouse. The spirit of all the team members was one of accomplishment and pride, Rose said.

He said the crew's season will start the first day of classes of the spring semester. Rose said he is encouraging people to come out in the fall, though, and become involved in team activities.

Good, clean fun describes miniature golf

By VIKKI WATSON
Staff Writer

The player crouches low and lines up the small, blue ball with its final destination — a hole at the end of the green.

The U.S. Open it isn't. A miniature golf game it is — complete with its tournaments, seriousness and, more than likely, just plain fun.

It's a game enjoyed by people of all ages — any and all who want 18 holes of fun, and at times, frustration.

It's fun for those who view the game as pure recreational activity, and frustration for the ones who take their game seriously enough to win at a missed par.

You'll find both types of players when it comes to miniature golf, said Glen Mockry, manager of Manhattan's Putt-Putt course. The majority of those visiting Putt-Putt on any given day are those just playing for the fun of it, he said.

"I think most of them are out there for the pure recreation," Mockry said. "If they shoot a good round, that's fine, and if they don't, that's OK, too."

For the serious-minded player, joining one of several professional putting associations may be the answer to finding good competition and maintaining a high level of putting expertise. The Midwest Putters' Association, Amateur Putters' Association and Professional Putters' Association are all available for the player with that "putting edge," Mockry said.

"We have several people around the local area who participate in Midwest tournaments," he said. "Four or five people qualified for the North American Putting Championships."

A lot of practice and a little natural ability will go a long way in warranting placement in one of those groups, said Mockry, who has found that those skilled at regular golf do not necessarily make the best miniature golf competitors.

"We found that people who are good on the golf course may not be good at Putt-Putt," he said. "The two just don't necessarily go hand in hand. But it does take quite a bit of practice."

And age matters little with course-playing ability, said Mockry.

especially for those playing for the fun of the game.

"It's one of the few things where somebody who is 6 or 7 years old can successfully compete," he said.

Ten-year-old Brian Thomas agreed, explaining the frustration of getting defeated by younger brother, Chad, in miniature golf play.

"I get mad when Chad beats me because he's younger than me," Thomas said. "I usually win in other games, but golf is different."

When it comes serious competition, one can watch some of the best local players each Wednesday at Putt-Putt's nighttime tournament. The tournament includes individual low score, team play and best ball competition.

But for the majority of miniature golf enthusiasts it's just another game — a game complete with fun and friends even in the heat of battle.

"It's just fun to play," Sue Smith, senior in fashion marketing, said of a sport about which she admits she is "not very serious."

"You can play with a bunch of friends and it doesn't cost that much money," she said.

Kansas City takes 2 from Toronto

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY — George Brett doubled home one run and Jorge Orta tripled in another in a three-run third inning to carry the Kansas City Royals to a 7-2 triumph over the Toronto Blue Jays and a sweep of their doubleheader Monday night.

The Royals rallied for five runs in the eighth inning of the first game for a 9-8 win.

The two losses dropped Toronto 10½ games behind Detroit in the American League East. The Tigers were 4-1 winners in Cleveland Monday night.

Royals starter Frank Wills, 1-1, struck out a career high of seven batters in the nightcap before he was relieved by Bret Saberhagen at the start of the seventh. Saberhagen finished for his first save.

The Royals scored twice in the third inning. Toronto picked up single runs in the second and third innings. The Royals added a run in second when Darryl Motley tripled and scored on Steve Balboni's ground out.

Steve Balboni drove in four runs and Greg Pryor singled in two runs in a five-run eighth inning to lead the Royals in the opener.

Pat Sheridan walked to start the eighth-inning rally.

Roy Lee Jackson, 6-2, relieved Dennis Lamp, and both runners moved up on Dane Iorg's grounder before Balboni doubled to left-center to score both runners.

Don Slaught singled to send Balboni to third and pinch-hitter Darryl Motley walked to load the bases. Pryor followed with his two-run single.

Man locates athlete in pre-WWII photos

By The Associated Press

WEST COVINA, Calif. — For 39 years, former Marine Andrew Gatzke sought the Japanese athlete whose photos he found on Okinawa near the end of World War II.

Although Gatzke believed the man in the photos had died in the fighting that followed the April 1, 1945 invasion of the Japanese island, he always hoped that he might locate the man's relatives.

Now, because of an unusual series of events, Gatzke finally will turn over to the man the only mementos of his youth as a track and field star.

Eigin Miyagi, a resident of Urasoe City on Okinawa, didn't know the albums existed until this month when a story about Gatzke and his search for the owner of the albums reached a Japanese news service.

Gatzke found the two photo albums, a track suit and a pair of shoes in the rubble of Okinawa when troops were sent in to clean up in the waning days of World War II.

Landmarks in the photos indicated they had been taken in Los Angeles and New York, and Gatzke believed there also were pictures of the 1932 Olympic Games in Los Angeles.

Gatzke, 62, shipped the albums home and for nearly four decades, he stored them under his bed in Cortez, Colo., as he tried to locate someone who might be interested in them.

Last month, the retired telephone construction worker visited El Monte, about 15 miles east of Los Angeles, for his grandson's high school graduation. He brought the albums with him, thinking that someone connected with the 1984 Olympics might be able to identify the man in the photos.

The San Gabriel Valley Tribune, based in this city 20 miles east of Los Angeles, wrote a story about Gatzke's search, which The Associated Press distributed worldwide.

The Kyodo News Service of Japan received the AP story and started researching Japanese track and field records from the 1930s.

The identity and location of the 68-year-old Miyagi were quickly discovered: He was, and still is, a prominent sports figure in Japan. He once held the Japanese national discus record and today he is chairman of the track and field association in Okinawa.

About 10 days after the story appeared in the San Gabriel paper, Kyodo reporters contacted Miyagi.

"He was very surprised," said Jun Pangilnam, of Kyodo's Los Angeles bureau. "He thought he had lost everything during the war. He feels he has received something that was a reminder of his youth. He just said it was unbelievable."

As it turned out, there were no photos of Olympic competition in the albums. Miyagi said the photos were taken in 1939 at an international student sports festival in Vienna.

Plans are being made for Miyagi to attend the 1984 Olympic Games, which begin Saturday.

Commissioners tour city's growth sites

By LYNN TALPERS
Collegian Reporter

Before meeting to define future goals for Manhattan, city commissioners Saturday toured sites for possible city expansion.

The tour began with the new levee trail along the southeast edge of town. The city owns about eight acres of land along the levee near the south end of Fifth Street. This land was bought after the 1961 flood for future use as a park area.

"We could sell it and use the money for further development of parks and recreation areas elsewhere," said Don Harmon, city manager.

Both Harmon and Mayor Dave Fiser expressed concern over future use of the land as a park. The proposed southern arterial highway is planned adjacent to the levee area.

The commissioners then went to the Waste Water Treatment Plant east of town on Highway 24.

The commission is concerned that if Manhattan's population continues to grow, this plant, built in August 1976, will not be able to process all the sewage produced. A possible expansion is being considered.

"It's not really the people population that increases the flow in this plant, but the big industries that use about 1 million gallons a day and then dump it back into our sewer system," Allen Shineman, director of public works, said.

By the year 2000, the city plans to add an aeration tank to the current plant for sewage processing.

Shineman led the commissioners through the Water Treatment Plant located at the north end of Third Street near Tuttle Creek Boulevard. Under consideration is the addition of a water basin there.

The plant, added to the original buildings in 1971, can soften and treat approximately 10 million gallons of water per day, Shineman said. This meets the current water needs of Manhattan.

Shineman said that a new basin is needed because the existing basins are deteriorating badly. An additional basin would allow one basin to be drained and repaired while avoiding a possible water shortage.

Also, as Manhattan grows, a new water basin will be needed to support the greater need.

The commissioners next went to the Community Building located at Fourth and Humboldt streets. This building is currently used by the parks and recreation program for arts and crafts classes, square dancing and a pre-school program called the "Wee Wiggles."

The Manhattan Arts Council had asked the commission to allow a study to be conducted to consider a possible conversion of this building into a cultural center with a theater and classrooms. The commission denied the study.

"The gymnasium is the thing we have to figure out," said Gary Stith, director of community development. The gym, located on the second floor of the building, has a ceiling that needs to be replaced. This would cost approximately $13,000.

Next on the tour was the City Maintenance Department. The commission viewed the existing building and the site for the new minor maintenance and wash-bay building.

"We are severely lacking space in the winter for vehicles," said Will Jensen, street supervisor. "We have no place to do minor maintenance."

The department has instituted a "driver-initiated maintenance" program on all vehicles to be conducted every Friday.

"Since we've initiated this program we've cut down on brake jobs and other major maintenance a lot," Jensen said.

"The city vehicles need rapid hot washing to get the street salt off them in the winter," Harmon said. "It's just eating them up."

Also included was a tour of the traffic control section and sign shop at the maintenance department.

Next, the commissioners visited a site west of town for a baseball complex. The city proposes to buy 50 of 103 acres of the lot. The complex would be slightly larger than City Park.

"We would probably start with two ball diamonds and probably half as many soccer and football fields as originally planned," Harmon said.

The original proposal called for the complex to be located in the Hunter's Island area south of Manhattan. This site was larger, but because of community opposition to the site's access problems, the city could not purchase the land.

"This is a three-year plan starting this year and continuing for the next two," said Tim Vanatta, director of parks and recreation. "It would cost about $250,000 each of the three years."

The commissioners favor this site over Hunter's Island because it has better access. There is a "willing" seller for the land also.

The tour continued with a stop at the fire station currently under construction at Denison and Kimball avenues.

The building will house the offices of the Manhattan Fire Department and provide service for Northview, the University and western sections of town. It will also be used for K-State's firefighter training program.

Construction of the fire station began in April, and is expected to be complete April 1985.

Begin favors Likud in Israeli election

By The Associated Press

TEL AVIV, Israel — Israel's opposition Labor Party sees victory ahead in today's national elections. But Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir's Likud bloc, buoyed by an 11th-hour endorsement from Menachem Begin, insisted on Sunday that Likud had the best chance of forming a government.

Begin, the popular former prime minister and founder of the Likud Party, broke a lengthy silence Sunday to endorse Shamir.

The 70-year-old Begin said when telephoned by The Associated Press at his Jerusalem home, "I hope the Likud wins the election and that Mr. Yitzhak Shamir will form the next government."

He declined to answer further questions.

But the endorsement, which Likud officials said could be crucial in swaying undecided voters, may have come too late to save Likud.

Israel radio said it would not air the report because as a state institution it cannot broadcast items that might affect the election outcome. Israeli newspapers which appear Monday morning, when polling stations open, are under no such constraint, however.

Two independent polls published on the eve of the elections both showed Labor leading the Likud bloc, but winning fewer than the 50 seats in the 120-seat Knesset, or parliament, which Labor says it needs.

"It's going to be very hard with less than 50 seats," Labor's Mordechai Gur acknowledged in an interview with the AP. "Now, the missile is on the way to the target. We just have to wait and see if it has hit."

If the polls prove true, Labor might have to look to the religious parties to join it in a coalition of at least 61 seats needed to form a government.

Labor Party leader Shimon Peres has said he does not want to do this, but Gur said Labor may be forced to.

"Our own polls show us winning 52 to 53 seats and running about 15 seats ahead of Likud. If that happens, it will be a matter of hours before we can form a government," Gur said. "Otherwise, I don't know how long it could take or where we will have to go to find partners."

In the last election, in 1981, Likud won 48 seats and Labor 47.

Deputy Prime Minister David Levy, Likud's campaign manager, forecast a close election but said Likud "will form the next government" because it has more potential coalition partners.

Likud officials have said the party needs to win at least 45 seats to be able to form a government.

In a burst of pre-election activity Sunday, Shamir's government approved plans to build two new Jewish settlements in the occupied West Bank and a third in the Gaza Strip. That would raise to 13 the number of settlements in the narrow Gaza Strip near the Egyptian border. Western embassies say there are 177 settlements in the West Bank. About 1.3 million Palestinians live in the two areas.

The settlement issue was hotly debated in the campaign. Shamir said he will keep building settlements if he wins. Labor said it will open talks with Jordan about the West Bank and restrict settlement activity.

Shamir spent Sunday at his Tel Aviv headquarters. He said he was optimistic about the election, but would not estimate how many votes Likud would draw.

Gur said Labor intentionally has used an understated campaign style to appeal to "Likud disappointed" — people who voted for Likud in the previous election in 1981 but, because of disappointment over the economy and the Lebanon war, have been unwilling to commit themselves this year.

Some voters viewed Peres as a symbol of machine politics that dominated Israel until Likud ended 29 years of Labor rule in 1977.

Miss America denies OK of rights release

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Vanessa Williams, the reigning Miss America, said in an Associated Press interview Sunday that she did not remember ever signing a release for nude photographs taken of her two years ago, and that the pictures were to have been private.

The pictures, to be published in the September issue of Penthouse magazine, prompted Miss America Pageant officials to request Miss Williams' resignation. The 21-year-old Millwood, N.Y., beauty queen was to announce her decision this afternoon at a news conference, but declined to reveal it Sunday night.

"I guess no one owns the right to the pictures. It's a legal question," she said in a telephone interview. "I don't recall signing anything with Tom Chiapel. I remember signing a stat sheet as a model. Every model at the registry had to fill one out."

Williams said she was assured by Chiapel that the pictures were to be artistic photographs, never to be shown publicly, and that she would not be identifiable in them.

She said that when she informed Albert A. Marks Jr., executive director of the pageant, that she had heard a rumor the pictures would be published, he told her, "He had heard a rumor that I would be in Playboy. He said he heard about it a few months ago, and didn't think anything about it."

She said Marks was "very reassuring" when she talked to him last Sunday, adding, "we all make mistakes. He was very supportive and compassionate."

According to Penthouse publisher Bob Guccione, who purchased the pictures from Chiapel, a Mount Kisco, N.Y., photographer and co-owner of a local model registry, the magazine does have a signed release.

Williams said she went to work for Chiapel as a makeup artist and

Polish prisoners await amnesty results

By The Associated Press

WARSAW — Poland marked 40 years of Communist rule Sunday with hundreds of political prisoners awaiting freedom under an amnesty and with one prominent jailed Solidarity figure allowed three days' leave from prison to see his ailing mother.

The amnesty, announced Saturday, drew cautious praise from Roman Catholic Church and Western officials, but was viewed cynically by some Solidarity leaders.

One of those expressing reservations was the man let out of prison Sunday, Andrzej Gwiazda, a former deputy chairman of the outlawed labor movement's ruling body and one of seven senior Solidarity leaders who will be freed under the amnesty.

Gwiazda, on a three-day furlough to visit his hospitalized 77-year-old mother, said authorities arrested well-wishers outside his home Sunday.

Reached by telephone at home in the Baltic port of Gdansk, Gwiazda said he was furloughed because of the amnesty but questioned authorities' motives in freeing political prisoners.

"It is a gesture of conciliation, but not with us nor with society," said the 49-year-old engineer. "This amnesty is only to get some dollars," he said, referring to the possibility the United States and Western Europe may ease sanctions.

Parliament voted Saturday to free 652 political prisoners and as many as 35,000 common criminals, representing almost half the total prison population, but not those being held in connection with acts of high treason, espionage and sabotage.

"We welcome the announcement of the amnesty," said Kathleen Lang, a U.S. State Department spokesman in a statement Saturday. "This is a positive move. We hope the amnesty will lead the Polish authorities to take further steps to meet the aspirations so clearly expressed by the Polish people."

Iran makes attempt to better relations

By The Associated Press

TEHRAN, Iran — Iran's revolutionary government has expressed the "clear wish" to gradually re-establish contacts with the West, West German Foreign Minister Hans-Dietrich Genscher said Sunday.

But he said it is still "open" whether the Iranians are thinking about returning to speaking terms with the United States, which Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini's government still describes as an enemy of the Islamic revolution.

Genscher made his comments in a Tehran news conference Sunday as he ended a two-day official visit to Iran. He held a final meeting with Iranian President Ali Musavi Khamenei before flying home to Bonn.

West German sources in Genscher's party said many in the Iranian government oppose resuming ties with "the devil, the United States."

But others in the leadership, particularly Parliamentary

President Hashemi Rafsanjani, appear bound that Iran to break out of its isolation and try to improve overall relations with the West, said the sources, who spoke on condition they not be identified.

When Genscher flew to Tehran on Friday, he became the first European Common Market foreign minister to visit Iran since the 1979 revolution that toppled Shah Mohammed Reza Pahlavi.

He said his talks with Iranian officials had been a success in "intensifying" West German-Iranian political ties. Economic relations between the two countries have been favorable over the last five years.

Genscher termed the talks "important" and "useful" at the news conference.

Officials accompanying him said Iran had proposed to improve its trade balance with West Germany with a long-term agreement on oil deliveries.

Business college names new head

Ag school dean schedules retirement

By LYNN BENDER
and TIM FITZGERALD
Collegian Reporters

The colleges of agriculture and business are undergoing a change in administration.

John O. Dunbar, dean of the College of Agriculture and director of K-State's Kansas Agriculture Experiment Station announced his retirement Friday, and Randolph A. (Randy) Pohlman has been named dean of the College of Business Administration, effective in early August.

Dunbar who has been the agriculture dean and experiment station director since 1981 will serve next year and step down June 30, 1985. Prior to his current position, Dunbar was the director of the K-State Cooperative Extension Service since 1976.

K-State President Duane Acker said Dunbar became the top administrative officer for agriculture shortly after the reorganization of the University's agriculture programs.

It was the first time all of K-State's agriculture instruction, research and extension activities were consolidated under one administrative officer.

"Dean Dunbar provided a stabilizing influence. He quickly implemented policies to guide the faculty and promote KSU ag programs, and he provided strengthened communication with Kansas agricultural leaders, commodity groups and K-State's ag students. His leadership has enhanced the services and influence of one of America's premier agricultural colleges," Acker said recently.

John O. Dunbar

Randy Pohlman

While announcing his retirement, Dunbar said he believed the progress of the K-State College of Agriculture has been his greatest satisfaction while serving the public.

Dunbar was not specific concerning his future plans, but he said by the end of next June it will be time to move on to other things.

"I will have reached the age of 65 — too early to quit growing and serving, but not too early to shift my energies to some other interesting and satisfying form of endeavor," Dunbar said.

Following his retirement, Dunbar and his wife, Fran, plan to continue residing in Manhattan.

A nationwide search to fill the dean of agriculture position will be initiated at the beginning of the fall semester.

K-State Provost Owen Koeppel announced Pohlman's appointment as dean of the College of Business Administration on Thursday. Pohlman has been a member of the K-State faculty since 1976, and head of the Department of Finance since 1982.

"Pohlman had strong support of faculty, campus administrators, and the College of Business Administration Advisory Council," Koeppel said.

Pohlman returned to K-State in January from the University of California at Los Angeles where, at the invitation of Richard Roll of the UCLA Graduate School of Management, he was a visiting research scholar for six months.

Along with Assistant Dean Tom Brown, Pohlman recently secured and established the first fellowship in the College of Business Administration MBA program — the Union National Bank Fellowship of Banking.

Pohlman said he plans "a very aggressive College of Business Administration at K-State — one that will be visible within the state and nationally. We look to the establishment of distinguished scholar chairs and to move the leading edge of business education. We will be seeking the best faculty we can attract, and the top students in Kansas and elsewhere."

Pohlman succeeds Robert Lynn, who has been dean since 1968. Lynn announced his resignation after his wife, Naomi Lynn, was named dean of the College of Public and Urban Affairs at Georgia State University, Atlanta.

The new dean has consulted widely in a variety of business areas including manufacturing, construction, service, retail sales and not-for-profit firms. He is a recognized expert in valuation of closely held business and in determining economic losses in cases of personal injury or wrongful death.

A search for a new head for the Department of Finance will be started soon, Pohlman said.

FBI trumps kidnapping plot, frees wife of bridge player

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Wealthy kidnapping victim Edith Rosenkranz told Sunday how she was kept blindfolded for 48 hours and driven through the nation's capital in a van, relying on faith for strength until she was released minutes before her abductors were arrested.

"I had faith that I would be found," the 60-year-old wife of George Rosenkranz, pharmaceutical millionaire and tournament bridge player, told a news conference. She said her captors were "not rough" but did threaten to "hit me if I did not do what I was told."

"I always had great hope it would end well," she said. Although she said she was blindfolded throughout her two-day captivity, Rosenkranz said she never felt her life was in danger.

Rosenkranz was released Saturday night three blocks from the White House after her husband dropped a briefcase containing what police called a "substantial" ransom in an Alexandria, Va., parking lot. Authorities refused to say the amount but Washington television stations said it was $1 million.

Swarms of police and FBI agents converged on the van after Rosenkranz was released with the warning: "Don't look back."

Norman A. Zigrissi, special agent in charge of the FBI's Washington field office, said the Rosenkranzes were targeted for the kidnapping because the abductors "knew they had money and thought they would pay the ransom."

Two men were arrested with the money and the van, including one

Students tell stories; start ghostly legends

By MARLA STEINER
Contributing Writer

Nick likes to rearrange chairs when no one is around. He also leaves his footsteps in the Purple Masque Theatre. While no one has seen Nick, a number of people believe he's there.

Another mysterious person, the doctor's wife, supposedly loves to slam doors and dance around the sleeping dorms at the Triangle fraternity house, 221 N. Delaware Ave.

These characters are believed to be ghosts, or apparitions, as Shakespeare liked to call them. Movies such as "Poltergeist" and "Ghostbusters" reveal both the frightening and humorous sides of ghost stories; however, some people at K-State probably could write their own movie scripts concerning their favorite spirits.

One such person is Natalie Green. She published an article in "The Cue" magazine in 1975, describing the adventures of a professional ghostchaser who once visited the Purple Masque Theater, located in East Stadium, in search of Nick.

According to Green's article, "When taken inside the Masque itself, the woman (the ghostchaser) felt a presence. However, when taken into the platform storage area, she ran from the building screaming. After the woman calmed down, the department was warned never to allow people to enter the area alone, as something evil was there."

Thus originated the story of Nick and the Purple Masque Theater. The theater was originally a cafeteria which was directly below the former men's athletic resident hall.

According to the story, in the early 1960s, Nick was a football player who was injured in a game and brought inside the cafeteria, where he was placed on one of the dining tables and eventually died. His spirit though, remained.

Mary Ann Flemming, a former stage technician for the Purple Masque Theater, said she believed the supernatural stories.

"I really thought there was a ghost there," Flemming said. "When I was working alone at night, I could feel somebody watching me. I turned and no one was there. You can feel the presence."

Another believer in Nick, is Doug Schubert, senior in radio and television. Schubert said his experience occurred during a performance in the theater.

"Nick started banging on the waterpipes," Schubert said. "The sound was very loud and distracting. The heat wasn't turned on, so it couldn't have been that. All of a sudden we heard bang, bang, bang."

Tales of the doctor's wife at the Triangle house are equally mysterious.

According to George Nincehler, junior in electrical engineering and member of the Triangle house, the story circulating at the fraternity is that of a doctor's wife, who once lived in the house and hanged herself in the garage.

"There have been a lot of strange noises around here," Nincehler said. "Last year for about a week, there was a squeaky noise in this one room but there was absolutely no one in there."

Another Triangle member, Dan Hurford, senior in construction science, deals with the stories a little less seriously, saying he enjoys the humor produced from the stories but doesn't give the stories much credibility.

"Everyone kids around about it," Hurford said, "and I really don't believe it. For some guys it is just a good practical joke."

Publications workshop attracts young writers

By STEVE ONKEN
Collegian Reporter

The Flint Hills Publications Workshop, the largest week-long journalism workshop in Kansas, began Sunday and will continue until Friday. High school and junior college students and publication advisers are attending, David Adams, workshop director and director of Student Publications Inc., said.

The workshop — sponsored by the College of Arts and Sciences, the Department of Journalism and Mass Communications and Student Publications — has increased its enrollment to 88 students and advisers, up from 51 last year. This includes 24 students and eight advisers in the newspaper division; 31 students and 10 advisers in the yearbook division; and 12 students and three advisers in the photography division. Adams said the total for this year's workshop is up 73 percent and is the "largest workshop we have had in years."

"This workshop is unique, for we try to be a service to high schools in Kansas by attracting journalism students through scholarships provided by the KSU Foundation in the assistant provost's office. This is the first time scholarships have been offered. This has made us more competitive with the other workshops in Kansas," he said.

The workshop faculty and students are housed at the University Ramada Inn across the street from the Union. Adams said that the workshop participants stay in the Ramada because the price was competitive to that of the residence halls, and being located close to the workshop base of Kedzie Hall was also a deciding factor. The food service is being provided by the Union.

"Last year was the first year we stayed at the Ramada. But since we have a lot of late-night labs, it was nice to keep everyone in the south part of the campus. The students were very enthused about it," Adams said.

Adams said that an "award-winning faculty" is providing the instruction for the workshop participants. K-State journalism students are serving as assistants and counselors.

"I try to get a variety of advisers from both the big and small schools around the area and I try to get new advisers, too," Adams said.

Adams cited several reasons why he feels this workshop is unique from the rest across the state.

"First of all, we are the only workshop where they produce both a yearbook and newspaper throughout the week. The hands-on experience is what makes us unique. The paper comes out right before the end of the workshop on Friday; the yearbook comes out as soon as it is printed and returned, and then we send them out to the participants' home addresses," he said.

"Second, for the convenience of advisers, we offer all three divisions (newspaper, yearbook and photography) during the week at one workshop. Also, both the high school students and advisers, by doing an extra project during the week, may receive college credit. Most of the advisers are doing this and right now we have five students enrolled, but this is the first year we are offering this," he added.

receptionist in June 1982 after her freshman year at Syracuse University.

"Tom had expressed nude photography and asked me if I'd do it," she said. "I had never done it before. I was a bit curious, but didn't know if I wanted to take the chance."

She said she did a session with him after he assured her they would only be seen by her. When she saw contact sheet she said: "I wasn't really thrilled about them. I didn't want anyone to see them."

Earlier Sunday, Leonard Horn, the pageant's attorney, said Williams' lawyer, Dennis Dowdell, told him that Williams, the first black to capture the title, would come to a decision in time for her news conference today in New York.

It is the first time any of the 57 women to hold the crown was asked to step down.

Suzette Charles, the Miss New Jersey chosen first runner-up to Williams in last year's pageant, said she was prepared to honor her contract with the pageant that would require her to serve out the term of Miss America.

Contest officials decided Friday to give Williams 72 hours to resign after discussing the matter in two meetings last week. They said the content of the photographs left them no choice but to ask for Williams' resignation.

Pageant officials feared the publication of the photographs would hurt the "wholesome" image of the contest.

identified as Glenn I. Wright, 42. His Houston address matched that of a player of the same name at the American Contract Bridge League summer tournament here in which Rosenkranz was playing.

One of the tournament participants, Mimi Hagedorn, said the Wright she knew as a tournament player was a music teacher who had been introduced to Rosenkranz 15 years ago by the millionaire's paid bridge partner, Edward Wold.

Also arrested at the scene was Dennis Moss, 26, of Cocoa, Fla. A third man, Orland Dwaine Tolden of Houston was arrested later in a motel 12 blocks away.

Rosenkranz told the 10-minute news conference that throughout the ordeal, he had "faith in God."

"I had faith and great trust that my wife would be able to go through this," he said. "I feel great and relieved." He called it "a very difficult and tough experience" but said that it had expanded "my faith in God and faith in people."

Bridge tournament spokesman Bob Bonomi identified Wright as a player who had dropped out of bridge circles in 1982, but who had played at least one match at the tournament last week.

"He has been inactive for about two years, but that's not unusual because people go in and out of the game," Bonomi said.

Rosenkranz, 68, is a retired founder of Syntex Corp., a California pharmaceutical company that helped develop birth control pills.

Asbestos removal nears end in Union

By CORRINE NELSON
Collegian Reporter

Workers in the courtyard area of the K-State Union have been removing the asbestos-containing ceiling material and preparing for the new ceiling construction.

The courtyard area has been closed since July 9 for work on the $33,000 project.

The ceiling over the courtyard, which was constructed in 1970 as a part of the third phase of the construction of the Union, had been shown to contain asbestos fibers, Walt Smith, director of the Union, said.

The ceiling is being replaced to prevent potential danger from asbestos exposure, which has been cited as a possible cause of lung diseases, including cancer.

"Although no immediate danger is being caused by the materials in the courtyard ceiling, we are having it (the ceiling) replaced to eliminate any potential danger," Smith said.

Sheets of plastic have been hung to close the courtyard from the rest of the Union. A vacuum has been created within the closed-off area to keep any asbestos-containing material from drifting into other areas of the Union.

Air is continually being filtered out of the sealed-off area through exhaust fans.

The air that leaves the area goes through four filters before it reaches the outside air.

"This (the filtering) is to ensure that no contaminated air will escape into the environment, as well continually remove any asbestos fibers from the air within the courtyard," Smith said.

A state health inspector has been taking air samples daily at different areas in the Union to ensure that no health danger has been created while the ceiling material is being removed, Smith said.

So far, the air samples have not contained asbestos.

The ceiling material is dampened before it is removed so the chances of any asbestos drifting is reduced.

Workers have been wearing protective suits and eyewear while the removal work is being completed.

The new ceiling is to be completed by Aug. 9 and will appear much the same as the previous ceiling.

"Most students returning to campus this fall will not notice a difference. It will only look cleaner," Smith said.

The courtyard ceiling replacement has been planned for approximately two years.

"We had to get the timing right," Smith said.

"We feel that because this is one of the slowest times of the year in the Union, the closing (of the courtyard) will inconvenience the least number of people," he said.

Citizens for Peace group helps with Gandhi march

Yogesh Gandhi, great grand-nephew of Mahatma Gandhi, will be in town today for the Manhattan leg of the "Operation: SALT March."

The SALT (Serve All Life Today) March is a modern version of the original SALT March of Mahatma Gandhi, which was a protest against an unfair salt tax.

Participants will gather in the northwest corner of City Park at 5 p.m. for a brief welcome from Mayor Dave Fiser before beginning their march — a route which will go north from City Park to Anderson Avenue, west to Sunset Avenue, north to Claflin Road and west to College Avenue.

Coni Jo Bates, coordinator of the Manhattan Citizens for Peace — the group sponsoring the event, said there are nine walkers traveling across the country with Gandhi. Any interested people in Manhattan are welcome to join in the walk, which will end at the College Avenue United Methodist Church, 1609 College Ave.

At 6:30 p.m., there will be a dinner at the church followed by a documentary film, "Life of Gandhi." Yogesh Gandhi will also speak on the philosophy of the SALT March.

In the United States, the SALT March is moving through 25 major cities in 114 days, covering more than 4,000 miles. After crossing the United States, the march will move through Central and South America, Soviet Union, Eastern and Western Europe, Africa, the Middle East, Asia and Australia.

Those frisky bears

By The Associated Press

BEDFORD, Pa. — Black bears are damaging beehives, loitering on lawns, eating crops and causing traffic problems on the Pennsylvania Turnpike as their mating season shifts into high gear.

"They're like teen-age boys at this time of year, chasing after females," District Game Protector Tim Flanagan said Saturday.

Flanagan said he spent three hours Friday night trying to keep a bear off the turnpike near Shawnee State Park.

"He actually sits there on the (4-foot-high) fence, looking back and forth, then pops right over and walks up to the edge of the highway waiting for the traffic to pass," he said.

A large bear that's been damaging beehives has for two weeks ignored a trap baited with such bear delicacies as honey and bacon, he said.

"He's been into the beehives three times," Flanagan said. "He climbs over a garden fence, goes through the garden and climbs the other fence to get to the hives."

"But he steps over the tomatoes, beans and corn — he won't step on the plants," he said. "Smart bear."

Local equestrian gallops to nationals

By CORRINE NELSON
Collegian Reporter

Twelve-year-old Mary Ann Thomas of Manhattan is an equestrian, and a hunter — for trophies. She says equestrian hunt-seat riding is something she does for fun, and to fulfill her dream of someday being a champion at the National Pony Hunter Finals.

In a white ruffled blouse, dark blazer, black velvet hat, black gloves, riding pants and English riding boots with spurs, Mary Ann is dressed for competition.

Mary Ann and her horse have won six championships at competitions this year, qualifying her for the National Pony Hunter Finals at Showday Farm in Culpepper, Va.

Mary Ann, the 5-foot, 80-pound daughter of Dale and Della Thomas, has won numerous ribbons and trophies but she said she is most proud of her silver trays and goblets.

This year she has also won a leather halter and lead rope engraved with the show name and different amounts of prize money.

"I have always had the goal to win as many championships as possible and my dream came true when I won enough to qualify for the national finals, (which will be in August)," Mary Ann said.

She said she has had four horses since she began riding four years ago but has been riding huntseat for only the past three years.

"I first got interested in horses when I was 3 years old when we (she and her parents) were visiting a ranch in Colorado," Mary Ann said. "I just fell in love with horses and begged my dad until he bought me one."

Mary Ann now rides an 11-year-old purebred Welsh pony mare, named Gwynedd Fare-Thee-Well. She has been showing this horse, which she calls "Pony," for two years.

Before she bought Pony, Mary Ann owned a smaller pony, but she showed her only a year.

"I just outgrew her so fast that I had to look for a bigger pony," she said.

Mary Ann said it is hard to see one of her horses replaced by another when she outgrows it but that is part of what the classes are judged on — how the horse and rider look together.

When she became interested in the huntseat style she said took lessons from Sandy and Heather Longan of Manhattan. Sandy travels to shows with Mary Ann wherever she goes.

"Sandy has been so good to help me all the time and answers all my questions," Mary Ann said. "Whenever I need her she is there to help me."

This year, Mary Ann said she has competed in shows in Colorado, Missouri, Oklahoma and Kansas.

One of the classes in which Mary Ann competes is the Children's Hunter Under Saddle class, a class in which the horse is judged on appearance, manner of movement (leads, knee movement and style) and the rider is judged on posture control and appearance.

'My dream came true when I won enough to qualify for the national finals.'

— Mary Ann Thomas

Mary Ann also competes in the jump classes which include fence, poles, barrel and mound jumping.

During riding, Mary Ann said she gives her horse different cues so the horse knows what it is to do.

"By pressing my knees into the horse's side or by nudging her on one side or the other and controlling the amount of pressure on the reins I can tell Pony what to do," Mary Ann said.

Mary Ann hasn't had any problems with this style of riding but "until this year I had a real fear of jumping the 3-foot fence, but now that I have accomplished that I know I will be able to move right on to the higher jumps," she said.

"She (Pony) is real high strung...she is always trying to challenge me and see how far she can go...this is just how this breed of horse behaves," Mary Ann said.

Mary Ann said she rides the most during the spring and summer and practices every day for at least four hours at the Equerry Stable, outside of Manhattan, where her horse is kept. She trains for competition at Kirin Farms in Kansas City, Kan.

"In the fall I give my horse a break so she doesn't get show sour," Mary Ann said. "We pull her shoes off and take her off her medication (given to keep her out of season), so she (Pony) can get a good rest."

After finishing high school and college, Mary Ann said she plans to give up showing, but not her style of riding.

"I will probably get a nice hunt horse and go on fox and coyote hunts," Mary Ann said.

Mary Ann Thomas, 12, Manhattan, goes over a fence with her horse Gwynedd Fare-Thee-Well during practice Thursday. Thomas has done hunt-seat riding for three years.

Movie defeats image of karate violence

By WAYNE PRICE
Arts and Features Editor

Chuck Norris would definitely be upset. Why, the idea of a karate movie without black-robed Ninja, drug smugglers or expertly trained ex-Vietnam commandos getting killed one by one by some vengeful psychopath is deplorable.

Review

"The Karate Kid," without the use of the above ingredients makes an extremely enjoyable film anyway, focusing attention on the characters and their relationships instead of their martial arts ability.

The film, even though bogged down by some predictabilities, some much too obvious symbolism and a few unnecessary story lines, is a good film to sit down and enjoy.

"The Karate Kid," follows the adventures of a teenager named Daniel (played by "Eight is Enough" actor Ralph Macchio) after he is uprooted from his home in New Jersey and forced to move with his mother to a suburb in California.

Daniel, a partly self-taught and YMCA-trained karate pupil, runs into trouble by hitting on (romantically that is) Ali, the ex-girlfriend of Johnny, the star pupil of a quality karate school. Needless to say, Daniel bites dirt.

His troubles don't end there. How can they? He's the classic new kid trying to adjust to different surroundings. So Daniel continues his romantic pursuit despite continued beating from Johnny and his friends.

The beatings become one too many for Daniel, so he retaliates by pulling a practical joke on Johnny. He soon regrets it as he begins to receive a practical beating up by Johnny and his four friends. Mysteriously creeps in the maintenance man of Daniel's apartment complex (Noriyuki "Pat" Morita) who makes the situation even more practical for Johnny and his hyperactive cohorts.

A relationship soon develops as the old man agrees to teach Daniel karate in order for Daniel to earn his respect at school and participate against Johnny in the big karate championship. Just guess the predictable part and you'll be correct. Remember, the people who made "The Karate Kid" also made two of the "Rocky" films.

The best part of the film though has nothing to do with karate. It's the relationship between the old man and Daniel. The youth learns from the old man that karate comes from the heart and not the fist and is continually told by the old man that success at karate, as well as life, depends on the proper "balance."

Morita is excellent as the slightly bizarre old man, mixing ancient oriental philosophy with some good old modern American sarcasm. Even though eccentric and clever, he manages to relay painful emotions about his deceased wife and child to Daniel, as well as the audience.

Daniel is surprisingly well-played by Macchio. In his "Eight is Enough" role he was supposed to be a street-tough, cocky guy and had about as much credibility as a raw potato. But in "Karate Kid" he's more humble and is able to generate sympathy from the audience for his situation. The friendship that develops between the boy and the old man is truly well done.

The movie does drag in some places and the snag seems to come from the attempted poor-guy-meets-rich-girl syndrome. When Ali's father finds out his daughter is still seeing somebody from the wrong side of the tracks, he almost laughably sticks out his chest, looks down at his daughter, and in a voice weighted down by bricks, says, "Ali I don't want you seeing that boy."

The mixup and eventual resolution of Daniel seeing Ali get kissed by Johnny is tri-combo deluxe sack of gushy mush, containing ingredients of a Harlequin romance, "Young and the Restless" and an episode from ABC's After School Special.

Come to the movie to see the karate sequences and you'll feel as if you've drunk a sugarless pop; the fight scenes are definitely numbered and the result is a better film. Just for fun though, somebody should have taken a whack or two during the editing to avoid the look of a Japanese "Romeo and Juliet."

"The Karate Kid" is now showing at the Wareham Theater downtown.

Exercise benefits remain despite death

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — The death of noted runner Jim Fixx from a heart attack while jogging should not overshadow the benefits of running and other vigorous exercise for the heart, a researcher and a running club executive said Sunday.

"Overall, people seem to do better if they exercise than if they don't," said Dr. David Siscovick, an internal medicine specialist at the University of North Carolina Department of Medicine in Chapel Hill. "I don't think that Jim Fixx's unfortunate death changes that. It's a matter of trying to weigh the benefits and the risks."

Fixx, 52, whose best-seller "The Complete Book of Running" helped launch the jogging craze, collapsed Friday in Hardwick, Vt., during a solitary run. His body was found by a passing motorcyclist about 50 feet from the motel he checked into an hour earlier. An autopsy Saturday showed he had died of a heart attack caused by serious heart disease.

Siscovick, chief author of a 1982 study that found vigorous exercise helps protect against sudden heart failure, said Fixx's death shows there is a risk in jogging and other vigorous exercise. Such risks must be recognized and studied, especially with exercise becoming more popular, he said. But people shouldn't rule out exercise just because they hear about deaths like Fixx's, he said.

"The thing to keep in mind is that people who don't drop dead (while exercising) don't make the news. People who do drop dead do make the news if they happen to be prominent people," he said.

To put Fixx's death in perspective, one would have to consider everyone who exercises and the hours they spend at it, and compare them to people who don't exercise, he said. The evidence shows that people who exercise regularly have less risk of heart attacks than those who don't, he said.

Maui onions win taste test

By The Associated Press

WAILUKU, Hawaii — Onion growers in Vidalia, Ga., may be a tad teary-eyed over the beating they took in Maui's onion contest.

Maui County Councilman Charles Ota and other council members and staff conducted a blind taste test for sweetness, comparing a Maui onion and one grown in Vidalia.

They voted 12-0 for Maui onions.

"This has got to be the Kula (Maui) onion," Ota said Friday after tasting one of each. "It's sweeter, crunchier, better texture. I'm pretty sure it's the one." It was.

Williams' mistake deserves pageant leniency

In recent times, debate has flourished about the Miss America beauty pageant. Some have called the annual event exploitative of women, while others see the pageant as merely a form of entertainment that also gives participants opportunities through prizes and national exposure.

Now, the accused is becoming the accuser in the wake of the revelation that the 1984 Miss America, Vanessa Williams, posed nude for a photographer. Those pictures are now available for all the public to view in September's Penthouse magazine.

This series of events has prompted Miss America pageant officials to ask that Williams give up her title in the wake of the publicity surrounding the unfortunate situation. Officials have said that Williams posing nude goes against the image of the Miss America pageant and that a change should be made to protect that image. As of yet, Williams has maintained that she should not be forced to give up her title merely for a mistake she made when she was in need of money.

Williams has represented the Miss America pageant more than adequately during her reign. As the first black Miss America, Williams has been under public scrutiny more than many past Miss Americas, but she has handled the pressure well during her reign.

Out of respect for her efforts, the pageant officials should reverse their request to oust Williams. With her term as Miss America almost over, the publicity surrounding the photo episode would die down as quickly if Williams retained her crown as if she would relinquish it.

Clearly, nude photos are more exploitative than the Miss America contest. But on a certain level, the pageant does exploit women through swimsuit competitions in which the contestants parade around in attire that does not leave much to the viewers' imagination.

What Williams did may not have fallen within the realm of proper decencies. But Williams' actions were a transgression during a period before she reached prominence as Miss America. She should not have to pay for that mistake now by giving up her crown.

Miss America pageant officials should show leniency toward Williams. As the old saying goes: "People in glass houses should not throw stones." Unless pageant officials see their event as completely nonexploitative, they should forgive a momentary past mistake.

Despite inadequacies, sorority rush continues

At the beginning everyone is all smiles, with oohs, ahs and "oh reallys," trailing much of the trite conversations, but when the visitors leave, things get dirty.

Toward the middle of August, nearly 300 females, each paying a $100 registration fee, will make their quarters at Haymaker Hall and begin the dubious process of becoming affiliated with one of the campus sororities.

WAYNE PRICE
Arts and Features Editor

It is a period of time which former sorority rush counselor and K-State graduate Jane Westhues said is "nerve wracking for both the rushee wanting to get in a house and the house members wanting to promote their house."

At the end, if a rushee is successful and chosen by a house, she becomes involved with what some sorority women think is the best thing since Baskin Robbins and the Pizza Hut buffet. The unlucky go home stunned, one step "behind" in college life before school starts, and later forced to resort to the, "I'm glad I didn't get in a house anyway" rationalization.

Is there a better way? It's hard to figure out. A lot of time and hard work goes into developing the rules, regulations and preparations of rush.

Young women arrive for rush week and receive a list of houses they are to visit the first night, and the second night the rest of the houses are visited. Eleven houses are visited. It's after these get-togethers that sororities have all-house meetings discussing each rushee's positive and negative aspects and deciding to whom to send invitations or "invites," as is the official unofficial terminology.

The partying goes on for the next few days, until the rushees' choices have voluntarily or involuntarily been narrowed down to a maximum of three and a minimum of one.

Sunday afternoon, after the final cookies and tea, women on both sides write down their preferences, or "prefs." Sunday night, to put it very indiscreetly, is when the sororities get out the Ginzu knife, dulled from a full week's work, and shape a part of their house for the next four years.

Monday, there are tears of happiness, tears of exhaustion and strings of profanities in some cases, as young women are turned on to a house or turned off by all houses. Luckily though, Westhues said, "it's very rare for a girl to make it to the last day and not get in a house — a lot more so than it used to be."

Though rules of gender didn't permit me to participate in rush, thank goodness, it seems that sorority rush is unfair to the prospective house and, especially, the rushee. The feeling that a person who hasn't gone through rush shouldn't voice his opinion on the subject is ignorant. A person doesn't have to be a doctor to know when someone is ill.

From the sororities' point of view they are being asked to find out a wealth of information in a very meager amount of time. Certain rules forbid talk about matters such as parent's income, religious matters and pros and cons of other houses.

One sorority member told me how one of the women in her house became upset at the whole choosing process, stood up and said "How can we cut this girl? I mean, what do we really know about her?" Everyone looked at her dumbfounded, but in agreement, and things continued as they were, with the thought of "Yeah, she's right, but what else can we do?" in the air. And the question hasn't changed.

For the rushees, it's too bad they receive their first real impression of K-State on the basis of what happens during sorority rush. Sure, the argument is, "Well the rushee looks at a house and can turn it down just as easily." But it isn't that easy for a girl who doesn't know anything about a house and is forced to meet as many active sorority members as she can to say the "right things," with knowledge that time is extremely limited.

K-State doesn't seem to emphasize the greek system over other living establishments the way a number of Big Eight schools do and that's good. But just as there are bad dentists, bad policemen and bad breath, there are people who like to make a lot more out of the greek system than need be. For the young woman not accepted into a house, it's a little like kicking 'em while they're down.

When the mass of rushees arrive at K-State in August, hopefully, there will be an understanding of the situation on both sides. Young women will be forced to turn into fast-talking buyers and sellers until someone comes up with a much-needed better plan — a plan that lets the rushees and actives get to know each other better and offers some alternative advice to the rejected ones that doesn't sound like, "Well, Son, you didn't make the basketball team, but we have a great wrestling program." And hopefully some young women will realize that there is life after Ralph Lauren.

Defeated Hart hopes he can go home again

WASHINGTON — Gary Hart, for whom the possible was impossible, sat in the forward section of his chartered aircraft as it flew to last week's convention in San Francisco. A greatly diminished press corp sat behind and scattered through the plane were some campaign aides — the last, the loyal, the few. Ahead of Hart lay his future, but behind him, unmanifested and not seen, were the ghosts of past presidential candidates whispering the most chilling words in American politics: "You can't go home anymore."

Birch Bayh was there. He had run for the presidency from the conservative Indiana. In 1974, he got 54 percent of the vote. In 1980, after his presidential campaign, he got 46 percent. He now lives in Washington.

George McGovern was there. He

RICHARD COHEN
Columnist

too ran for the presidency from a conservative state. In 1974, two years after his presidential effort, he managed to hold on to his seat. Six years later, though, he was defeated and he, too, now lives in Washington.

There have been others. Jerry Brown took a shot at the presidency from the California statehouse and then couldn't manage to win a Senate seat. The late Frank Church of Idaho went up town as chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and lost a re-election bid in 1980.

These and other Democrats went down to defeat in the Reagan landslide year of 1980 and that has to be taken into account. That same year, Hart survived a re-election challenge in Colorado — but barely. He got just 50 percent of the vote against a weak opponent, Mary Estill Buchanan — down from the 57 percent he got six years before. Colorado, too, can be a conservative state. Its other senator, William L. Armstrong is a reflection of that. To his right, there is, well, no one.

Some say that Hart's close call the last time out is one reason he ran for president. He knew there was no going back. Maybe. It's more likely, though, that he simply thought he could win, that this was his year — that he would be the generation spokesman that would capture and lost — lost both the Democratic nomination and now, maybe, the chance of continuing in the Senate.

On the plane, there was nothing about Hart to suggest pessimism or depression. He joked with his staff, lectured the press on its alleged shortcomings and during a refueling stop in Salina, Kan., raced a Secret Service agent down the landing strip in what must have been 100-degree heat. He was having, you would think, a whale of a time.

But things cannot look good. His campaign is three, maybe four, million dollars in debt. If he runs again for the Senate, he will have to raise an additional $2 million. The presidential campaign has left him exposed. We know of his so-called "spiritual adviser," an Indian woman who may or may not be close to him. He has flipped, he has flopped — moved, as all Democratic candidates must, a touch to the political left in an attempt to get the nomination.

Surely, somewhere in Colorado someone has pictures of Hart addressing a group of homosexuals. Surely, someone has made note of the positions he has taken. Surely, the words of Walter Mondale used against him will be echoed four years hence if Hart seeks to retain his Senate seat.

Politics is maybe America's last blood sport and the people who choose to play the game know the rules. It is one of the few endeavors left in life where you can really win and really lose — where there is no being kicked upstairs or given a lateral transfer. If you lose, it has to hurt.

Soon, Hart will fly off for a vacation. After that, he will resume his life and maybe run for re-election in Colorado. On the plane, his aides said he could do it. Unseen, the ghosts of past presidential candidates were whispering other-wise: You can't go home again.

Thatcher's son will 'have to wait'

LONDON — A Texas millionaire's daughter has broken off her romance with British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher's son Mark, London's News of the World reported Sunday.

"Anyone who is waiting for an engagement is going to have to wait a very long time," the racy tabloid quoted Karen Fortson, 24, as saying in what it called an exclusive report from Dallas, Texas.

Thatcher, 30, a onetime jockey and business consultant, left Britain last April to take a job with Anglo-American Automobiles, the U.S. subsidiary of a British car firm.

In May, Thatcher invited Fortson and her mother Kay, wife of Fort Worth ranching millionaire Ben Fortson, to lunch at the British leader's country residence, Chequers.

The Dallas Times Herald and London's Daily Star reported that Thatcher moved into a Dallas apartment this month.

"I know Mark's here — he's called me several times — but that's all. I don't even know where he is living," the News of the World quoted Fortson as saying.

Actress Bardot rescues mare, colt

NICE, France — French film star Brigitte Bardot, long an activist for the protection of animals, won a four-month battle Sunday to save a mare and her colt from slaughter for meat.

The struggle with officialdom ended when Agriculture Minister Michel Rocard notified the 49-year-old Bardot that "these two animals will not be slaughtered."

The effort by Bardot and the Society for the Protection of Animals came to light Saturday when Allain Bougrain-Dubourg, host of a television program on animals, and two others were arrested while trying to kidnap the mare and the colt from a slaughterhouse, at Bardot's request.

The society said the case began four months ago when a shipment of horses, including a pregnant mare, arrived at the slaughterhouse from Poland. The mare was spared until she foaled.

Bardot found a veterinarian prepared to buy the horses, but regulations forbid an animal to leave a slaughterhouse once it has entered.

Bardot said she was ready to go to the slaughterhouse herself today, when the horses were to be killed.

"Before killing the mare, they will have to kill me," she told a local television station.

Richie to close 1984 Olympics

LOS ANGELES — Singer-songwriter Lionel Richie will close the 1984 Olympic Games with a version of his hit "All Night Long," rewritten specially for the Olympics, says producer David Wolper.

"Lionel and the song fit perfectly into the concept I had for the last part of the closing ceremony," Wolper, producer of the gala Coliseum finale Aug. 12, said Saturday.

"I had been considering using a number of major stars, but after seeing Lionel do 'All Night Long,' I knew this was what I wanted," Wolper said.

Members of the K-State Crew and the Wichita Rowing Association from Wichita State University row their eight-oar boats back to the starting line following the 2,000-meter race Saturday. The K-State Crew won the race with a time of 7 minutes, 24 seconds.

K-State eight-oar team wins in regatta

By GARY NELSON
Collegian Reporter

K-State's Crew team competed against the Wichita Rowing Association of Wichita State University Saturday on Tuttle Creek Lake, with the teams splitting race wins.

The K-State eight-oar varsity team won the 2,000-meter event with a time of 7 minutes, 24 seconds. Wichita claimed second place, with a time of 7:47, and K-State's novice team placed third at 8:22.

Crew coach Don Rose, said he was pleased with the race even though there were some small equipment problems with one of the boats.

"One of the seats in a boat came off the track which threw them off the rhythm," Rose said.

Rose said that in the eight-oar event K-State's varsity team "led it from start to finish."

"Bill Heimke, the stroke (position in boat) of our crew, did an excellent job in his first race as our stroke," Rose said. "The Wichita crew stayed with us all the way down the course and he (Heimke) did not become rattled."

Wichita rebounded to claim first in the four-oar event, rowing a distance of 1,800 meters, with their "A" boat turning in a time of 7:02. Wichita's "B" boat took second place with a 7:18 time, while K-State's varsity four-oar team came in third with a time of 7:34.

Rose said Saturday's race was the first regular eight-oar race that the crew has participated in since the beginning of May.

"We haven't been training in the four-oar event so I think we did well in it considering this fact," Rose said. "I feel that this has been one of our more successful summer rowing seasons. We've had a much larger turnout than usual."

The K-State Crew is set to race again tonight at Tuttle Creek, with competition slated for 7 against the Topeka Rowing Association in a one-race regatta with their varsity eight and novice teams.

The K-State Crew is also sponsoring a picnic at the event for K-State and Manhattan area residents.

"We're looking for support," Rose said. "We want people to come on out and have a good time."

The picnic and race starting line is to be on the east shore, south of the Spillway Marina. The race will be starting from the north and running to a south finish line.

"The best place to watch will be at the spillway parking area," Rose said. "This is where the finish line is."

"This will be the windup of the summer," Rose said. "I hope people will come on out and have fun."

K-State cage program names Willis as coach

By VIKKI WATSON
Staff Writer

Matilda Willis, former head women's basketball coach at the University of Arkansas, has accepted the head women's basketball position at K-State.

Willis, who led the Razorbacks to a 67-27 record in three years as head coach, replaces former Lady Cat coach Lynn Hickey, who resigned her position to accept the duties of head women's basketball coach and assistant athletic director of women's athletics at Texas A&M University.

Arkansas ended the 1983-84 season with a 20-9 record, finishing third in the Southwest Conference behind the University of Texas and Texas Tech University. The Razorbacks have finished each season of Willis's three-year reign with 20 or more wins, including a 1982 appearance in the AIAW national tournament.

"The fact that they (the Lady Cats) were in the Top 20, competed in post-season play and were conference champions all attracted me to K-State," said Willis, whose former Arkansas squad will return all but one starter. "Arkansas had not been in the Top 20 yet and had often been overlooked for post-season play."

The Lady Cats — co-champions of the Big Eight Conference, champions of the Big Eight Post-Season Tournament and also ranked as high as sixth in the nation — are expected to be without the services of senior center Angie Bonner, junior forward Tina Dixon and junior guard Sheronda Jenkins, who all quit the squad earlier this spring for personal reasons. Bonner, a second-team, all-Big Eight selection and K-State's leading scorer and rebounder, was the only senior on the squad. Willis is expected to contact both Bonner and Dixon about possibly returning to the squad.

Although Willis plans to bring more structure and a more controlled tempo to the Lady Cat program, she foresees little change in the overall K-State game plan for 1984-85.

"There's probably not going to be a big difference in the program," Willis said. "I believe in controlling the tempo and keeping the other team off balance. It won't be total run up and down the floor but it basically will not be a whole lot different from last year."

Willis has asked both assistant Lady Cat coach Sally Anthony and assistant coach Eileen Feeney to remain at K-State, although Feeney accepted the assistant coaching position at A&M Friday morning.

"I'm real excited to get started (at A&M)," Feeney said. "It's been a difficult decision because it's extremely hard to leave because of the players. But Coach Hickey and I work well together and I feel very comfortable in that atmosphere. I think it's a good combination."

Slaught's batting leads Kansas City to 3rd victory over Baltimore, 8-4

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Don Slaught may be the only American League hitter who consistently fattens his batting average against the Baltimore Orioles.

Slaught, who has been struggling all year, turned in his second four-hit game in three days against the Orioles Sunday to lead the Kansas City Royals to an 8-4 victory over Baltimore.

Slaught reached base 12 times in 16 plate appearances as the Royals took three out of four games from the Orioles over the weekend. For the year, Slaught is hitting .257 against the league and .457 against the Orioles.

"Things like that happen. You can't explain it," said Royals Manager Dick Howser. "The Orioles probably have the best five-man rotation in the league. But one thing is the fact that Slaught is starting to hit the ball well and we've been playing Baltimore. When he's swinging the bat well, he can hit anybody."

"I just wish I knew why Slaught decided to get hot against us," said Baltimore Manager Joe Altobelli.

"He's a good contact hitter. I don't think we'll be the only team he beats up on."

Slaught traces his current hot streak to a series at Oakland just prior to the All-Star break.

"You wait for it to happen and then when it does you say, 'Oh, boy, let's keep it going,'" he said of his hot streak. "I've always felt good hitting against Baltimore. They have a few left-handers and it always seems to come together for me against them."

Greg Pryor and Darryl Motley sparked the Royals by stroking two-run singles in Kansas City's five-run fifth inning.

Slaught singled amid the five-run outburst that buried Scott McGregor, 12-8, and handed the victory to Larry Gura, 10-7. Slaught's four hits were a double, triple and two singles.

The Royals were holding a 3-1 lead in the fifth when Steve Balboni drew a two-out walk. Slaught put Balboni at third with a single, then Pat Sheridan walked to load the bases for Pryor.

Sheridan went to third on Pryor's two-run hit and scored on Onix Concepcion's single to give the Royals a 6-1 advantage. Reliever Bill Swagerty then walked Willie Wilson to load the bases ahead of Motley's two-run single.

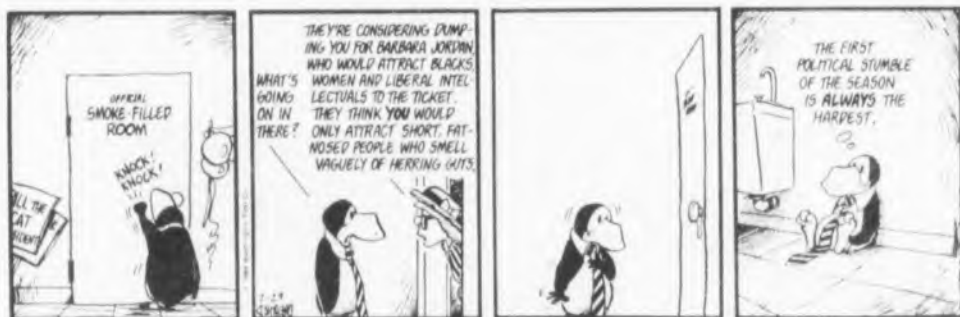

The Royals grabbed a 2-0 lead as Wilson and Motley singled leading off the game, executed a double steal, and scored on Hal McRae's sacrifice fly and Balboni's single.

Slaught tripled over the head of right-fielder Mike Young leading off the fourth and scored to give the Royals a 3-1 lead when first baseman Eddie Murray bobbled Pat Sheridan's grounder.

Rick Dempsey tagged Gura with his third home run in the third inning. In the seventh, Benny Ayala whacked his second homer and Todd Cruz his third. Young added his sixth off Dan Quisenberry in the ninth.

Meeting stresses African food urgency

By The Associated Press

HARARE, Zimbabwe — A U.N.-sponsored conference here on the food needs of Africa — "the hungriest continent" — is urging African nations themselves to spend more on agriculture or face mass starvation.

In the past, man-made tragedies such as war or the world recession or natural disasters such as droughts and floods, were blamed for food shortages and foreign governments were urged to donate aid.

These factors were not being minimized at the 13th biennial regional conference for Africa of the U.N. Food and Agriculture Organization.

But the emphasis at the conference apparently has shifted to the need for African governments to play a greater role in resolving their food crisis.

The U.N. group this year named Africa, with 500 million inhabitants, the world's "hungriest continent," replacing Asia. Director-General Edouard Saouma has warned of a "catastrophe" unless urgent steps are taken.

"Africa is our No. 1 priority," said Saouma. He said 45 percent of his agency's two-year budget of $360 million is earmarked for Africa this year compared to 5 percent in the 1970s.

He said that the basic problem is that African nations cannot feed their growing populations.

Studies presented at the conference say Africa's food output dropped by 10 percent over the past decade, while the population grew by about 3 percent annually. During the same period, Africa's food imports doubled and the cost of food increased five times over.

"At the root of the food problem is the fact that...states have not usually accorded the necessary priority to agriculture," says one U.N. study from the mountain of reports presented to the conference.

The reports showed that African national budgets concentrated instead on defense, education and health, and that official corruption pads the pockets of the rich at the expense of the poor.

U.N. experts say the key to self-sufficiency is a promise of higher prices for growers, something few governments have been willing to do lest resultant inflation leads to social upheaval.

Several African governments have been toppled in coups over food price hikes.

The experts identified a welter of factors contributing to food shortages.

Rapid urbanization has switched eating habits away from cheap, readily available food like millet, cassava and sorghum to rice and bread made from expensively imported wheat, according to the reports.

Run-down transport systems often mean produce rots before getting to markets.

Foreign exchange shortages rob farmers of fertilizers, insecticides and pesticides, the studies said.

Zimbabwe Prime Minister Robert Mugabe today will formally open a full session of the so-called "food summit," which ends Wednesday. Most of Africa's agriculture ministers are expected to attend.

Thailand activists try to halt dam building

By The Associated Press

BANGKOK, Thailand — It has been called a "crime against humanity" and a great boon to Thailand and its farmers.

The Nam Choan Dam, proposed for construction in one of Southeast Asia's last primeval forests, has become the prime battleground for groups angered at the destruction of Thailand's environment.

The outcry began in 1982 when the government's Electric Generating Authority of Thailand (EGAT) unveiled plans to build the dam in the middle of an 800,000-acre forest along the Thai-Burmese border.

EGAT said Nam Choan was badly needed for energy-short Thailand and argued that only 34,800 acres would be stripped, most of them in a steep river channel.

The environmentalists countered that access roads to the dam would attract illegal loggers and animal poachers as had happened in other once-inaccessible areas where large dams had been constructed.

Threatened, they said, would be large populations of elephant, tiger, bear, barking deer, sambar and other wild animals. The government's fine arts department also protested that the dam's reservoir would inundate ancient sites where cave paintings and various artifacts had been discovered.

The environmentalists, once a silent and small minority, appealed directly to the prime minister. Fourteen people shaved their heads and entered the Buddhist monkhood in protest while others invoked the aid of the protective spirit of the forest.

Sections of the press joined the anti-dam campaign which has become perhaps the biggest — and still unresolved — environmental issue in Thailand's history.

The government postponed a decision in October 1982 and appointed a panel which began a drawn-out inquiry on the project.

"How can a few people with bulldozers tear up what belongs to future generations. In terms of cost benefit the dam is unjustifiable," Sir Author Noonan, the chairman of Britain's World Wildlife Fund, said earlier this year while visiting Thailand.

He described the project as "a crime against humanity," seconding earlier criticism by Prince Phillip, husband of Queen Elizabeth and president of the WWF.

In recent weeks the battle lines have re-formed with a parliamentary lobby mounting a strong push. EGAT hopes that the dam, located in Kanchanaburi province west of Bangkok, will now be approved for construction.

"We have to choose between animals and human beings," EGAT spokesman Somvonk Poshyananda said. "It's fine to criticize, but what's the alternative? We have limited resources and a growing population. We can't simply keep all the environment intact."

Somvonk, who heads EGAT's public communications department, said the environmental impact of the $547 million project has been carefully assessed and that the $16 million has been set aside to protect the forest, among other things.

In 1983, Thailand drew nearly 10 percent of its energy consumption from lignite, 29 percent from natural gas, 21 percent from water power and 35.6 percent from imported oil. Although Nam Choan would increase Thailand's total hydroelectric output by only 1.7 percent, Somvonk said, the annual savings would amount to about $65 million.

The World Bank, which would probably finance much of the dam's construction, described Nam Choan as "a highly desirable investment."

"Is it worth the destruction and risks for only a 2 percent increase?" asked Dr. Suraphol Sudara, a professor at Bangkok's Chulalongkorn University and a key environmental leader. He noted that four dams in Kanchanaburi province have already wiped out hundreds of square miles of forest.

"In the textbooks they say only good things about building big dams, not the negatives," Suraphol said. He emphasized that Indonesia, Malaysia, India and other developing countries are now having second thoughts about major dam projects and seeking alternative, less destructive energy sources.

Environmentalists also argue that approving Nam Choan would set a dangerous precedent, since the government earlier had declared the endangered forest a national reserve.

"The debate over Nam Choan has made the public aware of the mistakes made in the past. People are realizing environmental groups want to help the nation as a whole, not their own self-interests," Suraphol said.

Thailand is often cited as a classic example of environmental destruction among rapidly developing nations. In less than a generation, legal and illegal logging has reduced forest cover from some 70 percent of the country's total area to the current 18 to 20 percent. Wild animals have been slaughtered, and pollution of waters has increased alarmingly.

EGAT's Somvonk said that not even the great Kanchanaburi forest is virgin any more.

Mothers to bring comatose girls home

By The Associated Press

BALTIMORE — Two mothers are converting living rooms into bedrooms for this week's return home of their two comatose daughters, five months after the neighborhood friends nearly drowned in an icy stream.

Rachel Kirtscher, 9, and Danielle Casper, 8, stand little chance of recovering in "any substantial fashion," according to their doctor. But their mothers say they hope a home environment will do what medicine hasn't.

"I didn't bring my daughter into this world to have her lying in a hospital," Joan Kirtscher, Rachel's mother, said last week as she cleaned the floors and walls of the room that will be her daughter's new bedroom. "I love my child too much to do that."

"I keep hoping and praying for a miracle. You've got to," she said in an interview at her two-story brick home in northeastern Baltimore.

Rachel and Danielle suffered extensive brain damage when they plunged through the ice of a stream near their homes Feb. 8. Now both are in good enough condition to leave the Johns Hopkins Children's Center, said Dr. John Freeman, director of pediatric neurology.

Rachel is scheduled to go home today and Danielle Thursday; both will require round-the-clock care which the hospital has been teaching their mothers to provide.

With Rachel back home, "I feel we'll be more like a family again," said Kirtscher. "It's been like a terrible nightmare...I just can't believe it all happened."

Danielle has shown no response to her environment, Freeman said. Rachel, on the other hand, is able to follow motions with her eyes and has some movement in her left arm.

But it is "very unlikely that either Danielle or Rachel will recover in any substantial fashion to be independent, functioning individuals," said Freeman.

Book examines nuclear war effects

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A special 25-minute film readied for nationwide broadcast in case there is an imminent threat of atomic war would caution Americans that "the greatest danger is hopelessness, the fear that nuclear attack would mean the end of our world."

If such an attack actually took place, radio messages already recorded by the government would urge survivors to try to contact their families and employers by filling out "Safety Notification" and "Emergency Change of Address" cards at post offices still in operation.

These are among contingency plans presented in painstaking detail in a new book, "The Day After World War III," that has focused fresh attention on civil defense programs of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Author Edward Zuckerman, who spent nearly three years researching and writing the book, said he doesn't agree with critics who contend that all civil defense efforts would prove useless.

FEMA's plans for evacuation of cities and other emergency measures, he said, "would definitely save some lives in a nuclear war. Maybe not a lot. We don't know."

However, Zuckerman said in an interview, "you have to look at the role civil defense planning plays in the arms race." With civil defense capabilities viewed as an element of the U.S.-Soviet strategic balance, the issue "becomes one more bargaining chip on the table in the confrontation between the two nations."

"The Russians can look at our planning, and even if our planning isn't going to work, they can justifiably — or with some reason, at least — be scared by it. Just as we look at Russian civil defense and are scared by it," Zuckerman said.

The Soviet Union has a large-scale civil defense program, including an extensive system of blast shelters for the country's leadership as well as workers at key plants. According to a report issued by FEMA last year, the Soviet program involves more than 100,000 full-time personnel at an estimated cost of about $3 billion annually.

By contrast, the U.S. agency's budget — including funds primarily intended for dealing with hurricanes, floods, earthquakes and other natural disasters — totals $169 million for the current fiscal year, although Congress has approved an increase to $181 million in fiscal 1985. Those figures are considerably below the $252 million spending level the Reagan administration had requested for both years.

James L. Holton, FEMA's director of public affairs, called Zucker-man's account the "most comprehensive" of several recent books dealing with nuclear war and civil defense.

He said criticism of U.S. civil defense programs now has become "somewhat muted," compared with the situation two years ago when the nuclear freeze movement was gaining momentum. City councils and town meetings in many areas of the country adopted resolutions flatly rejecting FEMA-formulated evacuation plans.

"We took a lot of lumps," Holton said, while the agency was "looking for a way to redesign this system that would make it more palatable for the public."

Part of that effort has involved spelling out at Capitol Hill hearings the role of civil defense, particularly evacuation planning, in coping with natural disasters, chemical spills and nuclear power plant accidents.

Holton said FEMA is preparing a series of substantially rewritten civil defense booklets and other publications to replace Cold War-vintage literature that was "rather naive."

For example, Holton said, FEMA has stopped making specific predictions how many Americans would be able to survive a nuclear attack under various scenarios for warning time and evacuation.

Previously, civil defense officials had claimed that a well-planned and

Mondale receives nomination as expected

By The Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — Walter F. Mondale, the insider who outlasted the field, swept to the Democratic presidential nomination Wednesday night. "It wasn't easy," he said in advance of his first-ballot victory. "I paid my dues."

Mondale, embodiment of the Democratic establishment, watched on television from his suite in the nearby Meridien Hotel as his 2,100-plus cheering delegates sealed his triumph at 10:10 p.m. PDT — well after prime time in the East.

His most persistent challenger, Gary Hart, was in the convention hall and his campaign manager said the Colorado senator hoped to move for Mondale's nomination by acclamation. Hart was second, and the Rev. Jackson third.

Shouts of "We Want Fritz" floated up from the convention floor as the victory was clinched. New Jersey put him over the top in the roll call of states.

Mondale's triumph came after vanquished rival Gary Hart toasted his grit and perseverance and vowed to "devote every waking hour and every ounce of energy to the defeat of Ronald Reagan."

As the roll call of the states was read, Mondale was joined by his family, running mate Geraldine Ferraro and her family, and a small group of reporters.

Mondale hugged his wife, Joan, and held up a newspaper that headlined his victory as New Jersey read its votes. It was appropriate, because New Jersey was the state where Mondale's lopsided win on June 5 gave him the momentum for nomination.

Mondale immediately headed for Moscone convention center.

"Michigan proudly, proudly casts 96 votes for the man who helped save Chrysler jobs, for the next president of the United States," was one numerical salute en route to the Mondale majority.

Delegates hoisted blue Mondale placards to punctuate his victory.

Thus ended the grueling Democratic presidential campaign. And thus began Mondale's next campaign, the fall battle against the Republican in the White House.

In that, his partner will be Ferraro, the congresswoman from New York who will be installed on the ticket on Thursday night. Mondale and Ferraro both accept their nominations then, the final night of the party's convention.

Mondale — a Minnesota protégé of Hubert Humphrey and former vice president to Jimmy Carter — ate a cheeseburger for lunch, another for dinner on the day he called a day of "fulfillment."

Hart spoke to the convention shortly before the convention snuffed out his long, persistent challenge for the nomination. He described Ferraro as a "true political pioneer," and urged that the convention approve her nomination "by acclamation."

In his address, Hart issued an undisguised warning to Mondale, who now begins his campaign against Reagan and needs the votes of independent-minded Hart supporters to win. "Promises are cheap, rhetoric is hollow and nostalgia is not a program," he said. "Our party's greatest heritage is its willingness to change. We have failed when we became cautious and complacent. We have won America's confidence when we were bold and innovative."

Right to the convention week, Hart dreamed the delegates would turn to him. But by his speech he bestowed on Mondale the gift of unity.

He toasted the winner — "my friend and colleague" — saying, "you have honored me by being an opponent of unsurpassing grit."

Jackson offered his "proud support" of the ticket in a convention speech of his own Tuesday night. Even as nomination hour, he picked up 36 Illinois delegates who had been committed to Chicago Mayor Harold Washington.

Hart chose the last moment before the roll call to speak. In his prepared remarks, he neither asked delegates directly for their vote nor conceding his imminent defeat.

He said of Mondale: "you have honored me by being an opponent of an unsurpassed grit, perseverance and determination," and he paid tribute to Geraldine Ferraro as: "a true political pioneer. I only regret that I did not pick you first."

Earlier Wednesday, Mondale worked to shore up his campaign promised to appoint a black as campaign co-chairman, a title to be shared with Rep. Barbara Mikulski of Maryland and Duane Garrett of California.

Ferraro made the rounds of caucuses, telling the Ohio delegation that her selection as vice presidential candidate would mark "an opportunity for all of us — blacks, Hispanics, Asian Americans and women — people who have felt left out of the system."

Her nomination, and her only convention appearance, comes Thursday night before Mondale's acceptance speech.

Camp provides outlet for cheerleaders' spirit

By STEVE SWAFFORD
Staff Writer

Cheerleaders and pompon squads from three states are attending the camp sponsored by the National Cheerleading Association this week at K-State.

Larry Pankratz, director of community activities programs for the Division of Continuing Education, said last year there were 800 participants and this year there are 600. He said of the 600 campers, 400 are here for the cheerleading camp and 200 are here for the drill team and pompon camp.

"It (the camp) goes from morning till evening and they (participants) are just set off; I mean, they are just wired," Pankratz said.

Pankratz said the cheerleaders get excited about almost anything.

"They (NCA) introduced me and they went crazy. They say this is the land of the Wildcats and yell some more. They are all cheerleaders and it's natural for them to do that," he said.

Pankratz said the girls at the camp this week learn how to get crowds motivated, how to handle the crowds when they get upset with the officiating and basic crowd control.

The squads are taught new routines, drills and stunts to take back to their schools, Pankratz added.

Sponsors are urged to come to the camp with their campers at a reduced cost. Pankratz said it helps to have the sponsors there to assist throughout the camp activities.

The campers have classes in the morning and break off into their own groups in the afternoon to learn routines. Pankratz said all the work during the week leads to Friday's competition.

"On Friday morning each team will get up and do their thing (routine) and they (NCA representatives) give out trophies and spirit sticks to the top teams," Pankratz said.

With the size of the camp, it is important to keep the program organized.

"I'll be trying to keep things together at one end while Elaine (Brady) tries keeping things together at the other end. It's interesting and certainly not boring. There is always something happening," Beth Robinson, co-director, said.

Elaine Brady, camp director who has been on the NCA staff for 20 years, said she went to Wichita State University and was a tumbler and gymnast. She got involved with NCA when she went to a camp at the University of Oklahoma. Kansas had no NCA clinics at that time. She was asked to join the NCA staff in 1957.

Brady has conducted spirit clinics throughout the United States. The physical education major is on the Governor's Fitness Council and teaches aerobic dancing.

"They had no NCA camps in our area (Kansas) so I was asked to start the first NCA camp in Kansas which was at Rock Springs Ranch 4-H camp 20 years ago in 1964," Brady said.

Brady said NCA boasts 12 pompon, cheerleading, drill team and flag team camps in Kansas. The five schools where the camps are held are Avila College in Kansas City, Mo., Emporia State University, K-State, the University of Kansas and WSU. The largest camp is at K-State.

Brady said NCA teaches various areas the individual will have to deal with as a cheerleader.

"Cheerleading involves cheerleading techniques, crowd psychology, leadership, gymnastics, tumbling, pyramids, partner stunts and how to get the best out of your crowd," she said.

The material taught at K-State is basically the same material that is taught all across the country, Brady added.

"We have a little bit of West Coast, East Coast, Midwest, Southern — you know. We've taken the best (routines) of each part of the country," she said.

Man kills, injures McDonald's patrons

By The Associated Press

SAN YSIDRO, Calif. — A heavily armed man opened fire in a McDonald's restaurant Wednesday, killing at least 20 people and wounding 17 others before he was slain by a police sharpshooter, authorities said.

The 90-minute rampage was believed to be the worst single-day slaughter by one man in U.S. history.

"It was an absolute massacre," said San Diego Police Cmdr. Larry K. Gore. "It is a total disaster inside the facility."

The gunman, identified by police as James Oliver Huberty, 41, of San Diego, was killed by a single shot from a police SWAT team marksman who was on the roof of an adjacent post office, Gore said.

Twenty-one people, including Huberty, were dead and 17 were injured in a scene that police described as "a slaughterhouse." Four of the injured were in critical condition.

No motive for the shootings was known.

The attack began about 4 p.m. at the restaurant, located about one mile north of the Mexican border in this southern San Diego County community, which is part of the city of San Diego.

"He came in and just said, 'Freeze...,' and then he just started shooting," said one teenager who gave his name only as Frank as police took him away.

"It was terrible. One woman got shot here," the youth said, putting his hand to his right temple.

The man, armed with an automatic rifle, a shotgun and a handgun, was holed up inside the McDonald's for 1½ hours, and "was shooting everything that was in sight, including a victim on the freeway, several people outside the restaurant, 10 or 11 inside the facility," Gore said.

"It's the worst massacre in the city's history," Gore said. "I'm told that he came into the restaurant carrying rifles and just began shooting — everything he could shoot. It's just a tragic, tragic scene here."

At least six people were shot outside the restaurant, said police Officer John Slough.

"There are two kids who just rode up outside and they were killed instantly," said police officer Bill Nelson.

"There was a man and a woman walking up to the door, and they were offed just like that," he said, snapping his fingers.

All the windows in the restaurant were shot out. Emergency workers removed several bodies from inside, and survivors were taken to a nearby building for emergency treatment.

"It was terrible," said one of the survivors, a McDonald's employee.

University to hike fees

By STEVE ONKEN
Collegian Reporter

The student incidental fee will increase approximately 10 percent, effective the 1984 fall semester, with the total tuition for undergraduate resident students rising to $590.50 compared to tuition of $550.50 paid in 1983.

The incidental fee is used to pay the general education costs of attending the University, said Ralph Perry, comptroller. He said that years ago the Kansas Board of Regents voted in favor of the incidental fee covering approximately 20 percent to 25 percent of the general education costs.

"I hate to see it, but as costs increase, so will the fees. At one time, we would have to raise the fees once every two or three years. But lately, we have had to raise the incidental fee every year," Perry said.

The incidental fee has increased approximately 10 percent per semester for undergraduates and veterinary medicine students. This results in a $40 increase for Kansas residents and a $90 increase for nonresident undergraduates, and a $60 increase for resident and a $160 increase for nonresident veterinary medicine students.

The per-credit-hour incidental fee, for students enrolled in six or fewer credit hours and summer school sessions, has increased $3 from the previous year for residents and $6 for nonresident undergraduates. For veterinary medicine students, the fee has increased $4 for residents and $11 for non-residents.

A separate incidental fee has been established for graduate students which results in an increase of approximately 20 percent. The increase is $80 for residents and $215 for non-residents.

Also, the continuing education fees will increase $9 per graduate hour and $3 per undergraduate and no-credit hour.

Three new fees will be required of foreign students, education majors and students who study abroad.

A new $25 application fee for admission of foreign students to undergraduate and graduate programs will begin this fall. Perry said the fee "grew out due to the larger amount of administrative expense" with the foreign student programs. He said the administration must do much more work in these cases and do more investigative-type work when enrolling students from other countries.

Also, a $27 fee will be added to each person in the College of Education taking the Pre-Professional Skills Test, Teacher Education Program.

An additional fee of $12.50 per semester will be added for each student enrolled in a study-abroad program not taught or conducted by K-State faculty. Perry said the reason for this increase is that many students do study abroad, but must transfer their credits here, providing the added expense.

Perry said there are three major thrusts of educational funding in the University. The first covers the instructional cost; the second covers research costs; and third is the public service costs, such as continuing education costs.

But Perry said students are only paying for the instructional or incidental fee, unless they are involved with one or both of the two remaining educational costs.

K-State Police make plans to close streets on campus

K-State Police will close the streets south and east of Anderson Hall to all traffic Tuesday afternoon.

At approximately 2 p.m., "we will be moving a crane along the east side of Anderson (on Mid-Campus Drive), in order to paint the bell tower," said Art Stone, K-State Police chief.

The crane will then be moved to the south side of the building. At that time, Vattier Street south of Anderson will be closed.

The streets should be reopened sometime Wednesday evening, Stone said.

Also on Tuesday, a project to reshingle the roof of Calvin Hall will begin. The project is expected to be completed by Aug. 30.

"Pedestrian traffic will be limited in this area, and the circle drive in front of Calvin Hall will be closed," said Stoner.

There will be no parking along Mid-Campus Drive in front of Calvin and north to Kedzie Hall while the roof is being reshingled.

Jackson statements should not be forgotten

The power of the spoken word is perhaps one of man's most potent weapons. Tuesday night a master of oration stood before a largely doubting crowd, as well as a national television audience, and gave one of the most powerful speeches in recent memory.

The Rev. Jesse Jackson, bringing back images of his mentor, the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr., spoke to the Democratic National Convention as the first viable black presidential candidate in history. Although not the first black candidate — Congresswoman Shirley Chisholm garnered 152 delegate votes during the 1972 Democratic Convention — Jackson is the first to truly challenge for his party's nomination.

His words had great impact; his speech inspired the convention crowd. He spoke of unity and of assimilating minorities into the political process, each important points his candidacy has raised over the course of the campaign. Yet Jackson also stood before an audience of millions and asked for something else — forgiveness.

He asked for forgiveness for causing discomfort, creating pain and reviving fears of the voters. Jackson's candidacy has been a volatile one — raising questions against the injustices of racism, in politics and in the world in general. Yet along the course of his campaign, Jackson also, unfortunately, raised the specter of racism through his own words and actions.

His remarks against Jewish people brought a shadow over a "Rainbow Coalition" that sought to encompass all the races into a viable, strong political force. Jackson sought to bring together the "voiceless" in the political process through his candidacy, to speak for the poor and downtrodden he considers his constituency. This is a creditable goal — one that should be addressed and should be carried out — but in his effort to unite the downtrodden he has alienated a race with a history of oppression as dark as any in history. His references to Jews as "hymies" and to New York City as "hymietown" brought, incomprehensibly, the ugly words of racism into a campaign of a man who has supposedly embraced religious thought as a minister.

In the shadow during much of Jackson's campaign stood Louis Farrakhan, leader of the Nation of Islam, a black Muslim sect, who has made anti-Semitic remarks, praised Hitler and threatened the life of a reporter covering his actions. Jackson's failure to disavow Farrakhan until the final weeks of his campaign showed a dark side to a campaign of hope. Although stating his opposition to racism, Jackson's alliance with Farrakhan brought questions of his opposition to hatred of all races, including Jews.

Jackson's campaign has been largely one of success. He has established the black voice into the Democratic party and has formed a viable political coalition. Yet, he asked Tuesday for forgiveness, calling his anti-Semitic transgressions "not his finest self."

Perhaps this is true. In a moment of candor Jackson may have revealed a side of himself he did not wish to reveal. His plea for forgiveness was a brilliant political stroke — calming the fears of many Jackson doubters and raising the hopes of his supporters. Through his powerful words he, no doubt, won the forgiveness of many for his racist actions.

Forgiving Jackson for his anti-Semitic transgression is possible for some observers, but those who grant him his wish for tolerance still should not forget the racist words of a man who aspires to become a leader in American politics.

Speech by Jackson creates a historic moment

It was a time to hope and a time to cry. It was a time of coming together and a time to celebrate diversity. It was a time to look forward and a time to remember. It was a time to forgive and a time to ask for forgiveness. And most of all, for Jesse Jackson, it was a time to shine.

After watching Jackson's spell-binding performance at the Democratic convention, I knew exactly why Jackson had decided to run for president when the odds of winning were so long. He had a message to deliver to the American public. That is why he went to Lebanon, Cuba and Nicaragua. That is why he continued to run, when his hopes of victory disappeared. He had a message.

Indeed, the first black candidate to address a national convention brought something to the Democratic Party which no one thought possible — excitement, unity and enthusiasm. But he was not speaking simply to the Democrats, he was talking to the nation — a nation which sought to guide to a "more humane, just course." He was not just talking to the Democrats when he said, we must "forgive each other, redeem each other, regroup, and move on." That was a suggestion for the whole country as well.

But for the most part, Jackson's speech was a request for respect — a plea to open the lines of communication to the outer reaches of political and social realm. As Jackson commented in a post-speech interview, he wishes to be "no longer a reactor (to political decisions), but a participant." Perhaps the time has now come for white Americans to look at blacks as politicians, instead of looking at their race, just as we began to look at blacks' athletic abilities instead of their color.

Just as another Jesse, Jesse Owens, helped to break barriers and open doors for future black athletes, perhaps Jesse Jackson will achieve similar results for future politicians. Through his Rainbow Coalition, minorities of all colors may soon be able to broadly participate in all levels of politics and government.

Jackson's speech also pointed out another exciting potential trend in politics. In the recent past, the poor, the disadvantaged and the discriminated against were uncertain about their approach to the political world. One road available was the road of apathy and indifference; the other was the road of political violence. The horrors of the Miami race riots and the emergence of low voter turnouts among minorities indicated that minority groups were unsure if they could, or even should, enter the political maelstrom of compromise and competition that is the American system.

Now, perhaps, these disenfranchised groups may have learned of another potential option. Thanks to Jackson's efforts in 1984, they may realize that compromise, politically, does not translate into compromise, ethically. The nature of American politics, with its incremental changes, dictates that "locked out" groups such as the Rainbow Coalition should strive for everything, and settle for what they can get. Compromise does not mean defeat, it means a step in the right direction.

If disadvantaged groups follow Jackson's lead, and if our present political leadership heeds his message, these historically ignored individuals may, at last, enter American politics with legitimacy, respect and hope.

And more importantly, such groups may realize that, in the words of Jackson, "the boycott of politics is the politics of despair." This was one of Jackson's messages — that although the Rainbow Coalition didn't win the nomination, they did "raise the right questions."

In his passionate speech, he questioned the justice of a primary system that results in the unfair allocation of delegates under the "dual" primary system. He questioned the wisdom of our foreign policy, urging us to "think it out, not fight it out." And finally, he questioned humanity of a supposed economic recovery that took from the poor to give to the rich. He, without question, raised the right questions, and I couldn't have agreed more when he said, "I would rather have a Roosevelt in a wheelchair, than a Reagan on a horse."

And another unusual thing happened that Tuesday evening — a politician apologized in public for his mistakes. For his "low moments," he asked for forgiveness and a second chance. His mistakes, he said, should be charged to his head, not his heart. As an imperfect public servant, he asked us to have patience and to give him time to develop.

But in post-speech interviews, many Jewish leaders remained skeptical. Time will tell if he was sincere, they cautiously warned. But where was Walter Mondale's apology to Charles Mannette, for his untimely dismissal? Where was James Watt's apology to the Indians for calling them "socialists"? Where is Ronald Reagan's apology to Jimmy Carter for "borrowing" Carter's briefing book? I'm afraid this time, the proverbial ball is in the Jewish court. It's time to regroup and move on to higher ground.

In reflecting back on his speech last night, I can remember feeling that I was witnessing a part of history. I had the same feeling when I saw Nixon resign. Jackson's speech, with its intensity and clearness of purpose, culminated in a level of excitement that may not be reached again. To the blacks, he gave a sense of pride; to the middle class, an appeal to their sense of conscience. To the public, as a whole, he created a historical moment.

This "healer" truly created his rainbow Tuesday night. Somewhere beyond this rainbow, lies dreams of unity, justice, and hope — in essence, the political and social "pot-of-gold." Gov. Robert Graham of Florida commented at the end of this oration that "American politics will never be the same again." Maybe, he's right.

Hospital initiates program featuring 'day-stay' format

Memorial Hospital will introduce its new DayStay Surgical Unit from 1 to 4 p.m. Sunday.

The unit consists of patient dressing rooms, a lounge and a nursing station. There are no beds, only reclining chairs. The unit can accommodate four patients at a time.

"Certain types of surgery are mandated by third parties (insurance companies) to be done on a day-stay basis," said Ann Ranz, chief executive officer of the hospital.

The DayStay unit will accommodate minor orthopedic procedures, hernia surgeries, tonsillectomies and other minor surgery.

"This unit is basically for the well patient," Ranz said. "It will supplement the doctor's office by taking the patient who is a little greater risk than the doctor likes to handle in his office."

A patient in the unit will be under constant supervision by a nursing staff. This, combined with the emergency facilities of the hospital, lessens the risk involved in minor surgery.

"The patients will be screened by their doctor and must be of high enough health standards to be admitted to this unit," Ranz said. Any patient with complications will be admitted to the hospital for his surgery.

According to Ranz, the patient will arrive at the hospital about two hours prior to surgery and will check into the unit. The patient will change into a hospital gown and wait in the lounge prior to surgery. The surgery will be performed in the hospital's regular operating rooms on the same floor as the DayStay unit.

Following the surgery, the patient will remain in the unit for two to four hours until the anesthetic wears off. Then the patient will go home.

The unit will also provide a cost-efficient way to handle minor surgical procedures.

"By far, the largest single element on the patient's bill is the room rate. So, by modifying that, the overall cost is less," Ranz said.

She said 40 to 50 day-type surgeries are performed at the hospital each month.

Pet ailments likely in warmer months

By JAMI MCWILLIAMS
Collegian Reporter

The summer months can bring special health problems to everyone, even pets.

Pet owners should be aware of the health problems pets can have during the warmer months, and the preventions and treatments, Dr. Frank Fishburn, a Manhattan veterinarian, said.

Fishburn, who has had a veterinary practice for 35 years, said the biggest summertime problem is fleas, ticks and other external parasites.

"The tick is more prevalent around seedy areas, vegetation, timber (and) grass and they can cause a lot of problems," Fishburn said.

"Fleas are the same way. They're in the grass and they get in the house and they cause a terrific amount of scratching (for pets). This causes hair loss," he said.

The scratching then results in open sores, dermatitis, skin irritation and "hot spots," which are very irritating and painful for the animal, Fishburn added.

There are preventive measures pet owners can take. Fishburn said flea collars are one preventive means.

"Some aren't as strong as others and aren't as effective as they should be. I think a good tick and flea collar with a good strong chemical in it is worth using. They do help," he said.

Medication in the form of tablets given to the pet every third day is another help. "This really helps a lot and is a real preventative (for fleas)," Fishburn said.

Topically applied chemicals such as sprays, powders and medicated shampoos are of some help, but usually only last for about a day.

The flea problem can be complicated if the pet is in the house where fleas spread easily.

"When people have a flea problem with (in-house) dogs or cats, then they have a flea problem in the house. Fleas lay their eggs in the house. You have to control the fleas in the house, on the animal and in the back yard," Fishburn said.

The only way to rid the house of fleas is to fog the house with flea-killing chemicals. People and their pets must stay out of the house for several hours after fogging, but it is an effective measure, he said.

Besides fleas and ticks, allergies are another problem during the summer which affects many animals.

"We have dogs that are allergic to grasses, grass pollens and weeds," Fishburn said.

An allergic reaction will produce a great amount of scratching by the animal. Chewing the paws, licking and irritation are other symptoms of an allergy, he said.

Many pets also have dry skin in the summer, for the same reasons people do.

"It's the time of the year for dry skin. When the skin gets dry they (people) itch more. Dogs are the same way. Their skin gets dry and they just itch constantly," Fishburn said.

For relief of both allergic reactions and dry skin, medicated baths, food supplements to add oil to the skin, amino acids and vegetable oil are used to help combat dry skin.

"Treatment-wise, we have steroid tablets and antihistamine tablets as a very common treatment. We don't like to give too many steroids because they can cause some side reactions," Fishburn said.

Heat ailments are also common among pets in the summer. A pet left out in the sun too long is susceptible to heat stroke, Fishburn said.

An animal in a closed car for very long periods of time is also likely to be a victim of heat stroke. Fishburn said he doesn't see many of these cases.

Fishburn said symptoms of heat stroke are not hard to recognize.

"A dog will be panting, salivating and on the verge of collapse," he said.

A pet suffering from heat stroke will need to be treated immediately to bring its body temperature down quickly. Bathing the pet in cool water up to its chest is the recommended treatment.

If the pet does not show signs of recovering, further treatment may be necessary.

"A lot of times they have to have (intravenous) fluids, steroids and other medical treatment," Fishburn said.

Taking pets along to the lake is a good way to let the animals cool down and enjoy a swim, Fishburn said.

"People have the idea that water bothers animals' ears, but it really doesn't. They shake it out," he said.

Too much exposure to lake water can add to dry skin problems, but an occasional swim will not hurt your pet, he added.

However, the practice of letting a pet ride in a vehicle with its head out the window may hurt your pet.

"It's dangerous. Dogs can get bugs in the eye, foreign objects in the eye. And in the back of a pick-up, this certainly is dangerous. A lot of people do it and the dog doesn't jump out, but we do have cases where they fall out every once in a while. It's sure not a good idea. It makes me cringe when I see it," Fishburn said.

While fleas, ticks, allergic reactions and problems from the heat are the most common health problems, Fishburn added that infectious diseases are also problems in the summer.

"You can have certain diseases anytime. Distemper and other infectious diseases are no more common a summertime condition than any other time, but are a problem."

Andy Carver sketches a cartoon to get proportions correct before cutting any glass.

The Olde Shoppe in Riley is where Carver practices his craft.

Art In Glass

A stained-glass window design may be as simple as a single rose against a blue sky, or it might tell a story; but instead of just a pane of clear glass, a stained-glass window reflects an artist's dedication to creating something worthwhile.

Andy Carver of Manhattan has had a life much like the windows he makes.

At age 18, Carver hitchhiked from his home in the Texas Panhandle to military school, where he graduated four years later with a dual degree in agriculture and education.

He then enlisted in the Army, planning to stay two years, but stayed 28 years instead. He also taught military science at K-State from 1975-79.

"I've done a little bit of everything, but what I really enjoy the most, is making stained-glass windows," Carver said.

"While I was in the military and traveling all over the world, I visited 64 different countries and spent 11 years overseas. I started going into the cathedrals and businesses and looking at stained-glass windows because they depict a story," Carver said.

"One of the things I saw in Dexterville, Germany, when I first started my military career was an old Protestant chapel that contained bones of people who didn't survive the black plague, stacked in the basement. But upstairs in the chapel there were the most gorgeous stained-glass windows I've ever seen and each one of them told a Bible story. This really made an indelible impression in my mind that someone would go to the trouble to make a window that would tell a story," Carver said.

"There was one window that told the story about the jealous mother that wouldn't give up her child, so God decreed that the child should be halved, and it's there in glass. And it was done so beautifully, yet so grotesquely, that you just couldn't believe it.

"Well, that started my fascination with stained glass. That was in the '50s when I was a young lieutenant," he said.

Carver said as he traveled, eventually meeting his wife Brigitte he began noticing more and more of the storytelling stained glass. About seven years ago, he said, it became a hobby and now it's his profession.

The Carvers own The Olde Shoppe in Riley, a small town northwest of Manhattan, where Carver has his glass workshop. They've had the shop for 12 years. In April of 1983, a fire destroyed the shop and the Carvers rebuilt in the lot across the street.

Mrs. Carver is well known for the rare collection of antiques in The Olde Shoppe and the couple have combined their hobbies into a business.

"People come out and watch me make glass and I don't charge them anything," Carver said. "I don't care if they look over my shoulder; I just cut glass and tell them what I'm doing and what colors should join and how things should look when they're finished."

According to Carver, a person needs depth perception to create anything artistic, especially stained-glass windows.

"You have to have a depth perception to create any kind of colored material and I feel this is a God-given talent," Carver said. "He just showed me what to do with glass and I can do it."

Carver explained that selection of glass is very important in getting the right textures needed to create the effect because the glass is the only material used to create the actual design.

"I start out by sketching my ideas on paper in the exact dimension I will use in glass," Carver said. "Once this is done, the glass is superimposed over the cartoon and then the pieces are cut to fit together. Then each piece must be smoothed by a router (an appliance which smooths the edges and shapes individual pieces). Then copper foil, which is very thin, is placed around the glass, he said.

"A solder bead is used to band the glass together and lead glass is also used to create window panes."

Carver said he creates special-order windows which can be done to the exact specification of the customers, if they are willing to pay the price.

"I get most of my glass from wholesalers in Kansas City and some from California," Carver said. "A sheet of glass can start at $15 per square foot and run way up there. Most of my windows range in price from $100 to $200. I can still sell a window that I make myself, for a lot less than I can buy one for, say from Europe or other countries," Carver said.

According to Carver, the financial rewards have little bearing on his persistence of excellence in stained glass. He said he does it because he loves it and because he sees more than just a window; he feels his work reflects his thoughts and gives people something beautiful to look at.

"I have been exposed to war all my life and I fought in Vietnam," Carver said. "I have seen a lot of things and experienced hardships, even in my own family. That could bitter a person, but you cannot let war and misfortune control your life and I try to let my attitude show through my work."

This retired colonel lives his life by a general philosophy which enables him to deal with the things he has lived through.

"Live every day like it's going to be your last and make peace with God every night before you go to bed," Carver said.

Carver spends most of his time at his shop in Riley and he and his wife devote the majority of their time outside their business to helping the mentally ill.

Carver's attitude of finding beauty in life, even when it's not clearly evident, is reflected through the windows which he creates from his heart.

Carver's fascination with stained glass began in the '50s. Since then, his hobby has grown into a profession.

Carver enjoys chatting with customers about stained glass and antiques, and is never too busy to tell them how a window is made.

Carver solders the joints on a section of his latest work, "The Sodbuster."

Part of "The Sodbuster" awaits its remaining components.

Board recommends embryo experiments

By The Associated Press

LONDON — A government-appointed committee said Wednesday that Britain should make it legal for doctors to create human embryos purely for research.

Reporting the findings of an 18-month inquiry into social, legal and ethical issues raised by test-tube baby research, the blue-ribbon panel recommended legislation allowing experiments on embryos up to 14 days old.

But it said any research on embryos more than 14 days after fertilization should be a criminal offense.

The inquiry is the government's first try to set up laws controlling test-tube baby research since the world's first test-tube baby, Louise Joy Brown, was born in Oldham, England, on July 25, 1978.

The 16-member panel of doctors, scientists, lawyers and lay people, headed by senior Oxford University researcher Dame Mary Warnock, recommended laws allowing embryos to be frozen, stored and donated to infertile women, and said an independent group should be set up to license test-tube baby clinics.

The British Medical Association, representing two-thirds of the nation's 97,500 doctors, said the report would provide "sensible and compassionate guidance" for laws providing the greatest benefits from the techniques available with as few undesirable consequences as possible.

The Roman Catholic Bishops Joint Committee on Bio-ethical Issues said it would study the report before issuing a detailed commentary in the next few weeks.

But the joint committee's chairman, the Most Rev. Thomas Winning, archbishop of Glasgow, Scotland, reaffirmed the group's opposition to any experiments on embryos.

Warnock, a philosopher and mother of five, said the committee was deeply divided on whether doctors should be allowed to experiment on embryos not intended to be implanted into the womb.

However, the majority recommended "that legislation should provide that research may be carried out on any embryo resulting from in vitro fertilization, whatever its provenance, up to the end of the 14th day after fertilization, but subject to all other restrictions as may be imposed by the licensing body," she said.

She said the committee felt it would be inconsistent to allow research on embryos left after attempts at pregnancy and not allow embryos to be created specifically for research.

Warnock said the panel decided on the 14-day limit because it is the time when an embryo begins to take on individual characteristics and would normally implant in the womb.

Many scientists have sought permission to do experiments on embryos for research on genetic diseases such as hemophilia and Down's Syndrome. Warnock said the licensing body would decide what research would be permissible.

Warnock said the committee considered embryos less than 14 days old human, but "the question was not when human life begins but what legal protection it should be afforded."

Fathers pass diabetes genes to children of both sexes

By The Associated Press

BOSTON — Fathers are four times as likely as mothers to pass on juvenile diabetes to their children, and this surprising discovery may provide new clues about how the disease is inherited, researchers say.

So far, however, they cannot explain why the sex difference exists. Some genetic defect may be transmitted more often by men than by women. Or diabetic mothers may tend to produce babies who die around the time of birth if they are susceptible to the disorder.

Juvenile diabetes, also known as insulin-dependent diabetes, usually strikes its victims during childhood. There are about 1 million victims in the United States.

Scientists believe that the disease is inherited. But just how this works is still a mystery. Most victims do not have diabetic parents. So the genetic factor — whatever it is — remains hidden most of the time.

In the latest study, 6.1 percent of the children of diabetic fathers developed the disease by age 20, compared with only 1.3 percent of the diabetic mothers.

Overall, a child faces about a 5 percent chance of getting diabetes if his brother or sister has the disease.

"The occurrence in the offspring of the fathers is pretty much what we would have expected," said Dr. James H. Warram. "The unexpected finding was that it was so much rarer in the offspring of the women."

Both sons and daughters of the diabetic men faced an equal risk of getting diabetes.

If genes do account for the sex difference, this would make diabetes unique among inherited diseases. No other genetic trait is known to be preferentially transmitted by a father to children of both sexes.

A similar situation has been seen among females. Two relatively rare genetic disorders — phenylketonuria, or PKU, and mitochondrial cytopathy — are usually passed on by mothers and affect both sexes.

Elevator reform protects farmers' grain

By SUSIE MACKEY
Collegian Reporter

A victory for not only Kansas farmers, but also the American farmer was won recently in the U.S. Congress.

A grain elevator bankruptcy provision introduced by Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan., was passed by Congress after nearly five years of being bottled-up by the House Judiciary Committee.

"This bankruptcy reform has been a long time coming for American farmers," Dole said in a statement included in a news release from his office. "I'm glad the House finally moved on this vital legislation. Unfortunately, the new protection came too late to help some farmers who lost their property in bankrupt elevators during the last several years."

The bankruptcy package was first passed by Senate in July 1981, and was passed on four subsequent occasions. This is the first time the provision made it past the House Judiciary Committee and to the final vote in Congress.

The provision requires the courts to distribute grain that has been stored in a bankrupt elevator to farmers who own the grain within 120 days of the bankruptcy filing.

It will also require the courts to accept valid warehouse receipts or scale tickets as proof of grain ownership.

A lien will be granted against assets of the elevator to farmers who have sold grain to the elevator operator but have not received payment at the time of the bankruptcy filing.

The bill will bring state regulatory agencies, which have experience in liquidating debts elevator personnel are unable to pay, into the bankruptcy proceedings to assist the court and expedite the determination of ownership questions.

Grain elevator bankruptcy provisions will establish new procedures to guide the courts in handling a case involving an insolvent grain storage facility.

Tom Tunnel, executive vice president of the Kansas Grain and Feed Dealers Association, said the bankruptcy provision gives everyone a better understanding of the laws of elevator warehousing.

Tunnel said Dole began working on bankruptcy provisions when an elevator in Missouri and Arkansas went bankrupt. The courts would not honor warehouse receipts from those elevators. The elevator had more receipts than it had grain to cover the receipts. False receipts were being made. It was thought that the grain was an asset of the elevator.

The bankruptcy provisions now will guarantee the farmer and the warehouse to be treated fairly in court proceedings, Tunnel said.

"In Missouri a state license for a warehouse to operate must be obtained, and in Arkansas no license is required," Tunnel said. "This would never happen in Kansas, because elevators must have a state or federal license to operate and Kansas is very strict. Kansas has the best warehouse laws in the nation."

In terms of the nation, Tunnel said the provisions were needed a long time ago.

"The Legislature passed, in 1982, six bills which strengthened the warehouse act in Kansas," Tunnel said. "We (warehousemen) place his (the farmer's) confidence in us and we needed this law passed."

Don Gudenhauf, manager of the Farmers Co-op Association of Manhattan, said a state grain inspector visits the co-op twice a year to inspect the quantity and quality of the stored grain, and makes sure all receipts line up with the stored grain at the facility.

State inspectors are assigned to different areas of the state. Area headquarters are located in Dodge City, Topeka, Colby, Kansas City and Wichita. The inspectors work out of these cities and travel to elevators in their designated areas for inspection.

"The co-op is already bonded because it is owned by the farmers since it is a cooperative," Gudenhauf said. "We are covered for bankruptcy."

Gudenhauf said with the provisions bill, their costs will go up because there will be more regulations to meet.

"There should be a change in other businesses' bankruptcy laws, not just us," Gudenhauf said.

"We are pleased that the provision has been passed and recognized the responsibility of the state regulatory (agency) to carry out state licenses," Marvin Webb, said director of the Kansas State Grain Inspection Department (KSGID).

The bankruptcy bill now awaits President Reagan's signature.

Wild animals become common sights

African safari raises $1,500 for zoo

By KATHIE CORMACI
Collegian Reporter

Picture a dusty road in the African desert. Wild animals roam free and within reach, and Mount Kilimanjaro rises ominously in the background shrouded in clouds.

This may sound like something from a dream, but for the Friends of Sunset Zoo, an African safari was a dream come true.

"I've been working on this (safari) for two years," Gerry Brady, director of Sunset Zoo, said. "About a year ago, Don Wixom, education director, started helping me to coordinate it."

According to Brady, Park East Tours of New York works with zoos all across the nation. They go to zoo conferences each year and try to get people to go with them on safaris such as this one.

"Park East told us if we got 20 people to go on this trip they'd give us two free trips," Brady said. "I got 10 people signed up, so I got a free trip, but Don only had five. Since Don was responsible for a lot of the coordination they gave him a free trip," Brady said. "We had 15 people who paid the ticket price of $2,795 and for each person who paid, $100 went to the Sunset Zoo. So, actually, we got $1,500 for the zoo."

The group left Kansas City International Airport June 9 for the 16-day safari in East Africa. The city of Nairobi was a kind of headquarters for them. After several days out on the safari, they'd return to the city to shop and get cleaned up.

The group visited many parks and game reserves throughout East Africa, and nights were spent at lodges nearby.

"While on safari, we stayed at fantastic lodges where every evening the area is under floodlights, which attracts the animals to the watering hole," Brady said. "We saw every single animal within touching distance."

On their second day in Africa mini-busses took them from Nairobi down a bumpy dirt road to Amboseli National Park where the legendary Mount Kilimanjaro dominates the area, and the "big five" — elephant, lion, leopard, buffalo and rhinoceros — roam freely.

According to a diary written by Don Wixom and Mary Haines, treasurer of Friends of Sunset Zoo, "Our afternoon game run was excellent. Our group saw a total of seven black rhino. This is considered a rare find. We also saw a rock python with its prey, a black-bellied bustard (a long-legged game bird) considered a once in a lifetime find."

The following day, the group drove past volcanoes and mountains through the Chyulu Hills to Tsavo Park.

"We stayed two days in Tsavo Park — the world's largest at 8,000 square miles. Even from the beds in our rooms we could see the waterholes where elephants, impalas, waterbuck and Cape buffalo fares come throughout day and night," the Wixom and Haines diary read.

The group then visited Samburu, the northern desert game reserve on the Uaso Nyirio River.

"Samburu is definitely the desert," Wixom and Haines wrote. "We saw the very unusual Grevy's zebra, an endangered species, and the thin-legged gerenuk (small antelope) that stands on its hind legs to eat the tender acacia leaves other animals can't get to."

A full day of game viewing was spent on the Masai Mara, "a true Garden of Eden," according to Wixom and Haines. "We were in awe at the millions of wildebeests and zebras. There were hyena galore and the unusual Topi antelope. The whole day was dedicated to looking for cheetah which part of the group had not seen."

The group next visited game ranches in Kenya where the owners have permits to catch animals from the wild and hold them for a year or two, after which, they export them to zoos in the United States that have purchased them.

"Hunt Brothers, one of the largest animal dealers in the world, has a game refuge farm next to Mount Kenya Safari Club — also known as 'The Millionaires' Paradise,' owned by Bob Hunt and the late William Holden," Brady said.

"By holding the animals for two years, they (the animals) get used to living in cages which is good because when they're exported they're on a boat or plane and they're kept in a quarantine station," Brady said. "It takes such a long time to get an animal from Kenya to a zoo in the U.S. that a lot of times they die before they get here because of the stress."

"Now with this game refuge program animals can get accustomed to staying in cages and when they get transported the stress level is down and not as many die," he said.

According to Brady, the Sunset Zoo has purchased animals from Kenya, and he believes there are great advantages to purchasing animals from abroad rather than purchasing them from other zoos. However, because of the level of extinction of many animals from Africa and South America, many of them are quite expensive.

"Right before we went over we purchased a Colobus monkey, which are very rare, from this group," Brady said. "So, we actually got to see where they were holding it."

"What's so nice about purchasing an animal from Africa or South America is that you know that you have new blood. Whereas, if you purchase an animal from another zoo that's papers aren't up-to-date you could get an animal that's been interbreeding for years, and they have a lot of recessive characteristics they exhibit. If you get something from the wild, you're ensured that it's good, new blood, and you can actually start a whole new colony here in the United States."

Platform compromise helps Mondale's cause

By The Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — Walter F. Mondale blended compromise and delegate clout Tuesday to brush off an improbable, last-ditch drive by Gary Hart and Jesse Jackson to deny his looming presidential nomination at the Democratic National Convention.

Black delegates who support Mondale spurned Jackson's emotional appeal to vote for him instead on Wednesday night's first nominating ballot.

The former vice president then showed his delegate strength on the floor, beating back platform challenges he could not compromise with Jackson.

Mondale first accepted a Hart proposal to restrict use of military forces overseas — thus clearing away the last platform difference between himself and his most persistent challenger.

One of Jackson's losing platform planks urged a "no first use" doctrine of nuclear weapons. Mondale said that would have tied a president's hands in a crisis and the convention agreed on a vote of 2,216 to 1,406. Jackson's other proposal called for sharply less military spending than Mondale wants.

The convention then debated Jackson's proposal to abolish runoff primaries in use in several southern states. Jackson forces greeted Atlanta Mayor Andrew Young with a chorus of "shame on you," when he presented the Mondale analysis that such primaries help minority candidates as often as not.

By voice vote, the convention approved compromise language in support of affirmative action efforts.

The platform debate unfolded as House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill predicted a smashing Democratic victory in the fall. "We are going to win the White House, win the Senate, win more seats in the House. Believe me, failure is not a Democratic habit," O'Neill said in prepared remarks.

Judgment day for the presidential rivals was a mere 24 hours away, but Hart nursed dreams of an 11th hour miracle. The convention should not hand out the "nomination like a gold watch for being a good loyal Democrat," he said in an unmistakable reference to Mondale.

Jackson, the moment of his campaign climax nearing, won a resolution from the 700-member black caucus to support his nomination on Wednesday night's first ballot as a matter of "conscience (and) conviction." That could prevent Mondale's first-ballot nomination, but every indication was that the 400 blacks committed to Mondale or Hart would stay that way.

"How are you going to tell your grandchildren, when the roll is called that you voted for someone else?" Jackson asked.

Said Lacy Steele of Seattle, Wash.: "I'm pledged to Mondale and I will vote for Mondale. I'll tell my grandchildren that I voted my conscience. My word is my bond."

Said Dorothy Hudson of Denver: "I have to stay with my good Senator, although I love Jesse. Gary Hart will make the best President."

Mondale's swelling delegate total, as tracked by delegate interviews, is more than a hundred over a nominating majority; several hundred of the 711 black delegates are pledged to Mondale.

The Hispanic caucus deadlocked on a proposal for a first-ballot boycott to protest immigration reform legislation now before Congress. New Mexico Gov. Toney Anaya, a Mondale supporter, said the issue was a smokescreen by Hart and Jackson forces to deny the former vice president the nomination.

Jackson had a handful of minority planks, and denied that his decision to carry them to the floor was divisive. "Debate does not mean division," he said. "It means democracy. This is not a coronation, it's a convention."

Ferraro told southern governors she has a "special feeling" for their part of the country as she sought to allay their concerns over the presence of a woman on the ticket. "If you want me to come into your states, I will," she said. "If you don't think I can help...I won't."

Her audience seemed impressed. She was immediately invited to Alabama, and Gov. Joe Frank Harris told reporters, "We've asked her to come to Georgia and she's accepted."

Mondale told a middle school civics class, "I used to dream that I could be an alderman. Some people still have that dream." Thursday night he is to accept the Democratic presidential nomination and he invited the students to grade his performance.

The agenda for Tuesday's convention session mixed pomp and ceremony with the platform debate and Jackson's prime time speech — an opportunity to display his oratorical talents for a national television audience and rally blacks to support the fall ticket.

Among delegates, the talk was still of New York Gov. Mario Cuomo's rousing keynote address on Monday night — and of the unusual late night unity summit that Mondale held with his losing rivals.

He won a pledge of cooperation for the fall campaign, but both Hart and Jackson vowed to stay in the race to the end. That comes Wednesday night, when the roll is called for the nomination.

Most of the 35,000-word platform was settled in advance of the convention to the satisfaction of all three rivals.

It declares, "A fundamental choice awaits America — a choice between two futures."

"It is a choice between solving our problems, and pretending they don't exist; between the spirit of community and the corrosion of selfishness; between justice for all and advantage for some...between arms control and an arms race."

Reagan signs national drinking bill

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan signed into law Tuesday "a simple measure that will save thousands of young lives" by forcing states to raise their drinking age to 21 or lose a part of their federal highway money.

Drunken driving is a problem "bigger than the individual states. It's a grave national problem, and it touches all our lives," said Reagan, who just weeks earlier had reversed his opposition to the legislation. It affects 27 states which now allow people under 21 to buy at least some types of liquor.

"With the problem so clear-cut and the prudent solution at hand, we have no misgivings about this judicious use of federal power," the president said at a signing ceremony.

Although Reagan had said states should have the right to set drinking ages at their own discretion, he said statistics convinced him that differences between neighboring states actually encouraged youngsters to drive across borders to drink — a potential disaster.

"We know that drinking, plus driving, spell death and disaster," said Reagan. "We know that people in the 18-20 age group are more likely to be in alcohol-related accidents than those in any other age group."

"We know that America has a clear stake in making certain that her sons and daughters, so full of vitality and promise, will not be crippled or killed," he continued.

Reagan said the outmoded device will be replaced with high-speed printers capable of almost instantaneous transmission of long texts, maps, charts and photographs.

According to a White House fact sheet, the new "Direct Communications Link" will now consist of two satellite circuits plus one wire telegraph circuit, one earth station in each country for each of the satellite circuits, and the high-speed printer terminals.

The new technology will give both Soviet and American leaders critical minutes to deal with crises in an era when ballistic missiles can strike their targets in 20 minutes or less.

U.S., Soviets concur on hot line

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — In what President Reagan termed a "modest but positive" thaw in relations, American and Soviet negotiators agreed Tuesday to a high-tech upgrading of the 21-year-old hot line used for crisis communications between Washington and Moscow.

The agreement, which the two delegations toasted in champagne, was announced at the White House, where Reagan welcomed it as "a good example of how we can, working together, find approaches which can move us towards a reduction in the risks of war."

"This agreement is a modest but

City votes to limit parking rules, requires permit only on Fairchild

By MELISSA BRUNE
Staff Writer

Residents along Laramie Street, Denison Avenue and Fairchild Terrace will be able to park on these streets without a parking permit after the City Commission voted 5-0 Tuesday night to restrict a parking permit ordinance to Fairchild Avenue.

The commission had voted June 5 to pass an ordinance designating no parking from 2 to 9 a.m. without a parking permit. Members K-State's greek system became concerned the ordinance would leave greek residents of the area without adequate parking. They put together a petition to present to the commission for an alternative agreement.

Tracy Turner, junior in economics and spokesman for the petition drive, said the action taken by the city Tuesday night improves the parking problem for greek residents in the area, and satisfies the needs of many concerned with parking in this area.

Turner, a member of Theta Xi fraternity, spoke before the commission on behalf of the fraternities in the area, with Marty Oborg, vice president of the Alpha Xi Delta sorority and junior in family life and human development.

The commission also voted 5-0 to allocate $30,000 in emergency funds to the Crisis Center to meet operational expenses for this calendar year.

Judy Davis, Crisis Center director, asked the commission to understand the consequences the community would face if the city did not commit the money.

She said that all the funds for the center were exhausted and that without the money from the commission, her staff would have to be "laid off tomorrow morning." Davis added that without the staff, there would be no Crisis Center — no place for individuals who need the services the center offers.

Commissioner Rick Mann told Davis she was using "emotional blackmail" to urge the commission to agree to give the center the money. He said the commission needed to be assured the need for $30,000 would not come up every year.

The Crisis Center had appealed to the city at its last meeting for these funds. At that time, the commission suggested the center go to Riley County to request funding there. Commissioner Wanda Fateley said she believed Davis had sufficiently responded to the requests of the commission to seek funds elsewhere, and supported the allocation of the funds.

On a trial basis, the commission tried for the first time a consent agenda at Tuesday's meeting.

The consent agenda places items which are generally of an administrative nature into a group to be voted on collectively at the beginning of the meeting. If commissioners want specific items pulled from the consent agenda for further discussion, they may make that request.

This form of "housekeeping," as Mayor Dave Fiser said, is to expedite matters which are generally agreed upon by commission members.

Fingerprinting eases kidnapping fears

By The Associated Press

SEATTLE — Parents and their youngsters are lining up at more than 60 offices to take advantage of the nation's first statewide children's identification program.

However, spokesmen for the FBI and a missing-child agency say fingerprints are of questionable value in finding missing children.

Parents nationwide are using fingerprinting programs offered by some police departments, school systems and private agencies because of fears that their children might be abducted.

David Schoch, spokesman for Childfind Inc., a national information clearing house based in New York City, said he knows of no missing child who has been located or identified through fingerprints in the past four years.

FBI spokesman Lane Bonner at FBI headquarters in Washington said the only case he knew of in which fingerprints helped establish identity was that of a child abducted as an infant and found several years later.

More important than fingerprinting is keeping recent photographs and other information about physical characteristics such as scars, birthmarks, height and weight, hair and eye color, Schoch said.

But, both Schoch and Bonner agreed, if fingerprinting helps one family, it's worth all the smudged fingers.

Earlier this month, Washington began its child identification program, using the 57 state driver's license offices and five mobile offices. For $3 parents can have a child photographed and fingerprinted at the same place they get their driver's license.

Parents are mailed an identification card, similar to their plastic driver's license, and a copy remains with the state. Parents, however, may keep the fingerprints themselves or skip the fingerprint portion of the identification, said Chuck Stansbury, assistant director of driver services.

If the child is ever listed as missing, parents can release the information only for the purpose of searching for the child. The information also can be fed to the Childfind network or law enforcement computers if the parents agree.

As of Tuesday, parents of 956 children were issued identification cards, according to Louis Snyder, an official in the state licensing department.

Child fingerprinting has been "hot" for only a couple of years, said Schoch of Childfind, a 4-year-old organization with 200 Friends of Childfind groups nationally.

Forty percent of the children registered with Childfind (for a $60 fee) have been located, Schoch said. In four years the organization has found 1,144 children, he said.

"Because they are fairly new, we have never used fingerprints to locate a child," he said.

Parents use fingerprinting programs because they are afraid not to.

"You could always kick yourself later," Schoch said. "What fingerprints are most effective at is identifying dead bodies. It's better to have an end to a story than be wondering for the rest of your life."

"The goal is to prevent your child from ever being taken."

Hundreds of unidentified children are buried each year in the United States, Schoch said. Childfind estimates that parents illegally abduct 100,000 children a year and that strangers abduct an additional 8,000 a year.

The estimates are not supported by statistics, because there are no statistics, no studies or surveys, Schoch said. Bonner said the only way to find the true number of unknown dead would be to question every coroner in the country.

In 1983, Bonner said, 189,000 missing person reports were filed with the computerized National Crime Information Center. And 182,000 of those were removed because people were found.

"Most missing persons are located," the FBI spokesman said. "Many are runaways. Many are not missing... A 15-year-old is reported missing in Chicago. She's picked up in Seattle. It turns out she ran away because she was being sexually molested by her stepfather..."

Nonetheless, the FBI, which was empowered by the 1982 Missing Child Act to help search for missing children through its computers, endorses and supports voluntary fingerprinting.

Parents who send the FBI a set of 10 inked and rolled fingerprints on an acceptable card (available through the Government Printing Office) can have them added to the FBI's civil file which, Bonner said, is not searched in criminal cases. The FBI has 165 million fingerprints on file.

"We recommend parents keep the fingerprints and updated photos along with other household papers," he said.

Gov. John Spellman said the purpose of the state fingerprinting program was to combat "the heartbreak and tragedy of missing children."

Two licensing department employees, Deborah Poulsen of Tacoma and Teresa Van Cleave of Puyallup, suggested the state program, which started July 5. It's the first fingerprinting child identification program in the country to use driver's license offices, Schoch said.

"Should it work, it could be a model for other states to follow," he said. "It would give parents in every locale a place. These kind of things are being done all over the place randomly."

The state program cost only $21,000 to train employees and create new forms, said Stansbury.

Officials move to centralize dump site for nuclear waste

By The Associated Press

LAS VEGAS, Nev. — High-level radioactive trash is piling up in 20-foot-deep pools of water at nuclear power plants while the federal government tries to select the site of the nation's first commercial nuclear dump.

It's a multi-billion dollar business no state is courting.

If the federal government has its way, the deadly rods will be chopped up, mixed with molten glass to form glass logs, sealed in steel or concrete containers and shipped to a 2,500-acre cavern in Nevada, Utah, Texas, Washington, Louisiana or Mississippi.

It will be the largest mass of commercial high-level radioactive waste ever gathered in one spot — 70,000 metric tons of lethal trash that could cover a football field five feet deep.

Power plants nationwide now have licenses to operate 86 nuclear reactors and construction permits to build an additional 52 reactors. The plants produce tons of nuclear trash annually in the form of spent fuel elements — clusters of pencil-sized metal cylinders that hold nuclear fuels.

The waste, which will remain "hot" for hundreds of thousands of years, is in storage, suspended in 20-foot-deep pools of water at the power plants. But many older plants are running out of storage space.

The Nevada location, considered by some government sources the most likely site, would be 5,000-foot Yucca Mountain, an imposing piece of welded tuff formed by volcanoes between 10 and 13 million years ago.

Yucca is situated about 100 miles northwest of Las Vegas, at the edge of the secret Nevada Test Site, within earshot of the nation's underground nuclear tests.

It's a short drive from the complex where the United States once conducted a nuclear rocket engine development program. Today the sprawling complex is testing ways to store nuclear waste in concrete silos, steel canisters and granite rock.

The federal government is studying nine potential repository sites in the six states. Those nine sites are to be narrowed to three early next year, and Department of Energy officials are betting Yucca Mountain makes the cut.

"I think everybody would be amazed if the Nevada site is not one of the final three," DOE spokesman Chris West said. "There are a lot of features about Yucca that make it outstanding. It's 1,700 feet above the water table. At other sites you would have to drill down through the water table and make the repository below it.

"That poses a threat because dryness is a major factor. The main way for the radioactivity to get into the environment is through water. If you can keep the radioactivity away from water, chances are a lot greater of keeping it out of man's environment."

Another factor favoring Yucca is that sprawling Nye County, population 9,048, is one of the least densely populated areas in America. The nearest community, 20 miles to the southeast, is Lathrop Wells, a blip along U.S. 95 comprised of a bar, a gas station, the Shamrock Ranch brothel and a small casino.

If Yucca is selected, a 1,200-foot vertical shaft would lead to a 2,500-acre labyrinth of tunnels in the belly of the mountain where the logs of nuclear waste would be stored. The glass would help stabilize the waste if the containers were disturbed, the DOE says.

The DOE hopes to have the first repository open by 1998; it would collect the nation's nuclear trash for the next half century. The Nuclear Waste Policy Act, signed into law in January 1983, calls for construction of a second repository by the mid-21st century — this one likely east of the Mississippi River. Granite formations in 17 states are being studied for the second site.

Current plans call for the president to select the final site of the first commercial nuclear dump by March of 1987, but officials doubt that deadline will be met.

Once the selection is made, the governor of the host state has the right to veto the decision. That veto must then be overridden by both the U.S. Senate and House.

Nevada Gov. Richard Bryan has been vociferous in his opposition, saying his state has paid its fair share of the nation's nuclear tab.

Meanwhile, West says time is running out for some power plants.

"When they built the power plants they didn't count on the waste being there forever. It only makes sense that if you have 100 sites there's a greater potential for leakage of the waste. The logic for having a national repository is to bring it to one location that is tailored to handle the waste safely."

"Technically, the solutions have been there for years. But it's been a hot potato politically," West said.

Proposal would limit overseas force

Mondale accepts foreign policy plan

By The Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — Walter F. Mondale, in a major foreign policy concession, agreed Tuesday to accept the lone minority plank proposed by rival Sen. Gary Hart, one that would limit use of U.S. military forces overseas.

But Mondale forces held fast in opposition to policy challenges by the Rev. Jesse Jackson. In the first of five votes on minority planks, the Democratic National Convention rejected, 2,216-3 to 1,405-7, a Jackson proposal seeking to commit a Democratic president to adopting a European defense policy insisting upon "no first use" of nuclear weapons.

Delegates cast their votes on computer terminals set up at each delegation location, a first for any national party convention. The fractions occurred because some state delegations have more delegates than votes.

Mondale's off-the-floor acceptance of Hart's plank buried the final remaining difference on policy issues between Mondale and his chief Democratic rivals as the party's one big family feud of the convention turned to Jackson-submitted planks.

A Mondale aide, Elliot Cutler, suggested that the convention might adopt at least one of the Jackson planks — one calling for stronger affirmative action programs, including the use of racial quotas under certain circumstances.

As the convention began debating the party's 1984 platform, Mondale negotiators gave in after nearly around-the-clock bargaining and agreed to back Hart's use-of-force plank.

The concession was announced in a terse statement from Mondale's campaign headquarters: "Walter Mondale has accepted the Hart minority report on use of force."

The statement added that Mondale had objected to the "vagueness of language" and would at a later time come up with "clarifying language" that he would submit to the party. Mondale negotiators had argued that the Hart plank would tie the hands of a U.S. president.

A Mondale source, who spoke on condition that he not be identified, said that as part of the agreement, Hart would ask his delegates to support Mondale on the four minority planks submitted by Jackson.

But Hart spokesman Rep. Timothy Wirth of Colorado said no such deal had been reached, and Hart delegates were being urged to vote their consciences, especially on the affirmative action issue, which has the support of many black delegates.

Negotiations between Mondale and Jackson collapsed shortly before the start of Tuesday's convention session.

The Hart plank adopted by Mondale states that a Democratic president would only use military force when "vital American interests are threatened" and not where U.S. objectives are unclear, where diplomatic channels have not been exhausted or where the costs of such action outweigh the benefits.

The platform as drafted by the Mondale majority on the party's Platform Committee stated that the nation would "be prepared to defend its vital interests militarily when they are threatened" and not where "our purpose is unclear."

Jackson had three remaining planks:

—Substantial cuts in defense spending.

—Use of racial quotas in certain circumstances as part of a stronger commitment to affirmative action.

—The elimination of run-off primaries, used in 10 Southern states when no one candidate receives more than 50 percent of the vote. Jackson says the run-offs discriminate against blacks.

Both Hart and Jackson had indicated support for the overall 35,000 word document, which sounds a number of traditional Democratic themes, which Mondale used as the basis for his campaign: support of programs for the poor and elderly, a commitment to blacks and other minorities, strong backing of labor unions, and ratification of a new Equal Rights Amendment.

Woven through the entire document is a scathing indictment of President Reagan's "government by subtraction." It blasts huge federal deficits under Reagan's term and vows to restore many of his cuts in domestic programs.

It calls for an end to U.S. aid to forces fighting the government of Nicaragua and for a moratorium on the testing and production of nuclear weapons.

World Hunger relay runners to pass through Manhattan

Runners from Geneva, Switzerland, en route to the 1984 Summer Olympics in Los Angeles, will be passing through Manhattan late this afternoon as part of the '84 World Hunger Relay.

Lynn Doxon, local organizer for the relay, said the runners are carrying a baton as a symbol of a world hunger and underdevelopment message established by 79 Nobel Peace Prize laureates in 1981.

Doxon said local runners are needed to support the relay team but non-runners are also needed to help out with other activities.

Runners and other supporters are to meet at approximately 6 p.m. in City Park as the relay team makes its way from Wamego. The relay team will immediately continue on its way to Fort Riley. From Fort Riley runners will make their way through Junction City and Salina on their way to the Kansas-Colorado border. Because the exact time of the relay team's arrival is unknown, Doxon has established a phone "tree" to notify participants when to be at the park.

Midcareer professionals leave jobs to supply math, physics instruction

By The Associated Press

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. — Anthony Copas worked as a chemical engineer. Peter Booras was a retired Army colonel. This fall they begin new lives, teaching math and science to high school students.

Copas and Booras are among the first graduates of a special Harvard University program designed to meet the growing demand for math and science teachers at the high school level.

Bucking the trend that has seen teachers leave school for better-paying jobs, Harvard has begun training retirees, professionals and housewives to fill the gaps in the nation's classrooms.

"They're coming into this as a matter of choice," said Katherine Merseeth, who heads Harvard's Mid-career Math and Science Program. "They say, 'I loved physics and I want some kid to love it the way I did.'"

Patricia Albjerg Graham, dean of Harvard's Graduate School of Education, began the program last year to counter the crisis developing in the nation's schools.

Graham cited recent studies that show more than 40 states have shortages in math and science teachers.

"What this means is that people who are not trained thoroughly are teaching math and science," said Graham.

The main reason is money. The National Education Association says a starting math teacher earns around $13,000 a year; a graduate with an engineering degree can command an annual salary of $22,000.

And the number of people between 18 and 25 — the age group that traditionally provides new teachers — will shrink by 25 percent over the next decade nationwide and by 41 percent in New England, Merseeth said.

"We said to ourselves we have to find an alternative labor pool for these kinds of teachers," she said.

So the Harvard program targets what Merseeth calls "midcareer professionals" — people with the skills and training in industry who are interested in a new career.

These professionals include retirees whose pensions would supplement their teaching salaries. Other teaching candidates are professionals who have earned enough to coast comfortably on smaller paychecks.

"The cash demands on a mid-career person are different," said Merseeth. "They may have paid off their mortgage. Their children may have finished college."

But the Harvard program also attracts candidates who want to contribute to society.

"There is a strong sense of service among these people," said Merseeth. "A strong sense that they were successful because they had a good teacher and now they want to return that."

Harvard began the nine-month course last fall with a small class ranging in age from 28 to 60. The class included two retirees, two engineers, a woman optical scientist and a housewife with degrees in biology and philosophy.

Half their time was spent at the university, learning teaching techniques; the other half was spent out in the field, as an assistant teacher in one of the Boston-area high schools. All six have found teaching jobs.

Woman still suffers from injuries incurred in village napalm attack

By The Associated Press

BANGKOK, Thailand — In 1972, a napalm attack sent 9-year-old Kim Phuc racing down a highway, naked and screaming in pain, and her terror was recorded in a photograph that became a stark symbol of the Vietnam War.

Now, she is a 21-year-old medical student. But she still gets searing headaches, and scars on her body throb when the temperature rises. And she still needs more medical treatment for her napalm burns.

Kim Phuc was hit by napalm from a misdirected bomb dropped by a South Vietnamese plane near Trang Bang, her home in what was then South Vietnam. As she and other villagers ran for their lives, Associated Press photographer Huynh Cong "Nick" Ut took his Pulitzer Prize-winning photograph.

"From time to time I look at the picture, when I am very sad," Kim Phuc said Thursday. "I just want to remember my past and that scene made a deep impression on me."

Kim Phuc recalls the napalm attack without visible regret or anger. She stopped in Bangkok on her way from Ho Chi Minh City to West Germany for medical treatment she hopes will ease the pain she still suffers.

Accompanying her was Perry Kretz, a photojournalist with the West German magazine Stern, which with the European aid agency Terre des Hommes is sponsoring her trip to a Ludwigshafen hospital that specializes in burn treatment.

Kim Phuc, whose full name is Phan Thi Kim Phuc, was smiling and calm on her first trip outside Vietnam. As she spoke, the sleeves of her white blouse slid up, exposing thick scars on her wrists.

The air strike that burned Kim Phuc occurred during the Easter offensive launched by North Vietnam in 1972. South Vietnamese air force bombers attacked Communist positions near Trang Bang and mistakenly rained napalm bombs on her house and several others as the family was sitting down for lunch.

Kim Phuc's brother was also in Ut's photograph, his arms flailing and mouth wide open in terror. But Kim Phuc was the only one in her immediate family to be injured.

After two days in a local hospital, Kim Phuc spent 14 months at Cho Ray Hospital in Saigon. She returned to the city — called Ho Chi Minh City since the North Vietnamese takeover — in 1982 to begin studying medicine.

Kretz said he met Kim Phuc after she was released from the hospital in 1973. He said the Vietnamese government allowed him to visit her again in 1982. A year and a half ago, Stern magazine asked Vietnamese officials to let Kim Phuc go to West Germany for treatment, and in a rare move, the Vietnamese agreed.

Lifestyles vary little between United States, Saudi Arabia

By LISA M. FORD
Collegian Reporter

Arabia is a peninsula in Southwest Asia, between the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf. Saudi Arabia, the kingdom occupying most of Arabia, is described as a predominately desert region.

Mike Darling, a 21-year-old engineering student at K-State, has a somewhat different view of Saudi Arabia.

"It was, of course, hot, (it got up to 130 to 135 degrees in the summer), but it wasn't anything like living in a desert," Darling said.

Darling was 15 years old when his family moved to Saudi Arabia in 1979. After completing the ninth grade, he returned to the United States to complete his education.

"It's really just like living in the States, because we live in compounds with fences around them," Darling said. "It's just like our own little community. The compounds have houses, lawns, tennis courts, pools, recreation halls, golf courses, schools.... I only get home (to Saudi Arabia) during my Christmas and summer breaks. We have all of the luxuries there that we have in the States."

"American students are only able to attend school from kindergarten to ninth grade in Saudi," Darling said. "After the ninth grade is completed, they must leave the country to finish school."

He said there is a valid reason behind this: it's cheaper for the country, since it doesn't have to hire as many teachers.

Darling's father is stationed in Saudi because of his work with the Arabian-American Oil Company, the largest oil company in the world. It contributes much to the large number of Americans living in Saudi now — about 45,000, most of them related to the petroleum industry. In fact, there are more foreigners living in Saudi than natives, Darling said.

"Getting used to the religious laws would probably be the hardest thing for most Americans," Darling said. "They're very strict about them in Saudi. If any of these laws are violated, the person could get into serious trouble."

"For example, one of the laws is that no 'revealing' clothing can be worn," Darling said. "This means no shorts, no tight-fitting jeans.... If a person would happen to get caught violating this law, he/she would be in serious trouble."

Trouble, Darling explained, means that a person's parents would be notified immediately, and if there is a second offense, the violator would be thrown in jail.

"Jail in Saudi isn't the same as jail in America," Darling said. "They don't feed you; they just throw you in a cell and leave you there. It's far worse than what some might have seen in the movie 'Midnight Express.' It's not very good to be an American in a foreign prison."

There are also strict laws against alcohol, Darling said. A person can almost certainly expect to be thrown in jail if he is caught with either alcohol or drugs.

"If you're walking home and fall in a gutter, you'd better hope there are not any religious police around to see it," Darling said. "If they would happen to see you drunk, they would honk their horn at you for you to stop. They would then ask you for your ID card, (everyone in the compound is issued one of these), and if you happened to be unlucky enough not to have it with you, you could get thrown in jail for up to 72 hours with no questions asked."

"If we happened to be having a private party at someone's house and saw the religious police coming, (it is easy to spot them because they always drive green and white cars), we would bury all of our alcohol," Darling said. "We had to do this because this particular police force can come in and search anyone's home at any time if they feel that there's something 'illegal' going on; they can do this without a search warrant or anything."

Pornography is also against the law in Saudi Arabia, an A-rated movie is even considered porn, Darling said. On TV you'll never see people kissing or holding hands because it's taboo in Saudi culture. Even the movie "Animal House" was all chopped up, he said.

Television shows in English are offered only from 3 p.m. to 11 p.m. in Saudi. There is Arab TV, but every program, (even the American ones), are spoken in Arabic. Darling said he can speak just enough Arabic to get by, but his family can speak it quite well.

"They're really cracking down on Americans in their country," Darling said. "I'm really glad they are. Some Americans spoil the whole deal for everyone by screwing up all the time."

Darling remembered an instance when the son of one of his father's co-workers was given a five-year sentence in jail, plus a $25,000 fine for trying to sneak two ounces of marijuana into the country.

"It always comes back to your family," Darling said. "Your father is the one who will get in trouble. It's a really bad deal in some cases."

Darling has a brother who attends the eighth grade at a school in Saudi, and a sister who is a high school junior at a private school in Maine. He said most Americans attend private schools after completing the ninth grade.

According to Darling, the security in Saudi is tight and the army is powerful.

"When the embassy in Beirut was blown up, things got pretty scary," Darling said. "We were also supporting Iraq in its war against Iran. Baricades were up everywhere and there were searches going on all the time. My family is in a very strategic area — we're one mile from the American embassy — so it's scary to hear about all the things that are going on over there."

When his family first moved to Saudi, Darling said attitudes toward the Americans were good; the Arabs were friendly and nice.

"They were always trying to better themselves," Darling said. "If you would speak to them in Arabic, they would speak to you in American just so you would know that they knew how. They would also do it to make you feel more comfortable." When the United States became involved in the Middle East, the Arabs' attitudes toward Americans were slightly changed. The Moslems were offended because the United States was choosing sides, Darling said.

"Saudi Arabia is one of the more pro-Western countries, although most Americans don't realize this," Darling said. "We've helped them a great deal and they appreciate it. We've (the United States) helped them become one of the more modern countries of the day."

"The older Arabs are really concerned for our (the Americans) safety," he said. "They realize that if the foreigners are forced to leave, it'll be tough for them. They don't have the experience or technology to handle things."

American foreign policy leaves few choices

There is another thread of United States history being woven into this country's fabric of already-tattered foreign relations.

Washington told the New Zealand government Tuesday that the ANZUS (Australia, New Zealand, United States) defense pact would be void if the new Labor government in New Zealand bans port visits by U.S. warships.

The Labor party in New Zealand took power in Saturday's general elections with a platform that included a pledge to enforce such a ban. Nuclear-powered ships or conventional warships carrying nuclear weapons would not be allowed in New Zealand's ports.

It does not seem unreasonable for the government of New Zealand to be interested in its own safety concerning involvement with nuclear weapons or power. It does seem unreasonable to the U.S. government for a New Zealand party, which is just recently in control of the government, to reject or question part of a 33-year-old treaty.

Once again, the United States has chosen to prove its influence across the globe, instead of coming to some kind of an agreement with countries such as New Zealand.

The result of this strong-man action usually either frightens smaller, less-powerful countries into an alliance with the United States on a "friendly" basis, or it causes these countries to turn against the United States and its premise of friendship, which is really a simple form of totalitarianism.

If the latter occurs, the next step may be for these countries to turn to the embraces of the Soviet Union, thus completely stripping ties with the United States.

Concerning the first result of U.S. warnings, consider this example: Taiwan is one country which consented to one of these "friendly" alliances with the United States. This country is now under martial law, perhaps due, in part, to United States foreign policy.

Which of these two countries is better off in dealing with the United States is questionable.

Military waste policy decision late in coming

For nine years, a House subcommittee and the Defense Department had warned top Pentagon officials that the military was discarding millions of dollars of equipment while paying much higher prices for hardware identical to that being disposed of. Finally, this past week, the Pentagon did something about this horrendous waste of the taxpayer's dollar, ordering a halt to such surplus equipment disposal.

It can only be said that the Pentagon's action is a case of too little, too late. Despite the warnings of various government agencies, the Pentagon, in its infinite lack of wisdom, continued a practice of disposing of materials that has added to this country's already astronomical federal deficit.

The stories of waste easily illustrate the mismanagement the Pentagon has conducted over the years. In 1975, Pentagon auditors reported the same material was being bought and sold at exactly the same time — up to 14 percent of the equipment was being looked for elsewhere somewhere within a branch of the military.

In that same year, an international arms broker reported to House investigators that he made a huge profit in purchasing discarded American equipment and selling the same hardware back to the military. He said he had bought more than $2 million in surplus aircraft parts for about $27,000 — in turn selling $300,000 worth of the equipment back to the Pentagon and selling an additional $700,000 to the governments of Israel and Iran.

In 1979, a military facility conducted an "Easter egg hunt," giving away 1,100 surplus items to various agencies, mainly schools, prisons and police departments. The equipment, worth thousands of dollars, was carted away by these groups for absolutely nothing. It sounds like a deal too good to be true, unless a Pentagon official is involved.

If any Pentagon official is looking around for applause after enacting a policy that will save the government millions of dollars, he should, hopefully, be disappointed. For the Pentagon to have shamelessly wasted tax dollars in the manner of the examples listed above can only be called a disservice to the American public. The recent Pentagon ruling is only ending an unfortunate situation, but it will not rectify the wastefulness of the past. It is hoped that the new waste policy will truly be followed by Pentagon officials, instead of standing only as false concern.

Astronaut leaves space program

SPACE CENTER, Houston — An astronaut who flew on both the Apollo and shuttle spacecraft says he will resign from the space program next year to take a new assignment with the Navy.

Navy Capt. Thomas K. Mattingly, 48, announced Monday he will become director of the Space Program in the Naval Electronic System Command, which has headquarters in Arlington, Va., early next year.

Mattingly orbited the moon as command module pilot on Apollo 16 in 1972. He was commander on the fourth shuttle flight and is to command a Department of Defense space shuttle mission in December.

Eighth-grade love lasts 64 years

FRESNO, Calif. — W. Gillet Mitchell and Dorothy Gavin are "in seventh heaven" after their grade school love has survived the test of time — a 64-year separation.

The Fresno man and the Linden, N.J., woman, both 78, are engaged to be married at a church they remember from their childhood in Linden.

Mitchell, a retired engineer whose wife died last year, found it "very difficult living alone" and wanted to locate the eighth-grade girl he used to meet at the water fountain during recess.

He wrote the Linden Chamber of Commerce to see if anyone remembered a classmate whose maiden name was Walter. The mayor's secretary knew Gavin, a retired secretary, and encouraged her to answer the letter.

Mitchell flew to New Jersey to meet Gavin again in April.

Publisher Forbes leaves hospital

KALISPELL, Mont. — Magazine publisher Malcolm Forbes has been released from Kalispell Regional Hospital, where he was treated for injuries from a motorcycle accident in Glacier National Park.

A hospital spokesman said Forbes, 64, was released Monday and flew to New York City with his personal physician by chartered plane.

Forbes was treated for a collapsed lung, broken ribs, a concussion and scratches after his motorcycle overturned Thursday on Going-to-the-Sun Highway. He and several companions were on an extended motorcycle trip visiting three of his ranches.

FBI file on writer sells for $2,320

LONDON — A dossier compiled by the FBI on British novelist Graham Greene has been auctioned by Sotheby's to a London book dealer for $2,320.

Greene, whose novels include "The Honorary Consul," "The Quiet American" and "The Power and the Glory," obtained the 45-page file under the U.S. Freedom of Information Act. Greene, 79, has long sympathized with left-wing causes and for years was denied entry into the United States.

Despite events, columnist meets dreaded wall

Here it is, almost the end of my pseudo-famous career as Collegian columnist and I've hit that dreaded wall; that malady that plagues every writer who tries to have opinions and tells everyone else about them: I can't think of a subject for my column.

You'd think with only two weeks of summer Collegian publication left I could think of something. After all, there is quite a bit of national history being made, or at least being written about.

The Democratic National Convention began Monday in San Francisco and for the first time in U.S. history, a woman has been chosen as the vice-presidential candidate. Surely, I could think of something to write about this event, (no I can't and don't call me Shirley), but I've already said that despite the hoorahs and back slapping, the choice will not make much difference to the outcome of the national race for president.

I could say that the Democratic Party should unite in its efforts to defeat the Republican party and the incumbent Ronald Reagan, instead of putting on a face of rainbow unity while interest groups tear the party apart by its blue collars. But I've already said that, as has almost every columnist, local and national.

The 1984 Summer Olympics are about to begin in Los Angeles. I could write a column to congratulate the countries of the world for putting political differences on the back burner for awhile and competing in the truly non-political playing arena of amateur sports competition. The only problem is some countries won't be there to compete, due to political differences.

KAREN BELLUS
Collegian Columnist

Perhaps I could somehow make an intelligent statement about the agreement of last week between Associate Professor Ben Mahaffey of the Forestry Department and the University. The University agreed to pay Ben Mahaffey $111,000 to resign, effective in August. I suppose I could pose these interesting questions: If Mahaffey really should not have been dismissed from the University because of professional incompetence, then why is K-State agreeing to pay that large sum for him to leave the University? And, if the payment is justified, how much, if any of my $40 a semester increase for tuition is going to help supplement that payment? Or better yet, if I can get my student peers to try me for academic incompetence, (as many would gladly do), would the University pay me that much to drop out? Unfortunately, others have already thought of these burning issues, so I won't drag it out any further.

That's why I admire professional newspaper columnists and television news commentators, such as Andy Rooney and Jack Anderson. They deliver their opinions to the public every week with wit, humor and effectiveness, and they still find different topics to cover each week.

Anderson, while shedding an intelligent light on national issues, has the wonderful knack of writing about little-known incidents with the instincts of a ferret and actually making people think and get angry about what goes on in other parts of the world. Yep, I can really admire Jack Anderson. He makes burning Student Senate editorials look like small potatoes — I wonder why?

Andy Rooney is another guy I really admire. I mean, how can he think of so many things to wonder about? I guess I just don't have his curiosity. I never wonder about why the coat hangers on restaurant coat racks are always the kind your coat slides off of, or why University Facilities waters the sidewalks, or why people save tickets stubs from movies, especially when the name of the movies isn't printed on the stub. But then again, I don't get paid to wonder as much as Rooney does.

Column sets Demo mood

Editor,
Thanks to Richard Cohen's July 16 column in the Collegian, I am now in the mood to watch a three-day sitcom — the Democratic National Convention.

The situation with Walter Mon-dale's campaign is so pathetic that one must sit back and laugh. Doesn't Mondale realize that the American people can see right through his not-so-subtle political greed?

Mondale is under the misconception that he can get the black vote, Jewish vote, Hispanic vote and what have you by simply parading in front of television cameras with a member of each of these various groups. What an insult. Americans are going to vote for the candidate who can best run the country, not the one who patronizes and says, "Look at me, I'm interviewing a black man to be my vice president."

President Reagan has proven himself a strong leader over the past four years, and Mondale has proven himself a chameleon with as much backbone as Jell-O in a microwave. He couldn't even stand behind his own decision to fire Charles Manatt, Democratic Party chairman. Is this the kind of strength and decisiveness we want in a man who seeks to run a country facing the ever present threats of Soviet nuclear attack and financial devastation?

Just one question of Mr. Cohen concerning his wonderful preview of the Mondale biography flick. Are you sure that in this movie Mondale doesn't try to claim that his father, a man, was a transvestite and his mother, a woman, was a lesbian? Can't believe he would want to pass up these votes.

Indians clip KC in twin-bill sweep

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Don't look now, but Cleveland is on something of a roll.

Sweeping a doubleheader from the Kansas City Royals 9-7 and 6-2 Tuesday night gave the Indians a 5-2 mark since the All-Star break. And, says Manager Pat Corrales, confidence in the Indians' youth movement is soaring.

"We had to start over with kids," Corrales said. "Look at our club tonight...a catcher, a first baseman, a third baseman, a leftfielder and a rightfielder all started in Triple-A. We had to do something. We lost 92 games last year and we weren't going anywhere. I wasn't gonna lose 92. I was gonna lose 100."

In the opener, Carmen Castillo slugged a two-run homer to cap a four-run uprising for the Indians in the third inning. The Indians won the second game as Jerry Willard hit a double and a triple and Mel Hall blasted a two-run homer.

Winner Steve Comer, 2-4, scattered seven hits in 6½ innings in the second game while Frank Wills, 0-1, took the loss one day after being called up from Omaha.

The Indians pounded 15 hits in the opener to help Neal Heaton improve his record to 6-9 and send Larry Gura to defeat for the seventh time in 16 decisions.

Borg, McEnroe to meet

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Wimbledon champion John McEnroe will play an exhibition match here Sept. 12 against Bjorn Borg, the five-time Wimbledon champion who retired from competition two years ago.

The match at Municipal Auditorium was announced Monday as part of The Jones Store Co. Tennis Classic.

"McEnroe personally instigated the match. He's been after Borg the last two years. He (Borg) finally said he'd do it for just one date," said Steve Corey, chairman of a Dallas group that manages McEnroe's appearances.

Corey said the two will play a warm-up in Syracuse, N.Y., the night before the Kansas City match.

Borg, who recently has started playing in tournaments, lost to McEnroe the last time they met — in the finals of the 1981 U.S. Open. McEnroe and Borg have each beaten the other seven times in their careers.

Combining wind and water leads to sport of windsurfing

By LYNN BENDER
Collegian Reporter

Bring together the elements of wind and water and the result is a different kind of leisure sport — windsurfing.

Freestyle, as it is also called, originated in California. The original idea of the sport was that of, instead of being carried forward by the strength of the surf, surfers would be moved over the water by the strength of the wind.

The sport of windsurfing is taught in Manhattan by Marge Oaklief and her son, Jeff. The class, offered by Continuing Education, is available in June, July and August. The class includes eight sessions and meets twice a week.

The Oakliefs became interested in the sport about four years ago.

"We do a lot of sailing, and windsurfing just looked like fun. We tried to wait until the price of boards went down but they just kept going up," Mrs. Oaklief said.

Windsurfing is a much more physical sport than sailing, she said.

"Good balance and coordination are important factors in accomplishing the sport, but a love for water is also needed," she said.

"Windsurfing also involves some strength, but it is not a necessity. It mainly involves using the muscles of the shoulders, forearms and the back."

Even though windsurfing and sailing seem similar in nature, they are very different sports, Mrs. Oaklief said.

"The only thing that is the same in windsurfing and sailing is the theory of wind. The control is different in windsurfing; just because you can sail does not necessarily mean that you can windsurf," she said.

"Windsurfing does take a lot of practice, but it can be learned in a few hours if the wind is light. But it takes much more time to learn how to control the board, if the winds are strong," Mrs. Oaklief said. "When the students are just learning how to windsurf, they get blown downwind. They just need more experience."

After some experience on the board some students will attempt to freestyle, Mrs. Oaklief said.

"Freestyling is doing the unusual, but you need stronger winds and one must be pretty good on the board," she said.

Windsurfing may appear to some as dangerous, but Mrs. Oaklief sees it as a safe sport.

"Windsurfing is a safe sport, there is nothing unsafe about it as long as you watch the weather conditions," she said.

Students in the windsurfing class must wear life jackets, even though the state of Kansas does not require windsurfers to wear one.

"I'm in favor of wearing life jackets. When you are out on the lake there is no one else to help if something would go wrong," she said. "Windsurfing is a safe sport, but something could happen."

In the current session of the windsurfing course, eight students are enrolled. One student, Grant Paul, drives in from Topeka for the course.

"There are very few places that offer windsurfing," Paul said. "I'm originally from California, and have always wanted to learn how to windsurf. It's inexpensive to learn here and the teachers are good."

Paul said prior to the course he did not have any experience in windsurfing, except for some surfing.

"I love water sports, and there is a lot to it (windsurfing). It takes a lot of balance," he said.

Another class member, Neil Pfeifer, junior in financial accounting, said he finds windsurfing a fun experience, despite the frustration that comes with learning the sport's technique.

"I like to waterski a lot, and I've seen it done before. I've always wanted to take the windsurfing class for some time now," Pfeifer said. "I have not had any previous experience, never been on anything that sails. It's frustrating at first, but I'm getting better on controlling the board, keeping balance is kind of hard, Pfeifer said.

Mrs. Oaklief said windsurfing is becoming an increasingly popular sport. Exposure on some television commercials, as well as on sports programs, has helped pave the way to the designation of windsurfing as a demonstration sport in the 1984 Olympic Games in Los Angeles. If the sport fares well in the Los Angeles Games, windsurfers should have the opportunity to win medals in following Olympics, she said.

K-Staters get home-grown milk

Dairy plant gives hands-on training

By JAMI MCWILLIAMS
Collegian Reporter

The dairy processing plant in Call Hall serves K-State and the surrounding area in two ways. It is an educational facility for students in animal sciences and industry and is also a working plant which produces fresh dairy products daily.

Students get hands-on training at the plant by taking courses in dairy products processing, dairy science, milk marketing and dairy product judging, said Julie Schuler, junior in animal sciences and industry.

The processing procedure begins in the dairy unit where 180 head of Holstein cattle are kept. Karen Croft, plant manager, said the students milk about 160 cows every day — producing 1,000 gallons of Grade A milk.

The milk is transported to the processing plant in tank trucks which each hold 2,000 gallons. There, it is processed three times a week, she said.

In the plant the milk is processed into gallons and half gallons of whole milk and 2 percent milk. The time from milking to processing is one to three days. Cheese, butter and ice cream are also made in the plant.

The plant processes approximately 64,000 gallons of milk, 5,000 pounds of butter and 100 to 200 gallons of ice cream mix per year, Croft said.

There are small differences in production during the summer. Less cheese is produced during the summer months and the butter is made only during the fall and winter, Schuler said.

The dairy bar in Call Hall is run this summer by four students including Schuler and her twin sister, Joan. The processing is done by two other students and Croft.

The plant produces 45 flavors of ice cream. After it is processed, the ice cream goes into a hardening room where it will have a shelf life of up to six months. From there it goes into a tempering cabinet until it is the right consistency for dipping. The dairy bar workers are the judge of dipping consistency, Schuler said.

The dairy bar, where all the products are sold, is a busy place year-round, Schuler said. The products have a reputation for being the best around, which is attributed to the fact that they are made from all natural ingredients.

"A lot of people from the community come here (for their dairy products). Our prices are real comparative with those downtown, but ours is better because they can buy the milk the same day it is processed," she said.

The plant does not make big profits, but its main purpose is educational benefits. An average day's profit at the dairy bar is $520, but Fridays the profits usually average up to $800, Schuler said.

The dairy bar tries to keep its prices low. A gallon of ice cream sells for $1.80, a gallon of whole milk $1.75, and a pound of butter is $1.98.

The variety of flavors of ice cream — including tutti-frutti, peanut butter cup, peaches-n-cream, pistachio salad and the K-State exclusive Purple Pride — sell for 50 cents a scoop, which is cheaper than Ice Cream Works or Baskin Robbins, Schuler said.

As a worker in the dairy bar, Schuler says there is a knack to learning to be a good ice cream dipper.

"There's a little bit to learn about how to make a dip so it will sit on a cone without falling off, or how to adjust your dip a little bit for a child," she said.

Besides the other routine duties of keeping the ice cream freezer stocked, waiting on customers and cleanup, Schuler and the other workers are responsible for testing, cutting and packaging the cheese that is made in the plant.

Edam, Colby, Cheddar and New York sharp are the cheeses made in the plant. Workers taste the cheeses during the aging process to determine if it will be packaged as mild, medium or sharp, Schuler said.

The cheeses are made in 40-pound blocks and are cut into 1-pound blocks by a pressure cutter. The cheese is then vacuum packaged and labeled.

Regular customers at the bar include people from surrounding communities such as St. George and Clay Center and recently visitors from the Bahamas sampled ice cream at the bar, Schuler said.

Schuler, who is also Miss Agriculture, said she enjoys working at the dairy bar because of the regular customers she knows.

"You get to know the people who come in: professors and everybody. Everyone's always in a good mood when they're eating," she said.

"The important thing is to have a positive attitude. When you're friendly and outgoing, that's when you bring in the customers, and that's part of sales," she added.

Women interrupt careers for family more than men

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Though the age of sexual equality may have men shouldering more household tasks, a government study says women remain far more likely to interrupt their careers — and for longer periods — to care for home and family.

In the report released Tuesday, the Census Bureau said more than half of working women have taken at least six months off for such reasons, but less than 1 percent of men have done so.

While maternity leaves obviously would account for some of that difference, the study — which offered no specific figures on that score — pointed out that women who quit work for family reasons did so for an average of 9½ years. For men, the family interruptions averaged four years.

Men were more likely to interrupt their careers because they couldn't find work or were sick or disabled, according to the study which was based on a 1979 household survey report.

The study also found that black women took less time off to help out at home than white women.

"A plausible reason for the greater labor force attachment of black women would seem to be that they have less of an economic option than white women to interrupt work for lengthy periods of time," it said.

Spanish-origin women, it said, left their careers for family reasons at about the same rate as white women.

Overall, working women were three times more likely than men to have taken time off from their jobs, at least once for a minimum of six months, it said.

The analysis was undertaken in an effort to find out if women were generally paid less than men because of gaps in their careers. It found those absences didn't account for much of the pay disparity.

Women in the study earned an average of $4.38 an hour, compared to $6.92 for men.

"The difference in earnings would be reduced by only 12 percent if women were assumed to have the same levels of experience and interruptions as men," the Census Bureau said.

Industry expansion opens jobs in many agricultural fields

By SUSAN MACKEY
Collegian Reporter

Agriculture majors can look forward to an open job market after graduation, officials in the K-State College of Agriculture have reported.

"There are tremendous opportunities for agricultural graduates this year and for those graduating in the near future," said David Mugler, associate dean and director of resident instruction of the College of Agriculture.

He sees career opportunities in nearly every field of agriculture: "Especially in agricultural sales and management, agriculture education, food science, agricultural communications, crop protection and the grain sciences: baking, feed, milling, and manufacturing," Mugler said.

He said that in the face of an expanding agricultural industry and a strengthening economy, the number of job seekers is declining and will continue to decline.

"At the same time, many post World War II graduates are nearing retirement age, and the number of our high school graduates is declining," Mugler said.

"Last year was a tremendous placement year for agriculture graduates," said Larry Erpelding, associate director of resident instruction in the College of Agriculture.

Erpelding said that many professors of the World War II era have begun to retire and their jobs are opening and need to be filled.

Mugler says enrollment in agriculture at the nation's 70 land-grant colleges has declined 20 percent in the last five years, from 89,979 the fall of 1978 to 71,740 the fall of 1983.

"The number of bachelor's candidates has dropped 6.4 percent in the past year alone. The freshman class enrollment was down more than 10 percent last fall," Mugler said.

Mugler's figures come from the Resident Instruction Committee on Organization and Policy, whose members are agricultural teaching leaders at land-grant universities. Mugler chairs the group's committee on enrollment, degrees and placement.

"A U.S. Department of Agriculture report says the need for college graduates in the food and agricultural sciences is 13 percent greater than the number of people graduated each year through the mid-1980s," Mugler said. "And the Joint Council on Food and Agricultural Sciences Report states that 'graduate and undergraduate education programs (in these fields) are not attracting sufficient numbers of students to meet the need.'"

In agricultural sciences and food science the demand for graduates exceeds the actual number by 8,000 annually, Erpelding said.

"In 1976 the world population was 4 billion and it is predicted that by the year 2015 the world population will have doubled to 8 billion," Erpelding said. "People have to eat and be clothed."

"Agricultural business opportunities had risen 15.2 percent. The average starting salary was $17,600. This was the second highest job opportunity category in the nation," Erpelding said.

"This past December we (College of Agriculture) had 12 agronomy students graduating and all had taken jobs with agricultural chemical companies, parent seed companies, agricultural consultants and the Soil Conservation Service," Erpelding said.

Mugler said that agriculture students do not just enter into jobs of farming and ranching but also in the area of agribusiness.

"Some people think that agriculture is just for farming or ranching, but only 10 percent of ag graduates in the Northcentral region return to production agriculture or professional farm management. Nearly a third enter agribusiness," Mugler said.

"The world will continue to need more and more people to produce, process and market food and fiber," he said. "Students with training in agriculture can take advantage of these career opportunities in America's No. 1 industry: agriculture."

Officials seek suspect in Lafene drug robbery

By DAVID BEVENS
Managing Editor

A white male in his early 20s is still at large after robbing Lafene Student Health Center Wednesday afternoon.

The man, described as being of medium build and 5 feet 6 inches to 6 feet tall, entered the facility at 3:05 p.m. carrying a gun concealed behind a paper bag, Capt. Charles Beckom of the K-State Police said.

The suspect walked up to the pharmacy window and "produced a large handgun and demanded drugs," Beckom said. "The individual was very authoritative."

An unknown quantity of prescription drugs "of a sedative nature," including Valium, was placed into the brown paper bag. A drug inventory will be conducted to determine the exact type and quantity of drugs taken, Beckom said.

The individual, wearing a light colored T-shirt and blue jeans, left Lafene through the southeast doors "at a rapid walk." Officials at this time do not know which direction the suspect fled.

Officials have not drawn any connections between the Lafene robbery and the Friday afternoon robberies of Dunne's Pharmacy and Norton's Rexall Drugs, Beckom said. One man was arrested in connection with those two robberies and another man is still being sought.

Ratepayers to receive refund from utilities

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — About $19 million would be divided between the electricity customers of three Kansas utilities and a Missouri firm as the result of a decision by the 10th Circuit Court of Appeals in Denver.

Ratepayers served by Kansas Power and Light of Topeka, Kansas Gas and Electric of Wichita, Western Power Division of Centel in Great Bend and the Missouri Public Service Co., of Raytown, Mo., would benefit from the federal district appeals court ruling, handed down earlier this week.

"This court decision is a victory that will help not only our customers, but also those of the other owners of Jeffrey Energy center," said William E. Wall, chairman of the board at KPL, in a prepared statement.

He said the immediate effect of the decision will be a refund of about $19 million from the railroad, which will be paid to customers of the utilities.

The appeals court overturned a decision by U.S. District Court Judge Dale Saffels of Kansas City by ruling that Burlington Northern Railroad illegally charged the utilities for freight expenses to deliver coal to the Jeffrey Energy Center power plant at St. Marys, about 30 miles west of Topeka.

The railroad began imposing a 75-cents-per-ton surcharge on the coal deliveries in February 1982, and raised that charge to 90 cents in June 1983. The increases followed federal deregulation of railroads which included freight rates, and the surcharge was passed on directly to electricity customers who paid the fees.

The utilities, which share the ownership of the plant, appealed the surcharge, claiming the railroad was bound by a pre-contract between KPL, the managing partner at the plant, and Burlington Northern. The railroad argued no legal contract existed.

Saffels ruled in favor of Burlington Northern in August 1982, but KPL appealed to the 10th Circuit Court of Appeals, which reversed Saffels' decision. The railroads now have the option of taking their case to the U.S. Supreme Court.

"The real victory is more than the return of $19 million already collected and elimination of the surcharges now in effect," Wall said. "This decision removes the possibility of Burlington Northern imposing future freight rate increases of up to 15 percent a year, made possible under the Staggers Railroad Deregulation Act."

"By finding those increases illegal, the court has saved Kansas electric consumers hundreds of millions of dollars."

Wall said KPL would ask the Kansas Corporation Commission for permission to refund the money to customers in the form of a one-time cash payment.

Soviet cosmonaut becomes first woman to space-walk

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — Soviet cosmonaut Svetlana Savitskaya left her orbiting Salyut 7 space station Wednesday and became the first woman to walk in space, Tass reported.

She was joined on the space walk by cosmonaut Vladimir Dzhanibekov, the official news agency said in a one-sentence report. It said they "went into open space...in accordance with the flight program."

Savitskaya, Dzhanibekov and Igor Volk blasted into space last week aboard a Soyuz T-2 space ship.

They joined three other cosmonauts, Leonid Kizim, Vladimir Solov'yev and Oleg Atkov, who have been aboard the orbital research station for 167 days as of Wednesday.

Savitskaya is on her second voyage in space, the only woman to do so. She spent nine days aboard the Salyut 7 in August 1982.

Sharks attack 2 teen-age girls

By The Associated Press

SOUTH PADRE ISLAND, Texas — A teen-age girl's legs were mangled by "fierce bites" from a shark while another girl required 70 stitches to close bite wounds, but city officials decided Wednesday to keep open their popular beaches.

"We're probably taking more precautions than necessary," said city official Joe Rubio. "We hope we can get some more publicity and get more tourists down here."

Carmen Gaytan, 18, attacked in the Gulf of Mexico by what rescuers described as a 4-foot shark, was in guarded condition Wednesday in the intensive care unit of Valley Community Hospital. She underwent extensive reconstructive surgery on her legs.

The second teen-age girl was attacked just 2½ hours later in front of another luxury hotel three miles away and required stitches on many leg bites, authorities said.

City and tourism officials decided to keep the beaches open Wednesday following the attacks, the first in the area in 23 years.

The beaches were kept under surveillance by land, sea and air, said Rubio, a South Padre Island building department official who acts as city spokesman in emergencies.

He said beaches would be evacuated if "any suspicious activity that can be confirmed as sharks" is spotted.

Gary Glick, who owns a deep-sea fishing charter boat in Port Isabel, said shifts in ocean currents moved sharks closer to the shore.

Burke said KSAC-AM is the only station in the country to be funded and administered by a university cooperative extension service.

Burke said he expects the change to benefit the station and the cooperative extension service, but it comes with mixed emotions.

"If you have worked at a station for as long as I have (since 1958), to change call letters is a little bit like losing an old friend, but at the same time we thought it was worth it," he said.

Burke said along with the new call letters comes a "new dedication to public radio by keeping the station vital and up-to-date."

After 60 years as KSAC-AM, the cooperative extension service radio station today is scheduled to change call letters.

Jack Burke, head of the office of extension radio and television, said the station is scheduled to have the call letters KEXT; however, since that arrangement was made, the call letters they originally wanted — KKSU — became available.

The station may have the call letters KEXT only a few days until the paperwork for the other call letters is completed, Burke said.

"Because the commission (Federal Communications Commission) has to assign the letters, it takes time and we have to wait," Burke said. "We may not have to use the letters KEXT at all because it (the process) may be finished by Thursday."

Both KEXT and KKSU were call letters of nonactive naval ships, he added.

Burke said the call letters KSAC have been sold to KENZ, a radio station in Sacramento, Calif., for $25,000, plus all additional costs of the change.

Radio station agents from Sacramento, Calif., have inquired about purchasing the call letters before, but the requests were declined because the process was too difficult and expensive then, Burke said.

"The switch has been negotiated so we have no costs," Burke said. "We felt it could work out to be a good thing for us."

Burke said there are three major reasons for the change. The first reason deals with FCC rules.

"Because of the old (FCC) rules it (call letter change) was not common. It was too difficult and too expensive and you were required to notify every station in the area," he said. "Now that the rules have changed; it (the process) is easier and call letter changes are more frequent."

Second, the new call letters better identify the station as a part of the University.

Burke said when the station first went on the air in 1924, the institution was called Kansas State Agricultural College and the call letters KSAC were chosen to reflect that name.

In 1957, officials changed the name to Kansas State University, but because the process was difficult and expensive, the call letters remained the same.

Retailers await state action on drinking bill

By LYNN BENDER
and JIM ORTH
Collegian Reporters

(Editor's note: This is last of a two-part series of articles on the federal drinking age law.)

The 21 drinking age law will not only affect those K-State students under 21 years of age but will influence the business actions taken by many area retailers.

"It is hard to make plans at this time, our actions depend on what the state decides to do. It's a little premature to be making a decision," said Mike Kuhn, owner of Kite's Bar & Grill and Mr. K's.

Kuhn's reaction to the law will depend on whether the state decides to keep the 3.2 beer law or maintain a private club law.

"The state does need to reform the liquor laws. Kansas has a workable system, and statistics show that the 18- to 20-year-old group is not the major group of drunk drivers. Why pick on that age group?" Kuhn asked.

Kuhn said that Kite's will probably change to a private club that serves liquor.

"We are a neighborhood bar and would be kind of similar to Kelly's in Westport. In the long run it might help us (Kite's), because we have a lot of tradition here, especially with alumni, and they aren't much on beer drinking," Kuhn said.

Charlie Busch, owner of Brother's Tavern and Charlie's Neighborhood Bar, also has not made a definite decision on the fate of his bars.

"I don't know how it's going to affect us because there are a lot of things that are involved in changing the law to 21," Busch said. "The state could go ahead and change the law to 21, and leave the 3.2 percent license alone."

Busch explained other possible measures the state could take with the introduction of the law.

"The state could possibly also do away with 3.2 beer completely. I know there would be groups like beer wholesalers who would be lobbying for this. It takes twice the carrying charge to handle two different strengths of beer," Busch said.

"The state could do away with 3.2

beer, so everyone would be pushed into the choice of having a private club or doing away with alcoholic consumption and going out of business," Busch said.

He said that there has been a lot of discussion of possibly raising the drinking age gradually. Going from 18 to 19, then to 20 the next year and on to 21.

Busch said he would like to see the law go in gradually, so it would give the businessmen time to make some long-term arrangements.

"Many people I've talked with said that since they have to change everything, they might try to possibly change the (state) constitution and have liquor by the drink, but I'll believe that when I see it," Busch said.

"I guess if they allow 3.2 beer licensing to remain, I think most bar owners will experiment to see what their business is like, just leaving it alone and only letting 21-year-olds in," Busch said.

He said that if the state does away with 3.2 licensing, then he would most likely keep Brother's Tavern the way it is.

"I feel that Brother's brings in an older crowd anyway," he said.

Busch said it is fortunate that he owns the buildings which his bars are located in.

"If the state imposes an increase in taxes, I would start looking at the possibility of selling out Brother's, equipmentwise, and rent out the area for retail space," Busch said. "There is a big demand for retail space in Aggieville."

The 21 drinking age law will not only affect local taverns but also the competition of already existing private clubs.

"The thing about it is that we have six major 21 clubs here in Aggieville already. We have six main taverns; if all six of those go to a private 21 club you are going to triple the occupancy load or market. It's going to be a real dog-eat-dog situation," Busch said.

The impact of the law will have a much harsher affect on Charlie's Neighborhood Bar.

"As far as Charlie's goes, that could have a real impact on me. If

Department tests computer dance notation

By NATALIE HAZELTON
Collegian Reporter

The subtle movements of dance are easily appreciated, difficult to perform and impossible to record. Until now, the gentle hand movements and delicate turns remained in the minds of choreographers and in the limbs of dancers.

The Department of Physical Education, Dance and Leisure Studies (PEDLS) at K-State is a test site for one of the first computer software programs designed to physically record the movements of dance.

In the March 1981 issue of InfoWorld magazine, an article states that dance has often been called the illiterate art: the notation of dance traditionally has been accomplished by a laborious, extremely exact and mostly unused technique called Labotation.

The geometric staves and legions of tiny rectangles, triangles and diamonds make Labotation intimidating. At the same time dancers see the notation as inadequate. Labotation is also weak in describing stylistic qualities, according to the article.

A former dancer with degrees in applied mathematics, Edward Dombrower developed a notation system that is compatible with the Apple II computer. The system uses Dombrower's product is produced through Mirage Graphics in Manhattan Beach, Calif.

The system got to K-State by way of Charles Reinecke, junior in computer science. Reinecke was enrolled in a dance class and saw a magazine article about the computer. Reinecke called Dombrower to ask about K-State's qualifications to be a test site.

In order for K-State to qualify, the department had to have an Apple II computer and pay $500, according to Linda Westby, dance instructor. Since the department already had the computer, K-State only needed to pay the fee. K-State will be a test site for all future software, according to the contract with Dombrower.

The department also must make suggestions for improvement of the software.

According to a May 1982 Science magazine article, dance is the one of the most temporary of all arts. The most perfect of all performances can be a one-time affair because there is no way to record the dance steps and movements.

Even by using current choreographic techniques, an experienced choreographer may take as long as six hours to record a single minute of dance on paper, according to the InfoWorld article.

Some choreographers use videotape to record their finished product. There is still a problem with this method, which only films from one angle, is subject to poor lighting and often hides dancers from full view while dancing in groups, the article said.

In the absence of a universal method of notation, choreographers use something resembling physical storytelling. This works until a choreographer dies or the dance company folds. After that, there is no record of the movements and choreography of a particular ballet.

"Without a written language, dance is really in the Dark Ages. Can you imagine what the theater would be like if actors had to copy the performance of other actors?" said Maria Grandy, associate director of Joffrey II, in the Science magazine article.

All of these shortcomings pointed to the need for a system such as Dombrower's. On the computer screen, one views a two-dimensional outline of a silhouette. Dombrower intends to endow the silhouette with a male or female body, to dress it in skin-colored tights and to add depth by shadowing its figure. Eventually, a choreographer will be able to "walk around the dancer-figure viewing it from any angle, and to enlarge various parts of the dancer's anatomy for detail."

All of these are considerations that would improve the system, Westby said. As part of the contract for being a test site, the PEDLS department must submit suggestions for improvement and addition.

Westby would like to see better depth quality. The current software doesn't show the depth of the stage in relation to the dancing figure.

She also would like to see a change in color when the figure turns. She said that sometimes it is difficult to tell if the figure is turning to the front or the rear.

Currently the system is limited to just one dancer. If the system is to be of practical use, the software must have the capability for more than one dancer, Westby said.

The software would be better if it could show more articulation, she said, especially in the hand movements.

But as the InfoWorld article points out, there are as many joints in the hand as there are in the entire body. It makes a computer programmer's job much more difficult.

Westby sees great potential in the system although she says it is still in its "elementary" stages. One of the best aspects of the software is that it is "user friendly." Westby said that she is able to use the program without a lot of computer knowledge.

"It is easier for a lay person to reconstruct dance," she said.

Westby said that the program may be particularly useful for choreographers in two ways.

"First, it will allow choreographers to notate dance, but second, it allows them to work out the steps without a company of dancers," she said. Now, if a choreographer wants to work out a problem, he must get all the dancers together to see how the steps work.

"It is real exciting to be at the very beginning of this technology," Westby said.

When asked if she expected other universities to volunteer to be a test site, Westby said that the price might be too high.

"Five hundred dollars might not seem like a lot of money, but for many dance departments, $500 is a lot, especially if they don't already have an Apple II computer like our department did," she said.

Not all choreographers are thrilled with the idea of computers in the area of ballet. The software may be a real help in the dancing industry, but it has not met with a great deal of enthusiasm by all choreographers.

Complaints have come that the computer is "far removed from the spirit of dance which is full of qualities other than the steps you are doing," according to Donald Mahler, director of the Metropolitan Opera ballet, in the Science article.

"I doubt that my choreographers would use this system. My process of creation requires working with human bodies," said New York Ballet's John Taras.

U-LearnN to provide career information

By KATHIE CORMACI
Collegian Reporter

Searching for the right career can be a difficult and frustrating process. For some students, help in making a career selection comes from an outside source. U-LearnN, a campus information service, assists students in these types of choices and offers a variety of solutions.

One of the information services offered by U-LearnN, DIAL, a taped telephone information service for campus and the community, is in the process of being updated.

DIAL has taped information about careers and other topics of interest to students. Students may call in and either ask for a specific topic by its code number or be connected to a topic by a U-LearnN volunteer.

"DIAL started in '80, but after a while it (calls requesting information) died down so we have decided to revise it. It seems that today students want to know more about careers and curriculum. So, I've notified departments on campus to submit tapes giving a brief outline of course curriculum offered. We've had a very good response," Susie Welsh, U-LearnN coordinator, said.

Tapes provided by each department will list the name of the department and a person to be contacted for more information. Choices or options of curriculum are offered. Characteristics, talents and aptitude of individuals already in the field are provided for examples. The type of coursework required is explained. The types of jobs available in the field, the demand for the job, the typical starting salary and work locations are also given.

U-LearnN volunteers are on duty to answer the DIAL line. Each topic has been coded with a coordinating number, so a person can call in and ask for a topic by number. If the caller isn't familiar with the numerical listings, a general topic can be given by the caller and the volunteer can connect him to a tape that may be helpful.

Welsh said a revised listing of all DIAL topics will soon be posted around campus. Along with the topics currently listed, many new topics will be added.

"We also have a tape on advisers and counseling on campus. So many people come to us confused about advising. We have a student contacting advisers in departments all over campus for information on how their system operates. So many colleges are split into other departments and students go from one adviser to another," Welsh said.

"We're getting a series of tapes from the University of Texas. They have a very large system similar to DIAL. The tapes are on the thesis-writing process and how to handle it. We hope it will be very helpful to graduate students," she added.

After students receive information about a topic over the phone they're free to seek more information from the resource center at U-LearnN with the help of paraprofessionals.

The center has books and computer software about careers, microfiche listing career information, and files about curriculum offered by each department at K-State.

U-LearnN is also in the process of developing an alumni knowledge-sharing program in cooperation with the counseling center and the alumni association. They anticipate putting the program into effect next spring, said Laurie Fairburn, associate coordinator of U-LearnN.

"Our plan is to recruit alumni by a mass mailing and possibly advertisement procedure. We want to provide an opportunity for K-State students to obtain realistic career information from an experienced alumnus working in the field," Fairburn said.

According to Fairburn, there is a similar alumni program at the University of Missouri at Columbia.

"We think a program like this would be useful at K-State. There was a study done in 1979 that showed that 53 percent of the arts and sciences students at K-State expressed a need for assistance in career guidance and 50 percent of K-State students expressed the same need. We think this need can best be met by an alumni-sharing-knowledge program," Fairburn said.

A file of alumni willing to participate in the program is available to students with questions concerning specific aspects about careers. Participating alumni will fill out a career profile sheet that will be kept on file.

There are several options available to alumni on how to participate in the program: Alumni can fill out a questionnaire supplying specific information on their job that will be kept in a separate file for student availability, or they can make a cassette tape of job information available to students through the resource center or by phoning DIAL. Alumni can also elect to give permission to accept phone calls from students asking for more information.

Some alumni may express willingness to host a student at a place of employment so the student can observe the job situation.

"What's important is that this is a tool for students to gain information about their career choice. Most career resources lack a lot of detail. They're just basic descriptions. This is a way for students to learn what would be expected of them as far as responsibility and tasks they would perform. However, this program is not designed to be used as a tool for students looking for employment," Fairburn said.

According to Welsh, U-LearnN is also receiving a grant from Apple Computers for a computer system.

Study shows student background variety

By LYNN BENDER
Collegian Reporter

In less than a month a new academic year will begin, and with the new year, many students will walk the sidewalks of this campus for the first time.

These students — with a variety of geographical, social and academic backgrounds — will bring to K-State their own distinct personalities, interests to pursue and goals to achieve.

The typical K-State student is difficult to define. It is hard to pinpoint one set of characteristics for such a diverse student body. Where do they come from? What are they seeking?

According to the 1981 fall report by the K-State registrar's office, every state in the union is represented at K-State, with 10 percent indicating their residence as states other than Kansas. Approximately one-third of K-State's out-of-state students are Missouri residents, with Nebraska, Illinois and New York following in numbers.

K-State has representatives from every county in Kansas. Riley County has the largest percentage of students followed by Johnson, Sedgwick, Geary and Saline counties.

International students representing 70 countries make up 4 percent of the student population. The greatest number of foreign students are from Nigeria, Iran and Taiwan, according to the report.

Transfer students from two-year junior colleges come mainly from Johnson County, Hutchinson and Cloud County community colleges. The majority of students who transfer from other four-year institutions are from the University of Kansas and Washburn, Emporia State, Wichita State and Fort Hays

State universities, according to the admissions office.

The approximate number of transfer students for 1981 was 3,300.

Forty-four percent of the enrollees indicated their hometown is located 100 or more miles from K-State, while 40 percent indicated that they came from less than 100 miles away.

These students also were asked to indicate the size of their home community. Seventy-three percent said the population of their home community was 49,999 or less, and 24 percent were from cities of 50,000 or more. Three percent were not given.

While attending K-State, students are offered a variety of housing options. Approximately 4,500 students live in the 10 residence halls. University policy requires that single freshmen under 21 live in a hall or a greek chapter house. Exceptions to this policy include veterans or students living at home, according to the K-State Bulletin.

Cooperative housing for women is also available through the University. The Georgiana Smurthwaite House accommodates 64 women. The Maitland E. Smith House, formerly a University cooperative and now run by Smith alumni, will reopen for the fall semester and can hold 45 men. Clovia 4-H Scholarship House, which is affiliated with the Kansas 4-H Foundation, provides housing for about 60 women who are 4-H members or have similar backgrounds.

The University maintains 576 apartments at Jardine Terrace for married couples or single parents.

A large majority of the K-State student population lives off-campus in either rental apartments or houses. Many of these apartments are located within walking distance of the campus.

Located off-campus are chapter houses for 13 sororities and 28 fraternities. This type of housing provides small group living arrangements, with 30 to 70 members living in each house. Approximately 650 women live in the sororities and about 1,500 men live in the fraternities.

Several studies and surveys have been conducted by the University to determine the effect of class size on academics.

"There appears to be a slight correlation between the size of the high school and the curriculum the students indicated," according to the 1982 study in student personnel conducted by the Center for Student Development. Students from high school classes between 1 and 899 "indicated their curriculum was college preparatory 58 to 69 percent of the time." Students from high school classes of 900 or more, said "their curriculum was college preparatory only 38 percent of the time," according to the study. Many students indicated they attended schools which emphasized business or vocational subjects.

There does not appear to be any difference in the size of the high school graduating class and the adequacy of the school. The study showed that 88 percent rated their schools as average or better, and 66 percent rated them as good or excellent.

Each entering freshman is asked to take the American College Testing Program, (ACT), which consists of an interest inventory, a student profile section and four subtests in English, mathematics, social science and natural sciences. Standard scores from 1 to 36 are reported for each subtest and a composite score consisting of an average score of the four subtests is determined.

Even though enrolling students are requested to take the ACT, approximately 20 percent of the K-State entering freshmen did not complete the exam, and are not represented by the ACT data. According to the study, "when comparing K-State ACT scores with national ACT scores one should note that the national ACT norms overrepresent college-bound students in the Midwest, Rocky Mountains, Plains and the South, and underrepresent those in the Northeast or middle Atlantic states, and those students at private colleges and universities."

The 1981 average composite score for entering K-State students was 20.4 and the national average composite score was 18.5.

The profile section of the ACT asks students to indicate their last grade earned in English, mathematics, social sciences and natural science. The K-State average score in English was 3.21, mathematics, 2.89; social sciences, 3.29; natural sciences, 3.17; and composite score of 3.17. The national average score in English was 3.01; mathematics, 2.75; social sciences, 3.11; natural sciences, 2.93; and composite score of 2.95. Of those students who indicated their class rank, 90 percent state they graduated in the upper half of their class.

"The size of the high school graduating class seems to have an affect on the students' self-reported grades. Students who attended classes of less than 25 consistently report higher grades than those from larger high schools, with grades in general decreasing as class size increases," the study showed. The data also indicated ACT scores also seem to decline as class size increases.

The student profile section of the ACT asks students to indicate activities they participated in and honors they won while attending high school. "The size of the high school also appears to affect the number of each student's out-of-class accomplishments," according to the study.

Athletics, art, community service, leadership, music, speech, work and writing were the activities and honors listed in the student profile section. Students were able to mark as few as none or as many as seven.

The K-State average for athletics was 3.43; art, 1.20; community service, 1.30; leadership, 1.96; music, 2.12; science, 0.45; speech, 1.12; work, 2.48; and writing, 1.06. The national average for athletics was 2.98; art, 0.99; community service, 1.22; leadership, 1.64; music, 1.65; science, 0.53; speech, 0.89; work, 2.20; and writing, 1.00.

The only area in which K-State reported a lower number was science. The study also showed students from smaller high schools consistently reported a greater number of accomplishments in all areas but "work." One explanation to the greater participation from students of smaller schools is "that in a smaller student body, the competition for opportunities to participate is less."

Students were asked to rank the factors which were most important to them when choosing the college to attend. The top seven factors — in order of importance — were specific curriculum, cost, distance, friendly campus, variety of curriculum, someone they know attending and the quality of teaching.

In a 1979 program development and evaluation survey given to students who applied to K-State but did not choose to enroll, there were two factors which were cited twice as often as any others: financial reasons and the desire to stay closer to home.

Seventy percent of the students represented in the survey indicated they decided to attend college before their senior year of high school and 17 percent more made the decision during their senior year.

Israeli elections bring inconclusive outcome

Israel is a state in the middle of an important transition period. Born with an ideal image of what a country's principles should be, Israel has fallen into a perceived characterization as a state no different than any other in the world.

The 36-year-old nation is plagued by a number of important problems. Israel is still reeling from its military action in Lebanon. Originally seen as a quick military exercise to rid the country of troublesome Palestine Liberation Organization outposts, the Lebanon conflict, in turn, grew into an action characterized as Israel's version of the Vietnam War.

As the United States was shaken by the aftereffects of the war in Vietnam, with its images of My Lai and bombing of Cambodian cities, Israeli citizens are haunted by the new images of the massacre of Christian refugees and the bombings of Beirut.

Israel's economy is another major problem facing the country. Israel has been operating under the strain of inflation that has been approaching 400 percent per year. The country is also faced with the largest per capita foreign debt in the world and is facing an increasing reliance on the United States to keep afloat economically.

Coupled with its constant fight to remain a viable, strong nation in the face of Arab threats and the issue of Jewish settlements in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, these problems have put a heavy strain on Israel.

These problems made Israel's election held Monday one of the most vital in the nation's history. Observers were hoping the elections would offer clear support for one of Israel's political parties, in the hope of solving the nation's problems.

Instead, the results of the election were inconclusive. The nation's voters showed no broad consensus, with the Likud bloc of Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir most likely to retain government power. The election was called in the first place to restore confidence in the Likud government, which has held power since the resignation of Menachem Begin. Although the Likud party withstood the challenge of Shimon Peres' Labor Party, Shamir's position has weakened, as Labor picked up seats in Israel's parliament.

Clearly, Israel remains in no better position now than it did before Monday's elections. Israel's elections showed that the country needs more time to arrive at a national identity, to become strong enough to tackle the tough problems that are before the nation's leaders. Israel has met many obstacles in its short existence as a world state. It is hoped its leaders will find the light in time enough to solve these new problems.

Free bar food reveals mankind's true self

Human decency, I discovered, doesn't coincide with human nature. In high school, students were made to read books like "Lord of the Flies" and "A Separate Peace" just to discover that the literary intelligentsia believed man's true nature to be evil.

I didn't put much thought into it then; my family always had a green plastic welcome mat on our doorstep and we always bought something from one of the visiting Jehovah's Witnesses.

But those feelings did a complete 180-degree turn as I took notice of myself and the many patrons for the weekly Friday hors d'oeuvre session at one of the local drinkeries. Human nature was, as the experts said, one of latent Attila the Hunism after all.

Three other people and I attended the free feast together. We were donating to our favorite charity — us — and we immediately took notice of the large number of other philanthropists working toward a similar cause.

As we sat down, the waitress asked us what we wanted to drink.

"What's the cheapest thing you've got?" one of the guys asked.

"A draw of beer," she replied.

WAYNE PRICE
Arts and Features Editor

Needless to say we all got draws, except one, who wanted to distinguish himself from the rest of the Friday afternoon vermin. He secretly ordered water, tossed in a couple of limes and began telling people he was drinking imported gin and tonic. We were impressed; not at his drink mind you, but at the extra incentive he was adding to his role as a culinary goldbrick.

The food service began at 5 and we were a few minutes early. At an event such as this, though, if you're only a few minutes early you're way too late, as a meaty line had already formed. When the food arrived, one would have thought World War II was won all over again with the cheering and clapping. The guy who brought out the food looked a bit nervous — like the way a zoo keeper must look when he feeds slabs of raw meat to the lions. These natives were restless, and if there wasn't enough free food, well, there wasn't much deterrence against cannibalism.

The waiting line would have convinced any evolutionist of the "survival of the fittest" theory: the larger people were at the front and there was a definite decrease in body size down the line. The shorter people stretched with all their might on tip toes, like children pressing their nose against a department store window, to see what cost-cutting delectables would be available.

Now, bar owners aren't oblivious to people's need of betterment over others. Conveniently set out are quaint little paper plates, about the size of a quarter, along with little plastic toothpicks, which irritably snap when anything harder than melted cheese is punctured. The food itself has its own story. Italians don't even make movies that bad. Imagine dumping the contents of a salt shaker in your mouth along with a cup of flaming grease and you'd get some idea of the main course. But hey, it's free.

At K-State there are many majors, but when it comes to free food and a small plate, we all major in architecture, economizing plate space and developing different methods to stack pieces of chicken bones, with only a scent of meat, on top of carrots, chive dip and nachos. One guy named Bob always seems to let a little cheese sauce fester on his beard so he can scoop it off later with his lizard-like tongue. Of course he calls it an accident, but everyone knows he's just getting more for his money.

But the bar owners usually win out. More food is eaten, more drinks are ordered, and more and more. When the war's over, nothing is left and a few hard cores fly over to the food to pick over the remains. A tiny speck of salt has some nutritional value, and even more financial value.

On the way out of the bar, our palates satisfied along with our pocketbooks, we pondered what to do next. Bob ran out and said, "Hey, I know a place that gives away sandwiches during happy hour." We all rushed to the car.

Nationalities lack importance in Lance's case

WASHINGTON — It is said of Bert Lance, redolent with scandal and unloved by his party, that he has taken something called Arab money. This charge has been leveled with the utmost gravity, whispered in the motel hallways of this convention city, uttered from the floor, printed in the papers and reported on the air. There is, it seems, no money worse than Arab money. It buys you nothing but reproach.

But what, after all, is wrong with Arab money? And even more to the point, what is meant by the term? Are we talking about Arab governments or individuals who happen to be Arabs? If it is the latter — and it seems to be with Lance — then what is wrong with he's done?

For some time now, Arab-American groups have been complaining about the way the word "Arab" gets used to mean something like un-American. It is as if there is nothing more to say, as if Arab is either the moral or the political equivalent of "communist" — as if the word tells it all. But it really tells you nothing — nothing about the source of the money, the reason it was given or even, in most cases, whether you are talking about individuals or governments.

Regrettably, in some cases it is

RICHARD COHEN
Columnist

Jews who bandy about the term "Arab" when they themselves scream bloody murder if anyone talks about "Jewish money" — an odious term, heavy with anti-Semitic overtones. It implies another agenda, a conspiracy of sorts, something that runs counter to the real interest of America and Americans — an attempt to influence the United States on behalf of a foreign government. The term "Arab money" is weighted with the same pejorative themes.

In Lance's case he sold interest in the National Bank of Georgia to a Saudi Arabian financier, Ghaith Pharoan, for $20 a share — double the value of the stock. Later, Lance joined a group of Arab investors who bought control of Financial General Bankshares. One of his associates was the crown prince of Abu Dhabi and another was the former head of the Saudi foreign-intelligence agency.

There is plenty wrong with Lance and there is plenty suspicious about the bank deal. You are entitled to ask why anyone would pay double the market price for a Georgia bank that could hardly have been the hot talk of the Middle East bourse. You are even entitled to conclude that the Arab investors were really buying Bert Lance and not his bank and that they thought the former director of the Office of Management and Budget could be of use to them. If that is what they thought, they — and Walter F. Mondale — were alone in thinking that Bert Lance had a political future.

But all those questions — the reason for doing business with Lance, the reason for paying double — could be raised no matter what the nationality, religion or ethnic group of the investors. If they were trying to buy Bert Lance and with him Jimmy Carter then that — and only that — is what matters. And it would not matter then if the investors were Swiss, Greek or from Cleveland, Ohio.

But somehow that is not the case when it comes to Arab money. So far, there is no proof that any of the individuals involved represented their governments and it's hard to figure out anyway why it would matter all that much even if they did. Bert Lance, until Mondale resurrected him, was a discredited political figure, identified with an ex-president who, if it is possible, is supposed to have less standing and prestige today than he had in the White House.

No matter. The cry of "Arab money" has such authority that it makes you think that somehow Walter Mondale, the political and spiritual heir of Hubert Humphrey, a man whose support of Israel has been unstinting and even (some would say) unthinking, will trash his long-held foreign policy views just because Lance did business with some Arabs. If that is the case, then the cause of Israel is doomed in the United States. After all, Lance's former Georgia bank is hardly unique. The American banking system is lubricated with Arab petro-dollars and the banks involved could swallow the National Bank of Georgia with one dip into their petty-cash drawers.

It may turn out that there is plenty wrong in the relationship between Bert Lance and his business associates. But it will probably turn out that the word "Arab" has nothing to do with it. It is just a scare word based on prejudice that explains nothing by itself. Arab money, like any money, is green. That's all you need to know.

President's son gets 'thrashed'

SANTA BARBARA, Calif. — President Reagan's son Michael said he was "totally thrashed" after a nearly 20-hour powerboat voyage that set a record despite a three-hour stop for engine trouble near his parents' Santa Barbara home.

"The boat just knew I wanted to be here," Reagan, 39, quipped to spectators who gathered Tuesday afternoon after the Wellcraft Scarab — escorted by two helicopters — was forced to dock in this beachfront community 70 miles north of Los Angeles.

Reagan said proceeds from sponsors of the "Assault for the Gold" run between Marina del Rey and the Golden Gate Bridge in San Francisco will go to the U.S. Olympic Committee.

Reagan spokeswoman Silke Elder said despite the delay at Santa Barbara, Reagan and his two crew members completed their 760-mile round trip in a record time of 19 hours, 21 minutes and 39 seconds.

"I credit terrific teamwork," said Reagan after he, navigator John Lindstrom and throttleman Johnny Mann nudged the 1,275-horsepower speedboat into Marina del Rey Tuesday evening.

Riggs takes on female golfer

BEDFORD, Pa. — Remember Bobby Riggs — the former Wimbledon tennis champion who challenged Billy Jean King to a "Battle of the Sexes" tennis match in 1973 and lost?

Now he's at it again, but he's turned from the tennis court to greens and fairways.

Riggs, 67, said he plans to challenge the leading player on the Ladies Professional Golf Association tour next season to a $100,000 Memorial Day match at the Bedford Springs Golf Course.

He bested the LPGA's Marilyn Smith by one hole in 18 holes of matched play at the course Tuesday in what he called a rehearsal. Riggs was allowed to throw the golf ball on the green 18 times during Tuesday's matched play without the throws counting against him, a provision he wants retained in his LPGA challenge match.

Smith, 55, one of the founders of the LPGA tour on which she had 22 victories, pretended to put a hex on Riggs' ball and encouraged the audience to boo Riggs, the 1939 Wimbledon champ.

"I don't think any of the girls (LPGA players) would take the bet unless they're money hungry," she said.

Ex-Nixon aide to work in church

COLUMBUS, Ohio — Nixon administration aide Jeb Stuart Magruder, who says his role in the Watergate scandal led him to become a Presbyterian minister, is joining a church staff and vows to help counsel people with ethical problems.

He will become a church assistant — one of nine ministers — at the First Community Church in September.

A pastor's assistant at First Presbyterian Church in Burlingame, Calif., since 1982, he was ordained as a minister in June 1983.

Credit makes college students learn lessons

By KEM ARST
Collegian Reporter

Paying a phone or electric bill on time, or staying off the bad check list at the bank may seem like minor worries, especially to college students who aren't accustomed to the new responsibilities, but these are often prime sources in establishing a credit rating.

In the age of plastic money and instant credit, more and more college students are discovering the world of buy now, pay later. Unfortunately with every new purchase, a bill follows. The choice one must make is to achieve quick satisfaction by making a purchase on credit, or, not making a purchase until cash is available.

"This is a credit age and college students do not realize what a rare advantage they have to establish credit right now," said Richard Morse, professor of family economics.

"Many credit companies are sending applications to high school graduates and college students and my advice is to accept the cards, even if it's just one, and use it and pay off your credit on time," Morse said.

"What students do not realize is that it is the only easy opportunity they have to establish credit. After they graduate from college and try to make any major purchases or borrow from a bank, they are going to find that it is quite a different story," he said.

According to Morse, students should watch for three things when considering their credit choices: redefining print (understanding what kind of a card it is and what the payment terms are); the cost of the card, and overextension on purchases.

"Many retail cards such as J.C. Penney and Sears are good ones to start with because there is no cost to have one, just so the credit is kept up," Morse said. "Also, gas cards carry no additional card costs, but bank cards, such as Visa and MasterCard, do."

"Of course some students will run into the problem of overextension," he said. "To help avoid this, students should be aware of how the charges on their respective cards are assessed. Some cards allow you to wait 30 days before payment begins, which means credit can often be stretched up to 59 days, so it is very important to know the credit and pay terms of individual cards. The more knowledge a student has about his card, the less likely he is to make careless overextension mistakes," Morse said.

According to a recent article in the 1984 issue of Family Economics, published by the U.S. Department of Agriculture Family Economics Review, credit cards are widely used throughout the United States. According to the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve system, there are currently almost 600 million credit card accounts in existence, with outstanding balances totaling more than 75 billion dollars.

According to the board, creditors use various criteria in determining the types of loans they will make and the credit-worthiness of the people to whom they will lend. Creditors want assurances that people are willing and able to repay debts.

Creditors will usually ask questions regarding income, expenses, debts, reliability and property ownership.

The Equal Credit Opportunity Act (ECOA) prohibits discrimination against an applicant for credit on the basis of age, sex, marital status, race, color, religion and national origin.

Under the act, a creditor may also ask the age of an applicant; however, "age may not be the basis for an arbitrary decision to deny or decrease credit if otherwise a person qualifies."

Kelly House, senior in computer science, has made use of credit cards for the past three years.

"I applied for my first credit cards when I was 19 years old, right before I came up to college," House said. "I didn't have any problem getting it, and my mom co-signed it for me. I thought it would be easier to pay for things with one big check at the end of the month instead of writing separate checks out for everything."

House said that having the credit cards has made him more responsible with managing his money but a little less responsible in the area of selective purchasing.

with use of a credit card but found they weren't ready for the responsibility. Their parents, House said, ended up paying their charges.

Since House's first credit cards three years ago, he said he has obtained three additional cards.

Dan Wagner, senior in journalism and mass communications, never applied for his American Express Card, it was just mailed to him.

"The card just came one day and the limit I could charge was unbelievable," Wagner said. "It was nice for me, but it seemed a bit risky on the part of the company."

According to a recent issue of Money Management magazine, the use of credit in the United States is increasing significantly each year.

According to the magazine, a primary reason for this is inflation. Until the 1970s the economy had seen a steady growth since World War II.

The United States had been an affluent society which encouraged the purchasing of labor-saving devices and other goods and services.

Generally these goods and services were affordable for the majority of Americans. Today, paychecks may be larger, or an extra income may be added to the family budget, but the additional money doesn't stretch as far, the article stated.

According to a report from the Federal Trade Commission, college students have many of the same expenses as people in the working world, such as furnishings, small appliances, automobiles and continuing education.

The latest government survey on consumer habits stated that college students have the opportunity to get an early credit history.

Whether that credit history will be positive or negative depends upon the financial responsibility of the individual.

City workers vote for union

KATHIE CORMACI
Collegian Reporter

Manhattan city employees have been campaigning since May for the election of a union. Through the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees (AFSCME) the unionization of City Hall became a reality Friday.

See related story page 8

AFSCME is basically concerned with organizing unions throughout the state. Manhattan was its first project.

"We represent 4,500 state, county and city employees. Our international union in Washington, D.C., represents 1.4 million employees. We are the largest public employee union in the country," Tom McLaughlin, AFSCME project staff member said.

"Our campaign started in May. It began with a few calls from employees who were upset about a new classification plan. In this classification plan each class of workers has a medium pay range and a maximum pay range. The workers we heard from felt they were approaching their medium pay range with no hope for a raise to the maximum pay range in their classification for that period of time," McLaughlin said.

The city claims it was a pay equity plan so that pay could be more equally distributed between all workers, McLaughlin said.

"Our first meeting of the campaign was with some workers just to inform them on what our union was all about. We expected about three people, but 14 interested city employees showed up. Our second meeting with the workers was an announced formal meeting in which 50 workers showed up. This was just an amazing show of interest to us that I have never seen before," McLaughlin said.

"The Public Employees Relations Board (PERB) makes all the rules on how the formation of a union is to proceed. The first step was a showing of interest. We did this by petition cards saying there was need for an election. One-third of the work force must sign petition cards in order for an election to be held. In three weeks we had two-thirds of the work force signed up. To have this kind of interest immediately is almost unheard of," McLaughlin said.

Next, AFSCME presented the petition cards to the PERB board for verification. Initially, the organization had included clerical workers who had signed petition cards.

"However, the city said that because the secretaries and such had access to confidential material, such as personnel files, they should be excluded, so we excluded them," McLaughlin said.

Manhattan has a classification and grading system for its employees. Classification includes occupations including account clerks, maintenance personnel, mechanics, zoo personnel and electricians. For the classes there is a grading system that goes from two to eight, McLaughlin said.

Everyone but clericals were included in the system. The bargaining unit is everyone in the classification system who is eligible to vote. Of the 95 people in the bargaining unit eligible to vote 92 people voted, McLaughlin said.

"Kansas is a right-to-work state which means we now represent 95 people in the bargaining unit. These people do not have to be members of the union if they don't want to, but whether they're members or not we will represent them," McLaughlin said.

Now that the election is over, the people who choose to join the union will elect officers and decide what to negotiate first with the city.

"What I especially like about AFSCME is that each union elects its own negotiating team that tells our representative what they want negotiated. That team also sits in on negotiations with our president director, Bill Edgerly, who is the spokesman for their union in negotiations," McLaughlin said.

It is expected that the elimination or modification of the classification and pay plan to make it more fair for all employees will be very high on the list of things to be negotiated first, he said.

The last time Manhattan city employees held an election for a union was in December 1979, and they lost.

McLaughlin said the day before the election all employees received a letter from the city manager that basically said to vote no. Also, a week before the election everyone received a raise.

"The city claimed that it always gave raises in December, but upon investigation it was discovered that the year before raises were given in March and the year before that no raises were given at all," McLaughlin said.

"This year there was also a raise given just before the election but we did not object to that because a raise had been scheduled for this time by the city since December. The only thing we object to is when things like raises are used as ploys," McLaughlin said.

Cornell Mayfield is director of human resources and equal opportunity for the city of Manhattan.

"Around the first of the year the city employees received a 5 percent raise and some even received an 8 percent increase. With inflation at 2 percent we feel this is a substantial raise," Mayfield said.

According to Mayfield, the classification and pay plan is a procedure that needed to be updated. The City Commission approved a new classification and pay plan which was developed by Hay Associates, a Kansas City consulting firm. The firm studied the old program and recommended adjustments.

"We do a survey of the areas from which we recruit to find out how much a specific worker would be paid in a specific area. This helps us establish market ranges. We can either go higher, lower or stay in line with the rest of the market. We decided to stay in competition with the market. We opted not to freeze salaries that were above the market and we had 1, 3 and 6 percent increases to get some salaries up where they were supposed to be," Mayfield said.

Mayfield is the city chief negotiator. He said there is nothing to be done until the union elects its representative officers and negotiation date is set. At this time, he does not know what kinds of requests to expect or what the city will do to handle requests that may arise. However, he believes that relationships and how things are done will change.

Liquor

"People who are under 21 will still be drinking; whether it is in their apartments or in their cars. Some will even have fake IDs. It's just going to create more lawbreakers," Lechner said.

Kevin Ladd, manager of Dark Horse Tavern, said that Dark Horse will most likely switch over to a 21 club, if the law is put into effect.

"Dark Horse would about have to switch over. I don't favor raising the drinking age to 21, but would prefer phasing in the drinking age in stages of 19, 20 and 21," said.

Dark Horse is prepared to fight Kansas' acceptance of the federal 21 liquor law by influencing state legislators through lobbyist actions and student support.

Mike Larimore, owner of Last Chance, does not foresee any changes in the immediate future.

"I would have to see some other changes in the state laws before I would change anything. By not having a club law, I wouldn't have to worry about changing, because you would have to be 21 to drink anywhere. If I would change it (his establishment) while there is a private club law, it would be beneficial to have part of it available to the public," Larimore said.

Larimore is also the owner of Aggie Station, a private 21 club.

"There would be some increased competition; I have no idea how much. The situation in Aggieville is such that there are some places that will have to decide if they want to try to open another private club or not," Larimore said.

He said he is not in favor of the law because of the reasons given for its passage.

"I don't think the government will see any results, for the given reasons. I don't expect to see any real improvements (fewer deaths related to alcohol consumption), because of raising the age," Larimore added.

Terry Ray, former owner of several Aggieville taverns, said he did not anticipate a 21 law when deciding to sell.

"Businesses change, times change, adjustments must be made. The businesses have one to two years to make these changes. At this point it's not for sure what the businesses will do, but the sure thing is that the age will go up," Ray said.

"It's unfortunate that the federal government has to force something on us that the states were handling quite well. That's unfortunate, but we have to live with it," he said.

Area restaurants will also feel the effects of the new federal law.

Mark Hemmingway, area supervisor of Pizza Hut, said the changes that may have to be made, would depend on the provisions of the Kansas law.

"If you have to be 21 to drink and serve liquor, this will cut into employment. Approximately 70 percent of our employees are under the age of 21," Hemmingway said.

"I would hate to see the 21 liquor law go through, because many people who can't have a beer with their pizza, won't have any pizza. They associate a cold beer with pizza," he said.

The changes in the law will also cut into the 3.2 beer sales for area distributors.

"The biggest market for college students is the draft beer; we sell approximately 30 percent. There should be an impact on business," said Gordon Kaylor, vice president for B & B Distributing Inc.

"(Mother's Against Drunk Driving) MADD and other organizations which have fought for approval of the 21 liquor law will come back when the traffic deaths have not lowered and find some other reason that the law didn't work," Kaylor said.

He believes the 21 law is not the answer to the problem and that it will not be as effective as it is seen to be.

"What we need is stronger law enforcement and education. The persons who are under age are not going to stop buying it. It's a shame, because it will only keep kids of the premises and away from Aggieville," he added.

Motley's hit lifts Kansas City to 4-3 victory

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY — Darryl Motley singled home Greg Pryor from second base with one out in the bottom of the 13th inning Wednesday night to give the Kansas City Royals a 5-4 win over the Toronto Blue Jays.

Motley's hit came after Pryor led off the inning by singling off the glove of third baseman Rance Mulliniks. John Wathan then sacrificed Pryor to second and Motley followed with his hit down the right-field line off Bryan Clark, 0-1.

Dan Quisenberry, 4-2, pitched the final two innings for the victory.

Kansas City tied it 4-4 in the eighth when Onix Concepcion walked and Willie Wilson was hit by a pitch. Concepcion was picked off second, but reliever Jimmy Key uncorked two wild pitches to send Wilson to third before George Brett lined a double to right-center.

Kansas City starter Charlie Leibrandt issued a two-out walk to Cliff Johnson to start a two-run rally that gave the Blue Jays a 4-3 lead in the fourth.

Johnson moved to second on Jesse Barfield's single and Toronto loaded the bases when Leibrandt missed the bag while taking a throw from second baseman Frank White on Willie Upshaw's grounder. Buck Martinez followed with a two-run single.

Dane Iorg had given Kansas City a 2-0 lead with his second home run in the right-field seats after Jorge Orta doubled leading off the second.

K-State announces cage schedule

The K-State men's basketball schedule for the 1984-85 season was announced Wednesday with several heavyweights of the collegiate ranks showing up as opponents.

The 'Cats open their season Nov. 24 with a home contest against North Texas State University.

Among the teams included during the non-conference season include Mississippi State University and last season's National Collegiate Athletic Association tournament qualifiers Indiana University and Oregon State University, all home contests. Marquette University and Oral Roberts University are part of K-State's away schedule.

K-State opens its Big Eight season Jan. 16 against the University of Nebraska at Lincoln. K-State is slated to meet intrastate rival the University of Kansas at home Jan. 30, while the Jayhawks will host the 'Cats on Feb. 20.

Project helps merchants with redesign

LYNN TALPERS
Collegian Reporter

The Manhattan Design Project is currently working with the Community Development Office of Manhattan to coordinate the downtown mall with the downtown redevelopment project.

The downtown redevelopment project includes renovation of the entire downtown area.

"People are still skeptical about the mall. They don't want to do anything to their facades (storefronts) because they don't believe that it's going to happen. But it is going in," said Gaines Jontz, Design Project draftsman.

Manhattan Design Project is a public agency that is a branch of the Community Development Office. The project is funded by the city, said Karen Daly, redevelopment officer for the city.

"Originally it (MDP) was helped by the University," Daly said.

K-State's architecture department provided design guidance and student workers for the project, she said.

"The Design Project gives designs and conceptual ideas to clients," Daly said. It also aids the client in obtaining tax credit for the rehabilitation work done on their property.

"In Aggieville the credit is about 15 (percent) to 20 percent," she said, "but downtown it's 25 percent because of the historical district."

The downtown historical district includes the area approximately one-half block north and south of Poyntz Avenue between Third and Fifth streets. It also includes J.C. Penney Co. Inc. and the Masonic building next to Penney's.

"Basically, we work with two commercial areas: Aggieville and downtown," Jontz said.

Currently, the Design Project is working mainly on facade renovation for downtown business owners.

The Design Project has just completed the facade renovation on the Norton Rexall Drug store located on the east corner of Poyntz Avenue and Fifth Street. The group is waiting for approval, for tax credit, of new facade designs for Town and Country Hardware, the First National Bank located across the street from Norton Rexall Drugs and the former Firestone building.

According to Jontz, the Kansas Historical Society, which reviews the designs for tax credit, considers proportion and scale of the building and its elements and similarity of color and design to the original facade before granting approval for credit.

"Modern interpretations using modern materials are fine," Jontz said. "It doesn't have to look just like the original."

He said that removing major elements from the building facade can make design approval for tax credit difficult to obtain.

The Design Project is also responsible for designing the new streetscape for the downtown area adjacent to the mall.

The streetscape design includes new sidewalks, crosswalks, planting, signage, lighting, drinking fountains and benches. All features will be similar, if not identical, to those used in the mall.

"We're not planning an old reproduction of the streetscape," Daly said. "It will be simple and not overbearing to you."

"We don't want it to be a giant suburban mall, but a part of downtown," she said. "That's why the streetscape of the mall must tie in with what is being used downtown."

Also included in the downtown redevelopment is a new office building just west of the downtown area. The building's planned site is next to the Kansas Power and Light Co. on Poyntz Avenue.

"The office building will draw people through the downtown area from the mall," Daly said. This will help make the downtown a center of activity again, a major objective of the project.

Currently, the city has hired a firm to begin appraisal on properties in the future mall location. The city will make offers to purchase options on the properties based on the appraisals.

"Our agreement with the developer states that we will not begin acquisition (of the properties) until he has his financing and the leases for the department stores," Daly said.

"We have to give him a site that's leveled and filled and ready for construction," she said. The city will probably contract out the demolition of the site after relocating the businesses in the area.

The city has plans for a service commercial area (mainly parts and maintenance stores) located between Third and Fourth streets on Colorado Street. This is where Daly believes many of the businesses currently located on the mall site will move.

"We don't want to force anyone to do anything," she said.

The city has hired a relocation consultant to advise the business owners.

"We were hoping to put together some kind of financial assistance for the businesses," Daly said.

Men's wages twice salaries paid women

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Men earn twice what women are paid, and education and seniority are major factors in salary, newly released government statistics confirm.

The highest salaries go to white males between the ages of 45 and 54 with postgraduate college degrees, according to the newly published income figures collected in the 1980 census.

The detailed compilation of salaries paid in 1979 lists annual earnings of $36,520 for white males between 45 and 54 with five years or more of college.

White women of the same age and education averaged $15,637.

Peak salaries for blacks, in the same age and educational groups, were $25,801 for males and $17,242 for women.

Average salaries vary considerably in the study, according to education, race, gender and age.

For all workers over age 18, men averaged $16,929 during the year while women earned $8,238.

Income grew in parallel with education.

Men with less than eight years of schooling averaged $12,028, while women in that category earned $6,159.

With a high school diploma, male earnings rose to $15,368 and women's to $7,749.

And with a postgraduate college degree men averaged $27,660 and women $13,471.

Work experience also increases income.

Pay for men aged 25 to 34 averaged $15,584, and for women $8,901.
